Henry Smith, having a godly gentleman for his father, and an ancient protestant, living at Camden, in Gloucestershire, was virtuously brought up by him in the knowledge of God's word and sincere religion; wherein he shewed himself in the beginning such an earnest professor, that he was called by the papists prattling Smith. After these good beginnings, he went to be a student of the law in the Middle Temple, London, where, by ill company, he began to be perverted to popery, and afterwards going to Louvain, was more deeply grounded in the same. Inasmuch that, returning from thence, he brought with him pardons, a crucifix, with an Agnus Dei, which he used commonly to wear about his neck, and had in his chamber images, before which he was wont to pray; besides divers other popish trash, which he brought with him from Louvain. Now what end followed this I should be unwilling to declare; but that the notoriety of the fact was such, as amazed almost the whole city of London. The end was this.

A short time after his return, this Henry Smith became a foul jeerer, and a scornful scoffer of that religion which he once professed. In his bed-chamber, in St. Clement's parish without Temple-bar, as he was going to bed in the evening, having stripped himself naked, he tied his shirt (which he had torn for that purpose) about his privities, and with his girdle or garter strangled himself; having his Agnus Dei in a silver table, with his other idolatrous trash, in a window by him. And thus being dead, and not thought worthy to be interred in the church-yard, he was buried in a lane called Folskew-lane.

FOREIGN EXAMPLES.

HOIMEISTER, the great arch-papist, and chief master-pillar of the pope's falling church, as he was on his journey towards the council of Ratisbon, to dispute against the defenders of Christ's gospel, suddenly in his journey, not far from Ulmes, was prevented by the stroke of God's hand, and there miserably died, with horrible roaring and crying out.

Another example we have of one Arnoldus Bomelius, a young man of the university of Louvain, well commended for his flourishing wit and ripeness of learning, who, whilst he favoured the cause of the gospel, and took part with the same against the enemies of the truth, prospered and went well forward; but after he drew to the company of Tyleman, master of the pope's college in Louvain, and framed himself after the rule of his unfavourable doctrine, that is, to stand in fear and doubt of his justification, and to work his salvation by merits and deeds of the law, he began more and more to grow in doubtful despair and discomfort of mind; as the nature of that doctrine is, utterly to pluck away a man's mind from all certainty and true liberty of spirit, to a servile doubtfulness, full of discomfort and bondage of soul.

Thus the young man, seduced and perverted through this blind doctrine of ignorance and dubitation, fell into a great agony of mind, wandering and wrestling in himself a long time, till at length being overcome with despair, and not having in the popish doctrine wherewith to raise up his soul, he went out of the city on a time to walk, accompanied by three other students of the same university, his special familiars. As they returned home again, Arnoldus, through fatigue, as it seemed, sat down by a spring side to rest himself: the others thinking no ill, went forwards, and in the mean time Arnoldus suddenly took out his dagger, and struck himself into the body.

His fellows seeing him shrinking down, and the fountain to be coloured with the blood that issued out of the wound, came running to him, took him up, and brought him into an house near at hand, and there exhorted him, as well as they could, to repent his fact; who then by outward gesture seemed to give some sign of repentance. Notwithstanding, he espying one of his friends there busy about him, to have a knife hanging at his girdle, violently plucked out the knife, and with main force stabbed himself to the heart.

Johannes Sleidanus, in his 23d book, giveth a relation of Cardinal Crescentius, the chief president and moderator of the council of Trent, Anno 1552. The story of whom is certain, the thing that happened to him was strange and notable, the example of him may be profitable to others, such as have grace to be warned by other men's evils.

The twenty-fifth day of March, in the year aforesaid, Crescentius, the pope's legate, and vicegerent in the council of Trent, was sitting all day long until dark night, in writing letters to the pope. After his labour, when night was come, thinking to refresh himself, he began to rise; behold there appeared to him a mighty black dog, of a huge bigness, his eyes shining with fire, and his ears hanging down well near to the ground, and strait began to come towards him, and couched under the table. The cardinal, not a little surprised at the sight thereof, somewhat recovering himself, called to his servants, who were in the outward chamber next by, to bring in a candle, and to seek for the dog. But when the dog could not be found, neither there, nor in any other chamber about, the cardinal thereupon struck with a sudden conceit of mind, immediately fell into such a sickness, that his physicians, which he had about him, with all their art and industry could not cure him. And so in the town of Verona died this popish cardinal, the pope's holy legate, and president of this council, wherein his purpose was (as Sleidan saith) to recover and heal again the whole authority and doctrine of the Romish see, and to set it up for ever.

There were in this council of Trent, besides the pope's legates and cardinals, 24 bishops, doctors of divinity 62. And thus was the end of this popish council, by the provident hand of the Almighty, dispatched and brought to nought.

The council of Trent, being then dissolved by the death of this cardinal, was afterward notwithstanding collected again about the year of our Lord 1562, against the erroneous proceedings of which council other writers there be that say enough. So much as pertaineth only to my story, I thought proper hereunto to add an account of two adulterous filthy bishops belonging to the said council, one of whom resorting to an honest wife, was slain by the just stroke of God with a boar-spear. The other bishop, who used to creep through a window, in the same window was subtilly taken and hanged in a gin laid for him on purpose, and so contrived, that in the morning he was seen openly in the street hanging out of the window, to the wonder of all that passed by.

In the city of Antwerp lived one, named John Vander Warfe, of good estimation amongst the chief of that place. Who, as he was of a cruel nature, so he was of a perverse and corrupt judgment, and a sore persecutor of Christ's flock, with greediness seeking and shedding innocent blood, and had drowned divers good men and women in the water, for which he was much commended by the bloody generation. By some he was called a blood hound, or bloody dog. By others he was called a shilpad, that is to say, sheltoad, for he being a short grundy, and of little stature, did ride commonly with a great broad hat, as a country churl.

This man being weary of his office, (wherein he had continued above twenty years) he gave it over; and because he was now grown rich and wealthy, he intended to pass the residue of his life in ease and pleasure.

About the second year after, he came to Antwerp, to the feast called our lady's Oumegang, to make merry; which feast is usually kept on the Sunday following the assumption of our lady. The same day about four o'clock in the afternoon, he being well loaden with wine, rode homewards in his waggon, with his wife and a gentlewoman waiting on her, and his fool. As soon as the waggon was come without the gates of the city, upon the wooden bridge being at that time made for a shift, with rails or barriers on each side for the safety of the passengers (about half the height of man), the horses stood still, and would by no means go forward, whatsoever the driver of the waggon could do.

Then he cried out to him that guided the waggon, saying, Ride on, in the name of a thousand devils ride on. The poor man answered, that he could not make the horses go forward. By and by, while they were yet talking, suddenly arose, as it were, a mighty whirlwind, with a terrible noise (the weather being very fair, and no wind stirring before), and tost the waggon into the town-ditch, the ropes that tied the horses being broke afunder, in such a manner as if they had been cut with a sharp knife, the waggon being also cast upside down, by the fall whereof he had his neck broke, and was swallowed up in the mire. His wife was taken up alive, but died in three days after. But the gentlewoman and the fool, by God's providence were preserved from harm. The fool hearing the people say his master was dead, said, And was not I dead, was not I dead too? This happened in the year 1553. Witness hereof not only the printer of the same story in Dutch, dwelling then in Antwerp, whose name was Francis Fraet, a good man, and afterwards through hatred was put to death by the papists, but also divers Dutchmen here in England, and a great number of English merchants who were at that time in Antwerp.

In the year 1565, there was in the town of Gaunt, in Flanders, one William de Wever, accused and imprisoned by the provost of St. Peter's, in Gaunt (who had in his cloister a prison and place of execution), and the day the said William was called to the place of judgment, the provost sent for Mr. Giles Brackleman, principal advocate of the council of Flanders, and burgh-master and judge of St. Peter's, in Gaunt, with other rulers of the town, to sit in judgment upon him; and as they sat in judgment, Mr. Giles Brackleman reasoned with the said William de Wever upon divers articles of his faith. One whereof was,

Why he denied that it was lawful to pray to saints; and he answered, For three causes, the one was, That they were but creatures, and not the Creator. The second was,

That if he should call upon them, the Lord did both see it and hear it; and therefore he durst give the glory to none other but God. The third and chief cause was,

That the Creator had commanded in his holy word to call upon him in trouble, unto which commandment he durst neither add nor take from.

He also demanded, whether he did not believe that there was a purgatory which he should go into after this life, where every one should be purified and cleansed.

He answered, That he had read over the whole Bible, and could find no such place, but the death of Christ was his purgatory: with many other questions, proceeding after their order, till he came to pronounce his condemnation. But before it was read, he was struck with a palsy, that his mouth was almost drawn up to his ear, and so he fell down, the rest of the lords standing before him, that the people might not see him: and the people were desired to depart. Then they took him up and carried him to his house, where he died the very next day. Yet notwithstanding all this, they burnt William de Wever, within three hours after.

About

About the borders of Suevia, in Germany, there was a monastery of Cistercian monks, founded in the days of pope Innocent the Second, by a noble baron, about the year 1110. This cell, in process of time, was enlarged with more ample possessions, finding many great and liberal benefactors contributing to the same; as emperors, dukes, and rich barons.

The earls of Montford had bestowed upon it great privileges, upon this condition, that they should receive with free hospitality any strangers, either horsemen or footmen, for one night's lodging. But this hospitality did not long so continue, through a subtle and devilish device of one of the monks, who took upon him to play the part of the devil, rattling and raging in his chains, near the room where the strangers lay, in a frightful manner, in the night time to terrify the guests; by reason whereof no stranger nor traveller durst there abide; and thus he continued for a long time.

At length it happened, that one of the earls of Montford, a benefactor to that abbey, coming to the monastery, was there lodged; when night came, and the earl at rest, the monk after his wonted manner began to play the devil. There was stamping, ramping, and spitting of fire, roaring, thundering, bouncing of boards, and rattling of chains, enough to make a man stark mad. The earl hearing the sudden noise, and peradventure afraid at first, though he had not the art of conjuring, yet taking a good heart, and running to his sword, he laid about him so well, and still followed the noise of the devil so close, that at last the jesting devil was slain by the earl in earnest.

A L E T T E R,

Written to HENRY II. King of France.

CONSIDER, I pray you, sir, and you shall find that all your afflictions have come upon you, since you have set yourself against those who are called Lutherans.

When you made the edict of Chasteaubriant, God sent you war; but when you ceased the execution of your said edict, and as long as you were an enemy to the pope, and going into Almany for the defence of the Germans afflicted for religion, your affairs prospered as you would wish or desire.

On the contrary, what hath become upon you since you were joined with the pope again, having received a sword from him for his own safeguard? And who was it that caused you to break the truce? God hath turned in a moment your prosperities into such afflictions, that they touch not only the state of your own person, but of your kingdom also.

To what end came the enterprize of the duke of Guise in Italy, going about the service of the enemy of God, and purposing after his return to destroy the vailies of Piedmont, to offer or sacrifice them to God for his victories? The event hath well declared, that God can turn upside down our councils and enterprizes; as he overturned of late the enterprize of the constable of France at St. Quintin's, having vowed to God, that at his return he would go and destroy Geneva, when he had gotten the victory.

Have you not heard of L. Ponchet, archbishop of Tours, who made application for the erection of a court called Chamber Ardent, wherein to condemn the protestants to the fire? Who afterwards was struck with a disease called the fire of God; which began at his feet, and so ascended upward, that one member after another was obliged to be cut off, and so he miserably died without remedy.

Also one Castellanus, who having enriched himself by the gospel, and forsaking the pure doctrine thereof to return unto his vomit again, went about to persecute the christians at Orleans, and by the hand of God was stricken in his body with a disease unknown to the physicians, the one half of his body burning as hot as fire, and the other as cold as ice; and so most miserably lamenting and crying, ended his life.

There are other infinite examples of God's judgments worthy to be remembered; as the death of the chancellor and legat du Prat, who was the first that opened to the parliament the knowledge of heresies, and gave out the first commissions to put the faithful to death, swearing and horribly blaspheming God. When dead, his stomach was found pierced and gnawed asunder with worms.

Also one named Claude de Affes, a counsellor in the said court, the same day that he gave his opinion and consent to burn a faithful christian (although it was not done indeed as he would have it), after he had dined, committed whoredom with a servant in the house, and even in the very action he was stricken with a disease called an apoplexy, whereof he immediately died.

Peter Liset, chief president of the said court, and one of the authors of the aforesaid burning-chamber, was deposed from his office, for being known to be out of his wits and bereaved of his understanding.

Likewise John Andrew, bookbinder to the palace, a spy for the president Liset, and of Bruscard the king's solicitor, died in a fury and madness.

The inquisitor John de Roma, in Provence, his flesh fell from him by piece-meal, so stinking that no man could come near him.

Also John Mincrius, of Provence, who was the cause of the death of a prodigious great number of men, women and children, at Cabriers, and at Merindol, died with bleeding in the lower parts, the fire having taken his belly, blaspheming and despising God: besides many others whereof we might make recital, which were punished with the like kind of death.

It may please your majesty to remember yourself, that you had no sooner determined to set upon us, but new troubles were moved by your enemies, with whom you could come to no agreement; which God would not suffer, forasmuch as your peace was grounded upon the persecution which you pretended against God's servants: as also your cardinals cannot subvert through their cruelty the course of the gospel, which hath taken such root in your realm, that if God should give you leave to destroy the professors thereof, you should be almost a king without subjects.

Tertullian hath well said, that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the gospel. Wherefore to take away all these evils coming of the riches of papists, which cause so much whoredom, sodomy, and incest, wherein they wallow like hogs, feeding their idle bellies, the best way were to put them from their lands and possessions, as the old sacrificing Levites were, according to the express commandment which was given to Joshua. For as long as the commandment of God took place, and that they were void of ambition, the purity of religion remained whole and perfect; but when they began to aspire to principalities, riches and worldly honours, then began the abomination and desolation that Christ foretold.

It was even so in the primitive church, for it flourished and continued in all pureness, as long as the ministers were of small wealth, and sought not their particular profit, but the glory of God. But since the pope began to be prince-like, and to usurp the dominion of the empire under the colour of a false donation of Constantine, they have turned the scriptures from their true sense, and have attributed the service to themselves, which we owe to God. Wherefore your majesty may seize with good right upon all the temporalities of the benefices, and that with a safe conscience to employ them to their true and right use.

First, For the finding and maintaining of the faithful ministers of the word of God, for such livings shall be requisite for them, according as the case shall require. Secondly, For the entertainment of your justices that give judgment. Thirdly, For the relieving of the poor, and maintainance of colleges to instruct the poor youth in that which they shall be most apt unto. And the rest, which is infinite, may remain for entertainment of your own estate and affairs, to the great easement of your poor people, which alone bear the burthen, and possess in a manner nothing.

In doing this, an infinite number of men, and even of your nobility, who live by the crucifix, would employ ploy themselves to your service; and the common-wealths so much the more diligently, as they see that you recompense none but those that have deserved; whereas now there is an infinite number of men in your kingdom, which occupy the chief and greatest benefices, who never deserved any part of them. And thus much touching the superfluous possessions of the pope's lordly clergy. Now proceeding further in this exhortation to the king, thus the letter importeth.

But when the papists see that they have not any reason to alledge for themselves, they endeavour to make the Lutherans (as they call us) odious to your majesty, and say, if their sayings take place, you shall be fain to remain a private person, and that there is never a change of religion, but there is also a change of principedom. A thing as false as when they accuse us to be sacramentaries, and that we deny the authority of magistrates, under the shadow of certain furious Anabaptists, whom Satan hath raised in our time to darken the light of the gospel. For the histories of the emperors who have begun to receive the christian religion, and that which is come to pass in our time, shew the contrary.

Was there ever prince more feared and obeyed, than Constantine in receiving the christian religion? Was he therefore put from the empire? No, he was thereby the more confirmed and established in the same, and also his posterity who ruled themselves by his providence. But such as have fallen away, and followed men's traditions, God hath destroyed, and their race is no more known in the earth, so much doth God detest them that forsake him.

And in our time the late kings of England and Germany, were they constrained in reproving superstitious, which the wickedness of the times had brought in, to forsake their kingdoms, and principedoms? All men see the contrary; and what honour, fidelity, and obedience, the people in our time that have received the reformation of the church, do under their princes and superiors. Yea, I may say that the princes knew not before what it was to be obeyed, at that time when the rude and ignorant people received so readily the dispensations of the pope, to drive out their own kings and natural lords.

The true and only remedy, sir, is, that you cause to be holden a holy and free council, where you should be chief, and not the pope and his, who ought but only to defend their causes by the holy scriptures; that in the mean while you may seek out men not corrupted, suspected, nor partial, whom you may charge to give report faithfully unto you of the true sense of the holy scriptures. And this done, after the example of the good kings, Josaphat, Ezechias, and Josias, you shall take out of the church all idolatry, superstition, and abuse, which is founded directly contrary to the holy scriptures of the old and new Testament, and by that means you shall guide your people in the true and pure service of God, not regarding in the mean time the cavilling pretences of the papists, who say that such questions have been already answered at general councils: but it is known well enough, that no council hath been lawful since the popes have usurped the principality and tyranny upon men's souls, but they have made them serve to their covetousness, ambition and cruelty, and the contrary which is among those councils, maketh enough for their disproof, besides a hundred thousand other absurdities against the word of God, which be in them. The true proof of such matters is in the true and holy scriptures, to which no times, nor age, hath any prescription to be alledged against them; for by them we receive the councils founded upon the word of God, and also by the same we reject that doctrine which is repugnant.

And if you do thus, sir, God will bless your enterprise, he will increase and confirm your reign and empire, and your posterity. If otherwise, destruction is at your gate, and unhappy are the people which shall dwell under your obedience. There is no doubt but God will harden your heart as he did Pharaoh's, and take off the crown from your head, as he did to Jeroboam, Nadab, Baza, Achah, and to many other kings, which have followed men's traditions, against the commandment of God, and give it to your enemies to triumph over you and your children.

And if the emperor Antonine the Meek, although he were a pagan, and idolater, seeing himself bewrapt with so many wars, ceased the persecutions which were in his time against the christians, and determined in the end to hear their causes and reasons, how much more ought you that bear the name of the most christian king, to be careful and diligent to cease the persecutions against the poor christians, seeing they have not troubled nor do trouble in any wise the state of your kingdom, and your affairs; considering also that the Jews be suffered through all Christendom, although they be mortal enemies of our Lord Jesus Christ, whom we hold by common accord and consent for our God, Redeemer, and Saviour, and that until you have heard lawfully debated, and understand our reasons, taken out of the holy scriptures, and that your majesty have judged, if we be worthy of such punishments. For if we be not overcome by the word of God, the fires, the swords, and the cruellest torments shall not make us afraid. These be exercises that God hath promised to his, which he foretold should come to pass in the last times, that they should not be troubled when such persecutions shall come upon them.

The Story and End of the French King.

WHOSOEVER was the author or authors of this letter above prefixed, herein thou seest (good reader) good counsel given to the king; if he had had the grace to receive and follow the same, no doubt but God's blessing working with him, he had not only set the realm in a blessed state from much disturbance, but also had continued himself in all flourishing felicity of princely honour and dignity. But instead of that, he was so outrageous against the protestants, that he threatened Anne du Bourg, one of the high court of parliament in Paris, that he would see him burn with his own eyes. But how he came short of his purpose, the sequel of the story will make appear, in the following manner.

King Henry being in the parliament-house, which was kept at the Friar Augustine's at Paris, because the palace was in preparing against the marriage of his daughter, and his sister, and having heard the opinion in religion of Anne du Bourg, counsellor in the law, a man eloquent and learned, he caused the said Anne du Bourg, and Loys du Eaux, counsellors, to be taken prisoners by the constable of France, who apprehended them, and delivered them into the hands of count Montgomery, who carried them to prison. Against whom the king being full of wrath and anger, among other things, said to the said Anne du Bourg, These eyes of mine shall see thee burnt: and so on the 19th of June, commission was given to judges to make their process.

In the mean while, great feasts and banquets were preparing at court, for joy and gladness of the marriage that should be of the king's daughter and sister, against the last day of June save one. When the time was come, the king employed all the morning in examining the presidents and counsellors of the said parliament against these prisoners, and other their companions that were charged with the same doctrine; which being done, they went to dinner.

The king, after he had dined, for that he was one of the defendants at the tourney, which was solemnly made in St. Anthony's-street, near to the prison where the foresaid prisoners were committed, entered into the lists; and therein engaging as the manner is, had broken many staves very valiantly, running as well against the count of Montgomery, as divers others. Whereupon he was highly commended by the spectators. And because he was thought to have done enough, they desired him to leave off with praise: but he being the more inflamed with the hearing of his praise, would needs run another course with Montgomery: who then refusing to run against the king, and kneeling on his knees for pardon not to run; the king being eagerly set, commanded him on his allegiance to run, and (as some affirm) he also put the staff in his hand, unto whose hand he had committed the aforesaid prisoners a little before. Montgomery being thus enforced, whether he would or no, to run against the king, prepared himself after the best manner to obey the king's commandment. Whereupon he and the king met together so fiercely, that in breaking their spears the king was struck with the counter blow, so right in one of his eyes, by reason that the visor of his helmet suddenly fell down at the same instant, that the splinters entered into his head; so that the brains were touched, and thereupon so festered, that no remedy could be found, although physicians and surgeons were sent from all parts of the realm, and also from Brabant, from king Philip; but nothing availed, so that the 11th day after, that is, the 10th of July 1559, he miserably ended his life, having reigned 12 years, 3 months, and 10 days.

JOHAN WHITMAN, Shoemaker, about the age of 49 years, born in Tinen, a town in Brabant, after his coming over into England, dwelt in Rye, in the county of Suffex, being married 23 years; always a professor of the gospel, as well in the time of freedom as in the time of persecution. About Candlemas, in the year 1572, unknown to his friends in Rye, understanding of shipping in Rye, which was ready bound for Ostend in Flanders, he went on board the Saturday morning, and arrived at Ostend that night, where he lodged with one of his kinsmen dwelling there. The next day being Sunday, in the morning, he, accompanied with his said kinsman, took his journey, at it were to have passed into the higher country.

When they were about three miles on their journey out of the town, Whitman immediately returned back to Ostend, whither so soon as he was come, he immediately went to church, and at the time of the heave-offering, stepped to the sacrificer, and took from his head the idol, saying these words in the Dutch tongue, Is this your God? And so breaking it, cast it down under his feet. The people laid hold on him, and he was carried immediately to prison. The next day the judges and other counsellors being assembled, he was brought forth into the common-hall, and examined of this fact, the intent, the counsel, and abettors thereof, and also of his faith; where he very constantly in defence of his christian faith, and great detestation of idolatry, behaved himself in such a manner, that he wrung tears from the eyes of several, both of the chief, and others present. So he was committed again to prison. The next day being Tuesday, he was brought out again before the judges into the same place, and being examined as before, he no whit abated, but increased in his constancy. Whereupon sentence was given upon him to have his hand cut off, and his body scorched to death, and after to be hanged up. So the day following, being Wednesday, he was brought out of prison to the townhall, standing in the market-place, all things being prepared there for the execution. The hangman went into the hall, and with a cord tied his hands, and came out leading him thereby. As soon as Whitman was out of the house, he made such haste, and as it were ran to the place of execution, so that he drew the hangman after him. There was a post set up with spars from the top thereof, a slope, down to the ground, in the manner of a tent, to the intent that he should be only scorched to death, and not burned. When he was come to the place, the hangman commanded him to lay down his right hand upon a block, which he immediately with a hatchet smote off: the good man still continuing constant, the hangman stepped behind him, and bid him put out his tongue, through which he thrust a long instrument like a packing-needle, and so let it stick. Then the judges, standing by in the common-hall, read again his crime and sentence. Whereunto he could make no answer, his tongue hanging out of his head: then he was stripped to his waistcoat, and put within his tent, and made fast with two chains, and fire was put round about, which broiled and scorched his body most miserably, till he was quite black, he not being seen, but heard to make a noise within the tent. When he was dead, he was carried out to be hanged upon a gibbet near the town.

ALTHOUGH there be innumerable gifts and benefits of Almighty God, whereof every one would wonderfully comfort any person, on whom it should please his goodness to bestow it; yet is none of them either separated by itself, or joined with any other, or yet all mingled together, to be companied to this one, That it hath pleased God of his mercy to deliver this realm, our country, from the tyranny of malicious Mary, and to commit it to the government of virtuous Elizabeth. For if a man had all the treasure of Solomon, and might not be suffered to have the use thereof, in what better case was he than miserable Tantalus, over whose head the apples continually hung, yet being starved with hunger he could never touch them? If a man had as strong a body as Sampson had, and besides, were as whole as a fish, as the proverb is, yet if he were kept in bands, what should it avail him? Yea, rather, if it be well considered, it is a hurt to him, if continuance of torment and pains may be a hurt.

If a man had as many children as Gideon the judge had, and might not be so suffered to bring them up in the fear of God, and good manners and knowledge, had he not been more happy without them, than to have them? If a man had as much knowledge of God as St. Paul had, and durst not profess it openly with his mouth, as he is commanded, but for fear of death should declare the contrary, slander the word of God, and deny Christ, which is forbidden, should it not rather be a furtherance to his damnation than otherwise?

And to be short, if any man had all these gifts together, or generally all the gifts of fortune, the body, the mind, and of grace, yet if he might not have the use of them, what should they profit him? Verily nothing at all. For felicity is not in having, but in using; not in possessing, but in occupying; not in knowledge, but in doing.

But alas, our natural mother England, which hath been counted the surest, the richest, and of late the most godly nation of the earth, hath been these whole five years most violently by tyrants forced to want the use of all the gifts and benefits wherewith God and nature hath indued her. Her natural and loving children would not be suffered to enjoy their right inheritance, whereby they might relieve and succour her or themselves; but whatsoever they had, was either by open force, or by crafty dealing pulled from them. And surely this had been tolerable, if none other mischief had been therewith intended.

He is a gentle thief (if thieves may be counted gentle) that only robbeth a man of his goods, and refraineth violent hands from his person. For such loss, with labour and diligence, may be recovered. He may be called a merciful murderer, that only killeth the aged parents, and useth no force on the children.

Nature hath made all men mortal, and that in like space; and to kill the parents, is as it were a prevention of a short time, if it were to the uttermost enjoyed. But these tyrants were more ungentle than common thieves, more devoid of mercy than common murderers. For they were contented not only to have the goods of the people, but they would have it delivered to them by the owners' own hands, that it might be said to the world they gave with their heart; and they were not therewith pleased, but they would have their lives, that they should not betray them; and yet herewith they were not satisfied, but they meant to root out the whole progeny and nation of Englishmen, that none should be left to revenge and cry out on their extremities, and to bring our country into the Spaniards' dominion.

It is an horrible cruelty for one brother to kill another, much more horrible for children to lay violent and murdering hands on their parents, but most horrible of all to murder the children in the sight of their parents, or the parents in the sight of their children, as these most cruel tormentors have done.

But what do I stand in these things which have some defence, because the Turks perchance used so to do, and heathens kill one another, to make sacrifice of men to their fantastical gods?

It was not enough for these unnatural English tormentors, tyrants, and false christians, to be the lords of the goods, possessions, and bodies of their brethren and countrymen; but being very Antichrists, and enemies of Christ's cross, they would be gods, and reign in the consciences and souls of men. Every man, woman, and child, must deny Christ in word openly; abhor Christ in their deeds; slander his gospel with word and deed; worship and honour false gods, as they would have them, and themselves did; and so give body and soul to the devil their master; or secretly fly; or after inward torments be burned openly. O cruelty! cruelty! far exceeding all cruelties committed by those ancient and famous tyrants and cruel murderers, Pharaoh, Herod, Caligula, Nero, Domitian, Maximine, Dioclesian, and Decius, whose names, for their cruel persecution of the people of God, and their own tyranny practised on the people, have been, are, and ever shall be, in perpetual hatred, and their souls in continual torment in hell. If any man would take upon him to set forth particularly all the acts that have been done these full five years, by this unnatural woman, (no, no woman, but a monster, and the devil of hell, covered with the shape of a woman) as it is most necessary, for the glory of God, and the profit of his church and this realm, it should be done; he shall find it a matter sufficient for a perfect great history, and not to be contained in an oration, to be uttered at one time by the voice of one man; but to comprehend the sum of all their wickedness in few words, behold, whatsoever malice in mischief, covetousness in spoil, cruelty in punishing, tyranny in destruction, could do, that all this poor English nation this full five years suffered already, or should have suffered, had not the great mercy of God prevented it.

And albeit there have been many that have hazarded and lost their lives to shake off this most rough brake, (wherewith this viragin, rather than virgin, as she would be called and taken, boasted herself to be sent of God, to ride and tame the people of England) albeit there have been many that have gone about to loose their brethren out of the yoke of this most miserable captivity, and albeit some have proved to break the bands of this most cruel tyranny, yet could they never bring to pass that which they so earnestly laboured, and so manifestly attempted.

And it is not to be wondered, let the papists boast thereof what it pleaseth them. For Almighty God being a most righteous governor, punishing evil, and rewarding good, could not of his justice suffer his scourge so soon to be taken from this our land, if he meant the salvation of the people, as most manifestly it appeareth he did. For having once given to this realm the greatest jewel that might be, that is, the free use of his lovely word (which, if they had embraced and followed it, would have reformed all disorders and sins for which his wrath was kindled and provoked) the people nothing regarded it, but either utterly contemned it, or abused it; and many made it a cloak and colour to cover their mischief. So that if he should suddenly have withdrawn this plague, (as tyrants and evil governors be the plague of God) they would never have passed on his justice, nor yet should they have felt the sweetness of his mercy. For commonly the people regard but things present, and neither remember things past, nor yet pass on things to come, unless they be warned by exceeding extremities.

Besides this, it is most evident, that he had determined to make this noble conquest alone with his own hand and mighty power, and would not that it should be done by man, lest man should impute any part of the glory of this victory to his own strength, or to his own policy, or that fortune should seem to bear any stroke in so glorious a conquest, and so be partaker, in men's opinions, of the triumph so worthy.

Neither did this almighty power work this when man would have it dispatched, that is, as soon as the enemy began to gather their force; for it is not so great a victory to discomfit a few dispersed people, as it is to destroy a perfectly united army; but he suffered them to make their force as great as was possible, to work whatsoever mischiefs by smile, banishment, imprisonment, hanging, heading, burning, or otherwise could be imagined.

Neither would this most provident wisdom do it out of season: but as the good husbandman doth not crop his tree, till he hath rendered his fruit; so would he not root out these pestilent tyrants, till the most profit might be taken thereof.

When he had given sufficient leisure to all kind of men to declare themselves who were crocodiles, sometime lying in water, sometime on land, that is, both gospellers and papists; who were sponges, suspected whether they had life or not life, whether they were christians or epicures; who were camelions, that could turn themselves into all colours, with protestants, protestants; with papists, papists; with Spaniards, Spaniards; with Englishmen, Englishmen; who were Gnathos, that could apply themselves to every man's appetite that was in authority: who were marigolds, that followed Mary's mad affections; who were weather-cocks, that did turn with every wind; who were mastives, that could bite and bark not; who were curs, ever barking; who were foxes, that would promise much, and perform nothing; who could bind themselves with many oaths, and do clean contrary; who were Cains, that sought the innocent Abels' deaths; who were the wolves that worried the lambs; and finally when he had suffered the spiritual shavelings to spue out their venom, and every man plainly to declare outwardly what he was inwardly; then doth he work this most victorious conquest. And with his works he seemeth plainly to say thus unto us: Ye see, my people, what I have done for you, not for your sakes, which nothing regarded the benefits that I most plentifully poured on you, and have deserved most grievous punishment for your unthankfulness; but of mine infinite mercy, and for my glory's sake, which I will have opened to all the world in these latter days, to the fear of evil doers, and to the comfort of the well doers. Provoke no more my wrath: ye see what will follow it: be hereafter more prudent and wise than ye were before: ye may, if ye will, be more circumspect in time to come, than ye have been in the time past: ye may, if ye list, put me to less trouble, and keep yourselves in more safety. I have not only discovered mine, your's, and my land of England's enemies, and all the crafts, subtilties, and policies that have been or may be used by them, or any like hereafter, but I have also taken away their head and captain, and destroyed a great number of them, that ye should not be troubled with them, and some of them have I left, that ye may make them spectacles and examples, to the terror and fear of their posterity. Love me, and I will love you: seek my honour and glory, and I will work your commodity and safety: walk in my ways and commandments, and I will be with you for ever. Surely, if we consider the wonderful mercy that it hath pleased God to use towards us, in the delivering of the realm and us his people, out of the hands of those most cruel tyrants, as we cannot but do, unless we will declare declare ourselves to be the most unthankful people that ever lived, we must needs judge it not only worthy to be compared, but also far to exceed the deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt from the tyranny of Pharaoh, and from the powers of Holofernes and Senacherib. For it is not read that either Pharaoh or the other two sought any other thing, than to be the lords of the goods and bodies of the Israelites; they forced them not to commit adultery, and to serve false gods, as these English tyrants did.

But, besides, if we will note the wonderful works of God in handling this matter, we shall well perceive, that far much more is wrought to his glory, and to the profit of his church and people, than perchance all men at the first do see. For he hath not only dispatched the realm of the chief personages and head of these tyrants, but also, as it were declareth, that he minded not that either they or their doings should continue. For albeit that all acts, done by tyrants tyrannously be by all laws, reason and equity, of no force; yet because no disputation should follow on this, what is tyrannously done, and what is not tyrannously done, he hath provided that this question needeth not to come in question. For he utterly blinded their eyes, and suffered them to build on false grounds, which can no longer stand than they are propped up with rope, sword, and faggot. For her first parliament, whereon they grounded and wrought a great part of their tyranny, and wherein they meant to overthrow whatsoever king Edward had for the advancement of God's glory brought to pass, was of no force or authority. For she perceiving that her enemies' stomach could not be emptied, nor her malice spued on the people by any good order, she committeth a great disorder. She by force and violence taketh from the commons their liberty, that, according to the ancient laws and customs of the realm, they could not have their free election of knights and burgesses for the parliament. For she well knew, that if either christian men, or true Englishmen, should be elected, it was not possible for that to succeed which she intended. And, therefore, in many places divers were chosen by force of her threats, meet to serve her malicious affections. Wherefore that parliament was no parliament, but may be justly called a conspiracy of tyrants and traitors: for the greater part, by whose authority and voices things proceeded in that court, by their acts most manifestly declared themselves so: the rest both christians and true Englishmen, although they had good wills, yet were not able to resist or prevail against the multitude of voices and suffrages of so many evil, false to God, and enemies to their country. Also divers burgesses being orderly chosen, and lawfully returned, (as in some places the people did what they could to resist her purposes) were disorderly and unlawfully put out, and others without any order of law put in their places. Doctor Taylor, bishop of Lincoln, a christian bishop and a true Englishman, being lawfully and orderly called to the parliament, and placed in the lords' house in his degree, was in his robes by violence thrust out of the house. Alexander Nowell, with two others, all three being burgesses for divers shires, and christian men and true Englishmen, and lawfully chosen, returned, and admitted, were by force put out of the house of commons: for which cause, the said parliament is also void, as by a president of the parliament holden at Coventry in the 38th year of king Henry the sixth, it most manifestly appeareth. And the third parliament, called in the name of her husband, and of her evil grace, wherein they would have undone what her noble father and the realm had brought to pass for the restitution of the liberty of the realm, and for extinguishment of the usurped authority of the bishop of Rome, is also void, and of none authority. For that the title and stile of the supreme head of the church of England, which by a statute made in the 35th year of the reign of the said king Henry, was ordained that it should be united and annexed for ever to the imperial crown of this realm, was omitted in the writs of summoning. Wherefore as a woman can bring forth no child without a man, so cannot those writs bring forth good and sure fruit, because this part of the title, which was ordained by the parliament for the form to be always used in the king's stile, was left out. For greater error is in lack of form, than in lack of matter. And where the foundation is bad, there can nothing built thereon be good. There is no law, spiritual or temporal, (as they term them) nor any good reason, but allow these rules for infallible principles. And if any man will say, that it was not in the free choice, liberty, and pleasure of the king of this realm, and the queen, whether they would express the said title in their stile or not, as that subtle serpent, Gardiner, being chancellor of the realm, and traiterously sending out the writs of parliament without the same stile, perceiving he had overshot himself in calling the parliament, and having committed many horrible murders and most mischievous acts, would have excused it, as appears by a piece of a statute made in the same parliament, in the eighth chapter, and two-and-twentieth leaf, it may be justly and truly answered, that they could not so do. For although every person may by law renounce his own private right, yet may he not renounce his right in that which toucheth the commonwealth, or a third person.

And this title and stile more touched the commonwealth of England, than the king. For, as I said before, it was ordained for the conservation of the liberty of the whole realm, and to exclude the usurped authority of the bishop of Rome. And therefore no king nor queen alone could renounce such title: but it ought (if they would have it taken away) to be taken away orderly and formally by act of parliament, sufficiently called and summoned. For the natural and right way to loose and undo things, is to dissolve them by that means they were ordained. And so it most manifestly appeareth, that all their doings, from the beginning to the end, were and be of none effect, or authority: but all that they have done, hath been mere tyranny. O most marvellous providence of Almighty God, that always, and in all things, doth what is best for the wealth of his people! O most mighty Power, that so suddenly overwhelmeth the counsels of the wicked, and bringeth their devices to naught! O infinite Mercy, that so gently dealeth with his people, that he saveth them whom he might most justly destroy! O most joyful, most glorious, and never-to-be-forgotten Hope-Wednesday, in which it hath pleased thee, O God, to deliver thy church, this realm, and thy people from so horrible a tyranny! No tongue can express, no pen can indite, no eloquence can worthily set out, much less exornate these thy marvellous doings. No, no heart is able to render unto thy goodness sufficient thanks for the benefits we have received. Who could ever have hoped for this most joyful time? Yea, who did not look rather for thy most sharp visitation, and utter destruction of this realm, as of Sodom, Gomorrah, and Jerusalem.

But we see and feel, good Lord, that thy mercy is greater than all men's sins, and far above all thy works. And albeit, there is no christian, and natural Englishman, woman or child, either present or that shall succeed us, who is not, or shall not be partaker of this most exceeding mercy and wonderful benefit of Almighty God; and therefore is bound continually to praise and thank him: yet, there is not one creature that is more bound so to do, than you, noble queen Elizabeth. For in this horrible tyranny and most cruel persecution, your grace hath been more hunted for, than any other. Divers times they have taken you; sometimes they have had you in strong hold, secluded from all liberty; sometimes at liberty, but not out of the custody of cruel gaolers; and many times they determined, that without justice ye should be privily murdered. They thought, if your grace had been suppressed, they should have fully prevailed: if you had been destroyed, their doings for ever should be established: if you had been taken out of the way, there were none left that would or could undo what they had had ordained. But he that sitteth on high, and laugheth at their madnes, would not suffer that the malicious purposes, and most cruel devised injustice should have success. He took upon him the protection of you. He only hath been our Jeoseba, that preserved you from this wicked Athalia. He only was the Joiada that destroyed this cruel Athalia. He only hath made you queen of this realm, instead of this mischievous Marana. No earthly creature, therefore, can claim the smallest merit: no man's force, no man's counsel, no man's aid, hath been the cause thereof. Therefore, the greater his benefits have been toward you, the more are you bound to seek his glory, and to set forth his honour. You see his power, what he is able to do; he alone can save, and he can destroy; he can pull down, and he can set up: If you fear him, and seek to do his will, then will he favour you, and preserve you to the end from all enemies, as he did king David. If you now fall from him, or juggle with him, look for no more favour than Saul hath shewed to him. But I have a good hope, that both his justice and benefits be so printed in your heart, that you will never forget them, but seek by all means to have the one, and to fear to fall into the other. I trust also, your wisdom will not only consider the causes of this late most sharp visitation, but also to your uttermost power endeavour to out-root them.

And forasmuch as besides this infinite mercy poured on your grace, it hath pleased his divine providence to constitute your highness to be our Deborah, to be the governess and head of the body of this realm, to have the charge and cure thereof, it is requisite above all things, as well for his glory and honour, as for your discharge, quietness and safety, to labour that the same body now at the first be cleansed, made whole, and then kept in good order. For, if the body of man be corrupted and diseased, he is not able to manage his things at home, much less to do any thing abroad: so if the body of the realm be corrupt and out of order, it shall neither be able to do any thing abroad, if necessity should require, nor yet prosper in itself. But this may not be done with piecing and patching, cobbling and botching, as was used in time past, whilst your most noble father and brother reigned. For, if a man cut off one head of the serpent Hydra, and destroy not the whole body, many will grow instead of that one; and as in a corrupt body that hath many diseases, if the physician should labour to heal one part, and not the whole, it will in short time break out afresh: so, unless the body of a realm, or commonwealth, be clean purged from corruption, all the particular laws and statutes that can be devised shall not profit it.

We need no foreign examples to prove it: look upon this realm itself, it will plainly declare it. And as it is not enough to cleanse the body from its corruption, but there must be also preservatives ministered to keep it from putrefaction; for naturally of itself it is disposed to putrify: so, after the body of a realm is purged, unless there be godly ordinances for the preservation thereof ordained, and duly ministered, it will return to the old state. For this body, which is the people, is universally naturally disposed to evil; and without compulsion will hardly do what is their duty.

Thus must your grace do, if you mind the advancement of God's glory, your own quietness and safety, and the wealth of this your politic body. And they be not hard to bring to pass, where good-will will vouchsafe to take to her a little pain. The realm will soon be purged, if vice and self-love be utterly condemned. It will be in good state preserved, if these three things—God's word truly taught and preached, youth well brought up in godly and honest exercises, and justice rightly ministered, may be perfectly constituted. And without this foundation, let men imagine what it pleaseth them, the spiritual house of God shall never be well framed or builded, nor the public state of your realm well ordered. For in what body God's word lacketh, the unity and charity that ought to be among the members thereof, and which knitteth them together, is soon extinguished. Where the youth is neglected, there can no good success be hoped; no more than the husbandman can look for a good crop where he sowed no seed. And where justice is not truly and rightly ministered, there the more laws and statutes be heaped together, the more they be contemned. And surely, if this thing could not without exceeding charges be compassed, (and God forbid that charges should be weighed, be they ever so great, where God's glory and the wealth of the realm may be furthered) yet ought it not to be neglected. What charges did David, and Solomon his son, employ to build the stony house of God? How much more charges should a christian prince employ to build and set up the lively house of God? But verily, I am fully persuaded that it shall not be chargeable to do this. No, a great deal of superfluous charges, which otherwise your grace shall be forced to sustain, shall thus be clean cut away, and so your revenues, by means most profitable, and to no good person hurtful, increased.

Therefore, for God's sake, noble queen, let not the opportunity, now by God offered, be by your grace omitted. A physician can in nothing so much declare his good will and cunning, nor purchase himself so great estimation, as when he findeth his patient thoroughly sick and weakened, and doth restore him to his perfect health and perfection. Likewise, if a prince should desire of God, a thing whereby he might declare the zeal that he beareth to God, or whereby he might win fame and glory, he could desire nothing so much, as to come into a state corrupted, as this realm of England at present is, not to destroy it, as did Cæsar, but to make it, as did Romulus.

If your grace can bring this to pass, (and I am out of all doubt you may quickly) you shall do more than any of your progenitors did before you. All men shall confess, that you are not only for proximity of blood preferred, but rather of God specially sent and ordained. And as the queen of Sheba came from far off to see the glory of king Solomon, a woman to a man, even so shall the princes of our time come, men to a woman, and kings marvel at the virtue of queen Elizabeth. Thus shall we, your subjects, be most bound to praise God, and to think ourselves most happy, that coming so suddenly from the worse, be forthwith preferred to the best, rid from extremest calamity, and brought to the greatest felicity; and it shall be, besides, an example for all evil princes, to leave their persecution of Christ and his members, to cease from their tyranny, wherewith they continually oppress their poor subjects: And so all people, not only we of this your realm, but of all other nations, shall have just cause to pray for your grace's health, and increase of honour.

This oration of Mr. Hales being premised, now let us prosecute the disputation between the papists and protestants at Westminster. The copy whereof here followeth.

The Conference or Disputation, had and begun at Westminster the last Day of March, upon certain Questions or Articles of Religion proposed, and also of the breaking up of the same, by the Papists' Default, at the First Beginning of Queen ELIZABETH.

SO it pleaseth the queen's most excellent majesty, having heard of the diversity of opinions in certain matters of religion amongst sundry of her loving subjects, and being very desirous to have the same reduced to some godly and christian concord, (by the advice of the lords, and others of the privy council, as well for the satisfaction of persons doubtful, as also for the knowledge of the very truth in certain matters of difference) to have a convenient chosen number of the best learned of either part, and to confer together their opinions and reasons, and thereby to come to some good and charitable agreement. And hereupon, by her majesty's commandment, certain of her privy council declared this purpose to the archbishop of York (being also one of the same privy council), and required him that that he would impart the same to some of the bishops, and to make choice of eight, nine, or ten of them, and that there should be the like number named of the other part. And further also they declared to him (as then was supposed) what the matter should be. And as for the time, it was thought meet to be as soon as possible might be agreed upon. And then, after certain days past, it was signified by the said archbishop, that there were appointed, by such of the bishops to whom he had imparted this matter, nine persons, that is to say, five bishops and four doctors. The names of whom here follow underwritten:

The Papiſts.

The bishop of Winchester.	Dr. Cole.
The bishop of Litchfield.	Dr. Harpsfield.
The bishop of Chester.	Dr. Langdale.
The bishop of Carlisle.	Dr. Chedsey.
The bishop of Lincoln.

The Protestants.

Dr. Scory, bishop of	Mr. Horne.
Chichester.	Mr. Sands.
Dr. Coxe.	Mr. Gest.
Mr. Whitehead.	Mr. Aelmer.
Mr. Grindall.	Mr. Jewell.

These were content, at the queen's command, to shew their opinions, and, as the said archbishop termed it, render account of their faith in those matters which were mentioned, and that especially in writing, although he said, he thought the same so determined; as there was no cause to dispute upon them. The matter they were to talk upon, was comprehended in these three propositions hereunder specified:

1. It is against the word of God; and the custom of the ancient church, to use a tongue unknown to the people, in common prayer, and the administration of the sacraments.
2. Every church hath authority to appoint; take away, and change ceremonies and ecclesiastical rites so the same be to edification.
3. It cannot be proved by the word of God, that there is in the mass offered up a sacrifice propitiatory for the quick and the dead,

It was hereupon fully resolved by the queen's majesty, with the advice aforesaid, that according to their desire, it should be in writing on both parts, for avoiding of much altercation in words; and that the said bishops would, because they were in authority of degree superior, first declare their opinions in the matter, with their reasons in writing. And the other number, being also nine men of good degree in schools, and some having been in dignity in the church of England, if they had any thing to say to the contrary, should the same day declare their opinions in like manner, and so each of them should deliver their writings to the other, to be considered what were to be improved therein, and the same to declare again in writing at some other convenient day, and the like order to be kept in all the rest of the matters. All this was fully agreed upon with the archbishop of York, and so also signified to both parties.

And immediately hereupon, divers of the nobility and states of the realm understanding that such a meeting and conference was intended, concerning such matters as were to be confirmed by parliament according to the decision of these learned doctors; they petitioned her majesty that the parties of this conference might be put to read their assertions in the English tongue, and that in the presence of them, of the nobility, and others of her parliament-house, for the better satisfaction, and enabling of their own judgments, to treat and conclude of such laws as might depend hereupon.

This, also, being thought very reasonable, was signified to both parties, and fully agreed upon, and the day appointed for the first meeting to be on Friday in No. 60.

the forenoon, being the last day of March, at Westminster church. Where were present by the queen's command, the lords and others of the privy council, and a great part of the nobility, both to honour and see good order in the conference. And notwithstanding this former order appointed, and consented unto by both parties, yet the bishop of Winchester and his colleagues alledged they had mistaken that their assertions and reasons should be written, and so only recited out of the book saying, their book was not then ready written, but they were ready to argue and dispute, and therefore they would for that time repeat in speech, that which they had to say to the first probation.

This variation from the former order, and especially from that which themselves had by the said archbishop in writing before required, adding thereto the reason of the apostle, that to contend with words is profitable to nothing, but to the subversion of the hearer, seemed to the queen's council somewhat strange, and yet was it permitted without any great reprehension, because they excused themselves with mistaking the order, and agreed that they would not fail but put it in writing, and, according to the former order, deliver it to the other part; and so the said bishop of Winchester and his colleagues, appointed doctor Cole, dean of St. Paul's, to be the utterer of their minds; who partly by speech only, and partly by reading of written authorities and at certain times being informed by his colleagues what to say, made a declaration of their meanings and their reasons to their first proposition: which being ended, they were asked by the privy council if any of them had any more to say, and they said, No. So as the other part was licenced to shew their minds, which they did according to the first order, exhibiting all that which they meant to be propounded, in a book written, which, after a prayer and invocation, made most humbly to Almighty God for the enduing of them with his Holy Spirit, and a protestation also to stand to the doctrine of the catholic church built upon the scriptures, and the doctrine of the prophets and the apostles, was distinctly read by one Robert Horne, bachelor of divinity, late dean of Durham, and after bishop of Winchester. The copy of which their protestation here followeth, according as it was by him penned and exhibited, with their preface also before the same.

The PROTESTATION.

FORASMUCH as it is thought good unto the queen's most excellent majesty (unto whom in the Lord all obedience is due) that we should declare our judgment in writing upon certain propositions; we, as becometh us to do herein, most gladly obey.

Seeing that Christ is our only Master, whom the Father hath commanded us to hear; and seeing also his word is the truth, from which it is not lawful for us to depart, no not one hair's breath, and against which (as the apostle saith) we can do nothing; we do in all things submit ourselves unto this truth, and do protest that we will affirm nothing against the same.

And forasmuch as we have for our mother the true and catholic church of Christ, which is grounded upon the doctrine of the apostles and prophets, and is of Christ the head in all things governed; we do reverence her judgment, we obey her authority as becometh children; and we do devoutly profess, and in all points follow the faith which is contained in the three creeds, that is to say, of the apostles, of the council of Nice, and of Athanasius.

And seeing that we never departed, neither from the doctrine of God which is contained in the holy canonical scriptures, nor yet from the faith of the true and catholic church of Christ; but have preached truly the word of God, and have sincerely ministered the sacraments according to the institution of Christ, unto which our doctrine and faith the most part also of our adversaries did subscribe not many years past (although now as unnatural they are revolted from the same), we desire that they render account of their backsliding, and shew some cause wherefore they do not only resist that doctrine which they have before professed, but also persecute the same by all means they can. We do not doubt, but through the equity of the queen's most excellent majesty, we shall in these disputations be treated more gently than in years late past, when we were handled most unjustly and scantily after the common manner of men: As for the judgment of the whole controversy, we refer unto the most holy scriptures, and the catholic church of Christ (whose judgment unto us ought to be most sacred): notwithstanding by the catholic church we understand not the Romish church, whereunto our adversaries attribute such reverence, but that which St. Augustine and other fathers affirm, ought to be sought in the holy scriptures, and which is governed and led by the Spirit of Christ.

It is against the word of God, and the custom of the primitive church, to use a tongue unknown to the people in common prayers and administration of the sacraments.

By these words (the word of God) we mean only the written word of God, or canonical scriptures.

And by the custom of the primitive church, we mean the order most generally used in the church for the space of 500 years after Christ, in which times there lived the most notable fathers, as Justin, Ireneus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Basil, Chrysostom, Hierom, Ambrose, Augustine, &c.

This assertion above written hath two parts. First, That the use of the tongue not understood of the people, in common prayers of the church, or in the administration of the sacraments, is against God's word.

The second, That the same is against the use of the primitive church.

The first part is most manifestly proved by the fourteenth chapter of the Epistle to the Corinthians, almost throughout the whole chapter. In which chapter St. Paul treateth of this matter Ex professo, purposely. And although some do cavil that St. Paul speaketh not in that chapter of praying, but of preaching, yet is it most evident to any indifferent reader of understanding, and appeareth also by the exposition of the best writers, that he plainly there speaketh not only of preaching and prophesying, but also of prayer and thanksgiving, and generally of all other public actions, which require any speech in the church or congregation. For of praying he saith, I will pray with my spirit, and I will pray with my mind; and of thanksgiving (which is a kind of prayer) thou givest thanks well, but the other is not edified. And how shall he which occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen to thy giving of thanks, when he understandeth not what thou sayest? and in the end descending from particulars to a general proposition, concludeth, that all things ought to be done to edification. Thus much is clear by the words of St. Paul, and the ancient doctors, Ambrose, Augustine, Hierom, and others, do so understand this chapter, as it shall appear by their testimonies which shall follow afterward.

Upon this chapter of St. Paul we gather these reasons following.

First, All things done in the church or congregation ought so to be done as they may edify the same.

But the use of an unknown tongue, in public prayer or administration of sacraments, doth not edify the congregation.

Therefore the use of an unknown tongue, in public prayer or administration of sacraments, is not to be had in the church.

The first part of this reasoning is grounded upon St. Paul's words, commanding all things to be done to edification.

The second part is also proved by St. Paul's plain words. First by this similitude, If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall be prepared for battle? Even so likewise when you speak with tongues, except you speak words that have signification, how shall it be understood what is spoken? For you shall but speak in the air, that is to say, in vain, and consequently without edifying.

And afterward in the same chapter he saith, how can he that occupieth the place of the unlearned, say Amen, at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest? For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified.

These are St. Paul's words, plainly proving, that a tongue not understood, doth not edify. And therefore both the parts of the reason thus proved by St. Paul, the conclusion followeth necessarily.

Secondly, Nothing is to be spoken in the congregation in an unknown tongue, except it be interpreted to the people, that it may be understood. For saith St. Paul, if there be no interpreter to him that speaketh in an unknown tongue, let him hold his tongue in the church. And therefore the common prayers and administration of sacraments, neither done in a known tongue, nor interpreted, are against the commandment of Paul, and not to be used.

The minister in prayer or administration of the sacraments, using language not understood by the hearers, is to them barbarous, and alien, which by St. Paul is counted a great absurdity.

It is not to be counted by a christian common prayer, where the people present declare not their assent unto it by saying Amen, wherein is implied all other words of assent.

But St. Paul affirmeth, that the people cannot declare their assent in saying Amen, except they understand what is said, as before.

Therefore it is no christian common prayer where the people understand not what is said.

Paul would not suffer in his time a strange tongue to be heard in the common prayer in the church, notwithstanding that such a kind of speech was then a miracle, and a singular gift of the Holy Ghost, whereby infidels might be persuaded and brought to the faith; much less is it to be suffered now amongst christian and faithful men, especially being no miracle nor especial gift of the Holy Ghost.

Some will peradventure answer, that to use any kind of tongue, in common prayer or administration of sacraments, is a thing indifferent.

But St. Paul says to the contrary. For he commandeth all things to be done to edification; he commandeth to keep silence if there be no interpreter, and in the end of the chapter he concludeth thus: If any man be spiritual or a prophet, let him know that the things which I write, are the commandments of the Lord. And so shortly to conclude, the use of a strange tongue, in prayer and administration, is against the word and commandment of God.

To these reasons, grounded upon St. Paul's words, which are the most firm foundation for this assertion, divers other reasons may be joined, gathered out of the scriptures and otherwise.

In the Old Testament all things pertaining to the public prayer, benedictions, thanksgivings, or sacrifices, were always in their vulgar and natural tongue. In the second book of Chronicles, chap. 29, it is written, That Ezechias commanded the Levites to praise God with the Psalms of David, and Asaph the prophet; which doubtless were written in Hebrew, their vulgar tongue. If they did so in the shadows of the law, much more ought we to do the like, who (as Christ saith) must pray in spirit and in truth.

The final end of our prayer (as David saith) is, "That the people assembled together, may declare the name of the Lord in Sion, and his praise in Jerusalem."

But the name and praises of God cannot be set forth to the people, unless it be done in such a tongue as they may understand, therefore common prayer must be had in the vulgar tongue.

The definition of public prayer out of the words of St. Paul, is, That common prayer is to lift up our common desires to God with our minds, and to testify the same outwardly with our tongues, which definition is approved by St. Augustine.

The ministration of the Lord's supper and baptism are, as it were, sermons of the death and resurrection of Christ.

But sermons to the people must be had in such language guage as the people may perceive, otherwise they would be had in vain.

It is not lawful for a christian man to abuse the gifts of God: but he that prayeth in the church in a strange tongue, abuseth the gifts of God. For the tongue serveth only to expresse the mind of the speaker to the hearer. And Augustine saith, in his Christian Doctrine, book 4, chap. x. There is no cause why we should speak, if they for whose cause we speak, understand not our speaking.

The heathen and barbarous nations of all countries and sorts of men, were they ever so wild, evermore made their prayers and sacrifices to their gods in their own mother tongue; which is a manifest declaration that it is the very light and voice of nature.

Thus much upon the ground of St. Paul and other reasons out of the scriptures, joining therewith the common usage of all nations, as a testimony of the law of nature.

Now for the second part of the assertion, which is, that the use of a strange tongue in public prayer and administration of the sacraments, is against the custom of the primitive church; it is a matter so clear, that the denial of it must needs proceed either from great ignorance, or else from wilful malice.

For first of all, Justin Martyr describing the order of the communion in his time, saith thus: Upon the Sunday, assemblies are made both of the citizens and country men, whereat the writings of the apostles and of the prophets are read, as much as may be. Afterwards, when the reader doth cease, the head minister giveth an exhortation, exhorting them to follow such honest things. After this we rise all together and offer prayers, which being ended (as we have said), bread and water are brought forth. Then the head minister offereth prayers and thanksgiving, as much as he can, and the people answer, Amen.

These words of Justin, who lived about 160 years after Christ, considered with their circumstances, declare plainly, that not only the scriptures were read, but also that the prayers and administration of the Lord's supper were done in a tongue understood.

The liturgies both of Basil and Chrysostom declare, that in the celebration of the communion, the people were appointed to answer to the prayer of the minister, sometimes Amen, sometimes, Lord have mercy upon us, sometimes, And with thy Spirit, and, We have our hearts lifted up unto the Lord, &c. Which answers they could not have made in due time, if the prayer had not been made in a tongue understood.

And for further proof, let us hear what Basil writeth in this matter to the clerks of Neocæsaria. As touching that is laid to our charge in psalmodes and songs, where-with our slanderers do fray the simple, I have thus to say, that our customs and usages in all churches be uniform and agreeable.

For in the night the people with us riseth, goeth to the house of prayer, and in travail, tribulation, and continual tears, they confess themselves to God, and at the last rising again, go to their songs or psalmody, where being divided into two parts, they sing by course together, both deeply weighing and confirming the matter of the heavenly sayings, and also stirring up their attention and devotion of heart, which by other means be alienated and plucked away. Then appointing one to begin the song, the rest follow, and so with divers songs and prayers passing over the night, at the dawning of the day, all together, even as it were with one mouth and one heart, they sing unto the Lord a song of confession, every man framing to himself meet words of repentance.

If you will fly us from henceforth for these things, you must fly also the Egyptians, and both Libians, you must eschew the Thebans, Palestines, Arabians, the Phœnicians, the Syrians, and all those with whom watchings, prayers, and common singing of psalms, are had in honour.

Testimonies of St. AMBROSE, written upon the 14th Chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians.

THIS is it that he saith; because he who speaketh in an unknown tongue, speaketh to God. For he knoweth all things, but men know not, and therefore there is no profit of this thing.

The same author afterwards upon these words, If thou blest or give thanks with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned, say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest? That is (saith Ambrose), if thou speak the praise of God in a tongue unknown to the hearers. For the unlearned, hearing that which he understandeth not, knoweth not the end of the prayer, and he answereth not Amen. That is as much as to say, (true) that the blessing or thanksgiving may be confirmed. For the confirmation of the prayer is fulfilled by them which do answer Amen. That all things spoken might be confirmed in the minds of the hearers, through the testimony of the truth.

Afterward, in the same place, upon these words, If any infidel or unlearned come in.

For when he understandeth, and is understood, hearing God to be praised and Christ to be worshipped, he seeth perfectly that the religion is true, and to be revered, wherein he seeth nothing to be done colourably, nothing in darkness, as among the heathen, whose eyes are covered, that they seeing not the things which they call holy, might perceive themselves to be deluded with divers vanities. For all falsehood seeketh darkness, and sheweth false things for true. Therefore with us nothing is done privily, nothing covertly, but one God is simply praised, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus, by whom are all things. For if there be none which can understand, or of whom he can be tried, he may say, there is some deceit and vanity, which is therefore sung in tongues (not understood, he meaneth) because it is a shame to open it.

Upon this place, Let all things be done to edify.

This is the conclusion, that nothing should be done in the church in vain, and that this thing ought chiefly to be laboured for, that the unlearned also might profit, lest any part of the body should be dark through ignorance.

Again, if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church.

That is, let him pray secretly, or speak to God within himself, who heareth all dumb things: for in the church he ought to speak that which may profit all men.

Testimonies out of Saint HIEROM, upon the aforesaid place of St. PAUL.

IT is the lay-man, saith he, whom Paul here understandeth to be in the place of the ignorant man, which hath no ecclesiastical office. How shall he answer Amen to the prayer that he understandeth not?

And a little after upon these words, For if I pray in an unknown tongue, &c.

This is Paul's meaning, saith Hierom, if any man speaketh in strange and unknown tongues, his mind is not to himself without fruit and profit, but he is not profited that heareth him.

And in the end of his commentary upon the epistle to the Galatians, he saith thus:

That Amen signifieth the consent of the hearer, and is the sealing of the truth. Paul in the first epistle to the Corinthians teacheth, saying, But if thou shalt blest in spirit, who supplieth the place of the ignorant? How shall he at thy prayer say Amen, seeing he knoweth not what thou sayest? Whereby he declareth that the unlearned man cannot answer, that that which is spoken is true, unless he understand what is said.

The same Hierom saith, in the preface of St. Paul's epistle to the Galatians, that the noise of Amen soundeth in the Roman church like unto an heavenly thunder.

As Hierom compareth this sound of common prayer to thunder, so Basil compareth it to the sound of the sea, in these words, If the sea be fair, how is not the assembly of the congregation much fairer? In which the joined sound of men, women, and children, as it were the waves beating on the shore, is sent forth in our prayers unto our God.

When

When the people once hear these words World without end, they all forthwith answer, Amen.

And the same writer upon the same chapter, upon these words, How shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned, say Amen? Behold again, he applieth the stone unto the square (as the proverb is), requiring the edifying of the congregation in all places. The unlearned he calleth the common people, and sheweth that it is no small discommodity, if they cannot say, Amen.

And again, the same Chrysostom saith, Yea, in prayers you may see the people offer largely, both for the possessed and the penitents. For the priests and the people pray all together commonly, and all one prayer, a prayer full of mercy and pity. And excluding out of the priests' limits all such as cannot be partakers of the holy table, another prayer must be made, and all in one manner lie down upon the earth, and all again after one manner rise up together. Now when the peace is giving, we all in like manner salute one another, and the priest in the reverend mysteries wisheth well to the people, and the people unto him: for [And with thy Spirit] is nothing else but this. All things that belong to the sacrament of thanksgiving, are common to all; but he giveth not thanks alone, but all the people with him.

Hereby it may appear, that not the priest alone communicated nor prayed alone, nor had any peculiar prayer, but such as was common to them all, such as they all understood, and all were able to say with the priest, which could not have been, if he had used a strange tongue in the ministration of the sacraments.

Dionysius, describing the manner of the ministration of the Lord's supper, saith, That hymns were said by the whole multitude of the people.

Cyprian saith, The priest doth prepare the minds of the brethren, with a preface before the prayer, saying, [Lift up your hearts:] that while the people doth answer, [We have our hearts lifted up to the Lord,] they may be admonished that they ought to think of none other thing than of the Lord.

St. Augustine: What this should be we ought to understand, that we may sing with reason of man, not with chattering of birds, for ouzles and popinjays, and ravens, and pies, and other such like birds, are taught by men to prate they know not what. But to sing with understanding, is given by God's holy will to the nature of man.

The same Augustine: There needeth no speech when we pray, saving perhaps as the priests do, to declare their meaning; not that God, but that men may hear them, and so, being put in remembrance by consenting with the priests, may hang upon God.

To these testimonies of the ancient writers, we will join one constitution of Justinian the emperor, who lived 527 years after Christ, which saith, We command that all bishops and priests do celebrate the holy oblation, and the prayers used in holy baptism, not speaking low, but with a clear and loud voice, which may be heard by the people, that thereby the minds of the hearers may be stirred up with greater devotion, in uttering the praises of the Lord God. For so the holy apostle teacheth in his first epistle to the Corinthians, saying, Truly, if thou only blest or give thanks in spirit, how doth he which occupieth the place of the unlearned say, Amen, at the giving of thanks unto God? For he understandeth not what thou sayest. Thou verily givest thanks well, but another is not edified. And again, in the epistle to the Romans he saith, With the heart a man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.

Therefore for these causes it is convenient, that amongst other prayers those things also which are spoken in the holy oblation, be uttered and spoken by the most religious bishops and priests unto our Lord Jesus Christ our God, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, with a loud voice. And let the most religious priests know this, that if they neglect any of these things, neither will the dreadful judgment of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, nor will we, when we know it, rest, and leave it unrevenge.

Out of this constitution of Justinian, the emperor, three things are worthy to be noted.

First, That the common prayer and ministration done with a loud voice, so as they may be heard and understood by the people as a means to stir up devotion in the people, contrary to the common assertion of Eckius and other adversaries, who affirm, that ignorance maketh a great admiration and devotion.

Secondly, That Justinian maketh this matter of not ordering common ministration and prayers, so as it may be understood by the people, not a matter of indifference, but such a thing as must be answered for at the day of judgment.

Thirdly, That this emperor, being a christian emperor, doth not only make constitution of ecclesiastical matters, but also threateneth revenge and sharp punishment to the violaters of the same.

These are sufficient to prove that it is against God's word, and the use of the primitive church, to use a language not understood by the people, in common prayer and ministration of the sacraments. Wherefore it is to be marvelled at, not only how such an untruth and abuse crept at the first into the church, but also how it is maintained so stiffly at this day, and upon what ground these, that will be thought guides and pastors of Christ's church, are so loth to return to the first original of St. Paul's doctrine, and the practice of the primitive catholic church of Christ.

The God of patience and consolation, give us grace to be like minded one towards another in Christ Jesus, that we all agreeing together, may with one mouth praise God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

And the same being ended with some likelihood, as it seemed, that the same was much allowable to the audience; certain of the bishops began to say contrary to their former answer that they had now much more to say to this matter, wherein although they might have been well reprehended for such manner of cavillation; yet for avoiding of any more mistaking of orders in this colloquy or conference, and for that they should utter all that which they had to say, it was both ordered and thus openly agreed upon by both parties in the full audience, that upon the Monday following, the bishops should bring their minds and reasons in writing to the second assertion, and the last also if they could, and first read the same: and that done, the other party should bring likewise their's to the same. And being read, each of them should deliver to the other the same writings. And in the mean time the bishops should put in writing, not only all that which doctor Cole had that day uttered, but all such other matters as they any otherwise could think of for the same: and as soon as they might possibly, to send the same book touching that first assertion to the other part, and they should receive of them that writing which Mr. Horne had there read that day and upon Monday it shall be agreed what day they should exhibit their answers touching the first proposition. Thus both parties assented thereto, and the assembly was quietly dismissed.

The Order of the Second Day's Conversation.

The Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Norfolk, and all the Council being set, the Bishops on the one Side, and the Protestants, that is, the late banished Preachers, on the other side, thus began the Lord Keeper:

MY lord and masters, I am sure ye remember well, what order of debate and writing was appointed to be had this day in this assembly, at our last meeting, which I will not refuse now to repeat again for the shortness of it, which was, that ye appointed that on both sides ye should bring in English writing, what ye had to say say in the second question, and in this place appointed to read the same. Therefore begin, my lords.

Winch. I am determined, for my part, that there shall be now read, that which we have to say for the first question.

L. Keeper. Will you not then proceed in the order appointed you?

Winch. I am, as I said, provided for the first question or proposition: and we should suffer prejudice, if you permit us not to treat of that first, and so we would come to the second question, and this is the order we would use. I judge that all my brethren are so disposed.

Bishops. We are so determined.

L. Keeper. I know not what you would do for your determined order: but you ought to look what order is appointed you to keep, which you by this means do break and little regard.

Winch. Since our adversaries part, if it please your grace and honours, have so confirmed their assertion and purpose, we suffer a prejudice or damage, if you permit us not the like. Hereat Dr. Watson, bishop of Lincoln, being at this talk very desirous to have spoken, said now to the bishop of Winchester, I pray you let me speak; which was permitted him: we are not used indifferently, since that you allow us not to open in present writing what we have to say for the declaration of the first question, inasmuch, as that which you take for the information of the same, was meant nothing to that purpose, for that which Mr. Cole spake in this last assembly, was not prepared to strengthen our cause, but he made his oration of himself, and ex tempore, that is, without being studied.

At these words of the bishop, the nobility and others of the audience frowned, and seemed much displeased, as they all knew well enough that Mr. Cole spake out of a writing which he had in his hand, and often read out of the same, and in the same places which the bishops informed him, and pointed out unto him with their fingers; all which things do well declare the matter to be premeditated, and not done extempore, for Mr. Cole was appointed by them to be their speaker. Whereupon this of the bishop of Lincoln was the worse taken, notwithstanding he went onward complaining, and said, We are also evil ordered touching the time, our adversaries having warning long before, and we were warned only two days before the last assembly in this place. What with this business, and other trouble we have been driven to, we have been occupied the whole last night. For we may in no wise betray the cause of God, nor will do, but sustain it to the utmost of our power, as we ought so to endeavour by all manner of means. But now we have no impartial hearing.

L. Keeper. Take ye heed that ye deceive not yourselves when it shall come to just trial of the matter, and that then it be not proved against you, that ye complain without cause, when the order and your manner towards it shall be duly weighed. I am willing and ready to hear you after the order taken and appointed for you to reason therein, and further or contrary to that I cannot deal with you.

Litch. Cov. Let us suffer no misorder or injury herein, but be heard impartially, that is convenient and meet we should have here.

L. Keeper. I pray you, sirs, hear me, and mark it well. It was concluded on by my lords of the council, who you well know of, that their writing, which you are now so willing to have heard, should have been read the first day, and then we understood that Mr. Cole had said what you would have him, and as much as you willed him to say. I judge ye were asked in the end of Mr. Cole's rehearsal, whether that which he spake, was what you would have him say, and you granted it. Then, whether you would that he should say any more in the matter, you answered no, whereupon the other side was heard, which you hearing, then indeed without all good indifferency or plain dealing, you pretended that you had more to say. So mark you with what little equity you used yourselves.

No. 60.

The Bishop. We had indeed more to say, if we might have been indifferently heard.

L. Keeper. Give me leave to say, and look what gains you should have if your present request should be granted you, that call so much of indifferent using, how should you wish to use those other men? For many who are here present, were then away, so would you have your writing now read to them, which heard not this. Mark you whether it had not been more fit that you had provided it against the first day, when they orderly read their's, since to my knowledge, and as far as I have had to do in the matter, you were of both sides (I am sure) warned at one time. However, to satisfy your importunity and earnestness of this crying out to have your first writing heard, I might well allow, if it so pleased the rest of the queen's most honourable council, that you dispatch the work of the second question, appointed for this day, and give us up your writing for the first, so that when the day cometh that each of you shall answer the other in confirmation of the first question, then the same day you shall have time to read this your first writing, which you now so fain would read. To this order all the council willingly agreed.

Litch. Cov. Nay, my lords, they reading one, and we two books in one day, we should not have time enough to read them both. It would occupy too much time.

L. Keeper. For my part I might well stay at the hearing of them both, and so I judge would the rest of the council, and likewise the whole audience. At which words there was a general shout, saying, Yea, yea, we would hear it gladly.

Lincoln. We cannot read them both at one time: for their writing (I am sure) would require an hour and an half, if so be it be so long as their last was, and then our answer would require no less time.

L. Keeper. I have shewed you we would be well contented to tarry out the time when it cometh thereunto. Therefore you need not be so curious therein, and we granting you thus much, and yet you will obey no orders; I cannot tell what I shall say unto you.

Lincoln. We have been wonderfully troubled in the order of this disputation. For first it was appointed us by my lord the archbishop, that we should dispute in Latin, and then we were commanded to bring a Latin writing, and now at last we are ordered to bring our writing in English.

At these words the lord keeper of the great seal, the archbishop, with all the council, mused much, and many murmured at such a base and false report of the order well taken. Whereupon with much admiration the lord keeper answered, I marvel much of the using of yourself in this point, since I am assured the order was never otherwise taken, than that you should bring forth in English writing what you had to say for your purpose.

Hereupon the bishops of Litchfield and Chichester, to excuse my lord of Lincoln, said, We so understood the order, my lords.

L. Keeper. How likely is that, since it was so plainly told you? But to end these delays, I pray you follow the order appointed, and begin to treat of the second question.

Litch. Cov. We were appointed this day by your honours to bring in what we had to say to the first question.

At which words the audience murmured much, especially those who heard the former discourse, contrary to such his report.

L. Keeper. The order was taken, for that your writings were not ready the last time, that you should yield the same to these men (meaning the protestants), as soon as you might, and upon the receipt of your writings, you should have their's, and this day you should treat of the second question, and likewise of the third, if that you had leisure time enough. This was the substance of the order, my lords, except my memory fail me much. The same all the council can affirm.

Lincoln.

Lincoln. We are willed then to bring in this day our writing for the first question also.

L. Keeper. Ah, sirs, if you be so hard to be satisfied, and to incline to the truth, let my lords here say what was then determined.

B. York. You are to blame to stand in this issue, for there was a plain decreed order taken for you to treat of the second question. Wherefore, leave you your contention herein, and shew what you have to say in the second question.

L. Keeper. Go to now, begin, my lords.

Litch. Cov. It is contrary to the order in disputations, that we should begin.

Chester. We have the negative, they the affirmative, therefore they must begin.

Litch. Cov. They must first speak what they can bring in against us, since we are the defending party.

Chester. So is the school manner, and likewise the manner in Westminster-hall, that the plaintiff's part should speak first, and then the accused party to answer.

Litch. Cov. I pray you let the proposition be read, and then let us see who hath the negative part, and so let the other begin.

L. Keeper. The order was taken that you should begin.

Litch. Cov. But then we should do against the school order.

L. Keeper. My masters, you much inforce the school orders. I wonder much at it, since divers of those orders are oftentimes taken for the exercise of youth, and ought to maintain a fashion, and many prescriptions, which we need not here to recite, much less observe. We are come hither to keep the order of God, and to set forth his truth, and hereunto we have taken as good order as we could, which lieth not in my power to change.

Carlisle. We are of the catholic church, and abide therein, and stand in the possessions of the truth; and therefore they must say what they have to alledge against us, and so we maintain and defend our cause.

Litch. Cov. Yea, even so must the matter be ordered.

Chester. When they bring any thing against us, it is sufficient for us to deny it. Therefore they must begin.

Litch. Cov. And when they affirm any thing, and we say nay, the proof belongeth to them, and so it behoveth them to shew first what they affirm, and for what cause or purpose.

L. Keeper. Here resteth our purpose and whole matter, whether you will begin, if they do not, since it was determined you should begin.

Litch. Cov. We heard of no such order.

L. Keeper. No? Yes, and in the first question ye began willingly. How cometh it to pass that ye will not do so now?

Chester. Then had we the affirmation, which since that our adversaries have now, they should now begin.

This the protestants denied, saying, that they in the first day had the negative, wherein, they did not yet refuse to begin.

L. Keeper. If you have any thing to say, my lords, to the purpose, say on.

Litch. A particular sort of men can never break an universal church, which we now maintain: and as for these men, our adversary part, I never thought that they would have done so much as named themselves to be of the catholic church, challenging the name as well as we.

Protestants. We do so, and we are of the true catholic church, and maintain the verity thereof.

Lincoln. Yet would ye overthrow all catholic order.

Horne. I wonder that you stand so much who should begin.

Lincoln. You count it requisite that we should follow your orders, as we have taken the questions at your hands in that manner as you have assigned them.

Litch. Cov. Yea, even so we be driven to do now.

L. Keeper. Nay, I judge, if ye mark the matter well, the questions are neither of their propounding to you, nor of your device to them, but equally offered to you both.

Horne. Indeed, my lords of the queen's most honourable privy council, these questions or propositions were proposed unto us by your honours, and they then having the pre-eminency, chose to themselves the negative, and yet freely began first; now, again, why do they not the like?

Litchfield being very angry that he should so speak against them, went from the matter, saying, My lord keeper of the great seal, and you the rest of the queen's most honorable council, I hope that you all, and the queen's majesty herself, are inclined to favour the verity in all things, and the truth of the catholic church, which we must and will do to the utmost of our power, and to this purpose let us now well weigh who is of the true catholic church, they, or we.

L. Keeper. Tarry, now you go from the matter, and make questions of your own.

Litchfield, going on with his digression, said thus: We must needs go to work, and try first, what church they be of; for there are many churches in Germany. Master Horne, Master Horne, I pray you, which of these churches are you of?

Horne. I am of Christ's catholic church.

L. Keeper. You ought not thus to run into voluntary talk of your own inventing, nor to devise now questions of your own appointment, and thereby enter into that talk; ye ought not so to do. But say on, if you have any thing to say in this matter.

Litch. Cov. Nay, we must first thus go to work with them, as I have said, if we will search the truth: howbeit of the truth we have no doubt, for we assuredly stand in it. These men come in, and they pretend to be doubtful. Therefore, they should begin what they have to impugn or withstand us withal.

Winch. Let them begin; so will we go onward with our matter.

Chester. Otherwise, my lords, if they should not begin, but end the talk, then would the verity on our sides be not so well marked; for they would depart speaking last, with the rejoicing triumph of the people.

Winch. Therefore, I am resolved that they shall begin ere that we say any thing.

Chester. I am sorry, my lords, that we should so long stand in the matter with your honours, and make so many words, and so much ado with you, whom we ought to obey: howbeit there is no indifferency, if they begin not; and surely, we think it meet that they should, for their parts, give us place.

Litchfield. Yea, that they should, and ought to do, where any indifferency is used.

Aelmer. We give you the place, do we not? and deprive you not of the pre-eminence, because you are bishops; therefore, I pray you begin.

The Bishop. A goodly giving of place, I assure you: yea, marry, ye gave place: such words they used, with more scoffs.

L. Keeper. If ye make this assembly gathered in vain, and will not go to the matter, let us rise and depart.

Winch. Contented, let us be gone; for we will not in this point give over.

I pray you, my lords, require not at our hands that we should be any cause of hinderance to our religion, or give any such evil example to our posterity, which we should do if we gave over to them, which in no wise we may, or will do.

L. Keeper. Let us then break up, if you be thus minded. With these words the bishops were rising. But then, said the lord keeper, let us see whether every one of you be thus minded. How say you, my lord of Winchester; will you not begin to read your writing?

Winch. No, surely; I am fully determined, and fully at a point therein, howsoever my brethren do.

Then the lord keeper asked the bishop of Exeter his mind herein: who answered, that he was none of them. Then the lord keeper asked the others in order; and first first Lincoln, who said he was of the same mind that Winchester was of: as likewise answered Litchfield and Coventry, Dr. Cole and Dr. Chedsey. Then Chester, being asked his mind, said, My lords, I say not that I will not read it, if ye command us; but we ought not to do it; yet, I desire your honours not so to take it, as though I would not have read it. I mean not so.

L. Keeper. How say you to it, my lord Carlisle?

Carlisle. If they should not read their's this day, so that our writing may be last read, so am I contented that our's shall be first read.

L. Keeper. So would ye make orders yourselves, and appoint that we should spend one day in hearing you.

Abbot. Then the abbot of Westminster was asked his mind, who said, If it please your honours, I judge that my lords here stay most on this point, that they fear when they shall begin first, and the other answer thereupon, there shall be no time given to them to speak, which my lord disliketh.

L. Keeper. How can it otherwise be, in talk appointed in such assembly and audience? think you that there can be continual answering one another? When should it, after that sort, have an end?

Litch. Cov. It must be so in disputation to seek out the truth.

L. Keeper. But how say you, my lord Abbot; are you of the mind it shall be read?

Abbot. Yea, forsooth, my lord; I am very well pleased withal. Harpsfield being inquired his mind, thought as the other did.

L. Keeper. My lords, since that ye are not willing, but refuse to read your writing after the order taken, we will break up and depart: and for that ye will not that we should hear you, you may perhaps shortly hear of us.

Thus have we declared the order and manner of this conference at Westminster, between these two parties, wherein if any law or order were broken, judge (good reader) where the fault was; and consider withal what these papists be, from whom, if ye take away their sword and authority, you see all their cunning, how soon it lieth in the dust, or else why would they not abide the trial of writing? Why would they, or durst they not stand to the order agreed upon? Whether should we say ignorance or stubbornness to be in them more, or both together? Who first being gently (as is said) and favourably required to keep the order appointed, they would not. Then being, secondly, (as appeared by the lord keeper's words) pressed more earnestly, they neither regarding the authority, &c. of that place, nor their own reputation, nor the credit of the cause, utterly refused that to do. And, finally, being again particularly every of them apart distinctly by name required to understand their opinions therein, they all, except one, (which was the abbot of Westminster, having some more consideration of order and his duty of obedience than the rest) utterly and plainly denied to have their book read, some of them more earnestly than others, as also some of them more undiscreeitly and more unreverently than others. Whereupon giving such example of disorder, stubbornness, and self-will, as hath not been seen and suffered in such an honourable assembly, being of the two estates of this realm, the nobility and commons, besides the presence of the queen's majesty's most honourable privy council, the same assembly was dismissed, and the godly and most christian purpose of the queen's majesty made frustrate. And afterward, for the contempt so notoriously made, the bishops of Winchester and Lincoln having obstinately both disobeyed common authority, and varied manifestly from their own order, and especially Lincoln, who shewed more folly than the others, were indignantly committed to the Tower of London, and the rest (saving the abbot of Westminster) stood bound to make their personal appearance daily before the council, and not to depart the city of London and Westminster, until further orders were taken with them for their disobedience and contempt.

Besides the former protestation or libel written and exhibited by the protestants concerning the first question, there was also another writing of the protestants made of the second question, but not published.

As these bishops above-named were committed to the Tower, so Bonner, bishop of London, about the same time was committed to the Marshalsea, where he, both in his blind bloody heresy, and also in his deserved captivity, long remained, even till his death.

About this time, at the beginning of the flourishing reign of queen Elizabeth, was a parliament summoned and held at Westminster, wherein was much debating about matters of religion, and great study on both parts employed, the one to retain still, the other to refute the doctrine and faction which in queen Mary's time had been established. Yet, notwithstanding the great industry of the papists, by the providence of God their designs were frustrated, and the true catholic religion restored. Many of the pope's champions having been cut off by death, their power was much diminished; Dr. Story was one of the chief that was left to stand up for his master's cause, as may be seen by his impudent expressions (I can term them no better) in the parliament-house.

The sum of which shameless talk was to this effect: First, beginning with himself, he declared, that whereas he was noted commonly abroad, and much complained of, to have been a great doer, and a setter forth of such religion, orders, and proceedings, as of his late sovereign that is dead, queen Mary, were set forth in this realm, he denied nothing of the same, protesting moreover that he therein had done nothing, but that both his conscience did lead him to, and also his commission did as well then command him, as now also doth discharge him for the same, being no less ready now also to do the like, and more, in case he by this queen were authorized likewise, and commanded thereunto. Wherefore, as I see (saith he) nothing to be ashamed of, so less I see to be sorry for; but rather said that he was sorry for this, because he had done no more than he did, and that in executing those laws they had not been more vehement and severe. Wherein, he said, there was no default in him, but in them, whom he both often and earnestly had exhorted to the same, being therefore not a little grieved with them, for that they laboured only about the young and little sprigs and twigs, while they should have stricken at the root, and have rooted it clean out, &c. And concerning his persecuting and burning them, he denied not, but said he was once at the burning of an earwig (for so he termed a protestant) at Uxbridge, where he tost a faggot at his face as he was singing psalms, and set a whinbush of thorns under his feet, a little to prick him, with many other words of like effect. In which words he named moreover sir Philip Hobby, and another knight of Kent, with such other of the richer and higher degree, whom his counsel was to pluck at, and to bring them under coram, wherein (said he) if they had followed my advice, then had they done well and wisely. This, or much like, was the effect of the shameless and tyrannical excuse of himself, more meet to speak with the voice of a beast than a man.

Although in this parliament there was some diversity of judgment and opinion between parties, yet, notwithstanding, through the merciful goodness of God, the true cause of the gospel had the upper hand, the papists, hope was frustrate, and their rage abated, the order and proceedings of king Edward's time concerning religion was revived again, the supremacy of the pope abolished, the articles and bloody statutes of queen Mary repealed; briefly, the furious fire-brands of cruel persecution, which had consumed so many poor men's bodies, were now extinct and quenched.

Finally, the old bishops were deposed, for that they refused the oath in renouncing the pope, and not subscribing to the queen's just and lawful title. In whose rooms and places, first, for cardinal Poole, succeeded Dr Matthew Parker, archbishop of Canterbury; in the place of Heath, succeeded Dr. Young; instead of Bonner, Edmund Grindall was bishop of London; for Hopron.

Hopton, Thurlby, Tonstall, Pates, Christopherson, Peto, Coates, Morgan, Featie, White, Oglethorpe, &c. were placed, Dr. John Parkhurst in Norwich, Dr. Coxe in Ely, Jewel in Salisbury, Pilkenton in Durham, Dr. Sands in Worcester, Mr. Downam in Westchester, Bentam in Coventry and Litchfield, David in St. David's, Ally in Exeter, Horne in Winchester, Scory in Hereford, Best in Carlisle, Bullingham in Lincoln, Scamler in Peterborough, Bartlet in Bath, Gest in Rochester, Barlo in Chichester, &c.

A Treatise of Mr. NICHOLAS RIDLEY, in the Name of the whole Clergy, to King EDWARD the Sixth, concerning Images not to be set up, nor worshipped in Churches.

Certain Reasons which move us that we cannot with safe Consciences give our Assent, that the Images of Christ, &c. should be placed and erected in Churches.

FIRST, the words of the commandment, Exod. xx. Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, &c. And the same is repeated more plainly, Deut. xxvii. Cursed is the man which maketh a molten image, &c. and setteth it in a secret place; and all the people shall say, Amen.

In the first place, these words are to be noted, Thou shalt not make to thyself; that is, to any use of religion.

In the second place, these words, And setteth it in a secret place; for no man durst then commit idolatry openly. So that conferring the places, it doth evidently appear, that images both for use of religion, and in place of peril for idolatry, are forbidden.

God, knowing the inclination of man to idolatry, sheweth the reason why he made this general prohibition, lest peradventure thou being deceived, shouldst bow down to them and worship them.

This general law is generally to be observed, notwithstanding that peradventure a great number cannot be hurt by them, which may appear by the example following.

God forbade the people to join their children in marriage with strangers, adding the reason; For she will seduce thy son, that he shall not follow me, Deut. vii.

Moses was not deceived or seduced by Jethro's daughter, nor Boaz by Ruth, being a woman of Moab. And yet, for all that, the general law was to be observed, Thou shalt join no marriage with them. And so, likewise, Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, &c.

Deut. iv. God giveth a special charge to avoid images. Beware, saith he, that thou forget not the covenant of the Lord thy God which he made with thee, and so make to thyself any graven image of any thing which the Lord hath forbidden thee, for the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, and a jealous God.

If thou hast children and nephews, and do well in the land, and being deceived, do make to yourselves any graven image, doing evil before the Lord your God, and provoke him to anger, I do this day call heaven and earth to witness, that you shall quickly perish out of the land which ye shall possess, ye shall not dwell in it any longer time, but the Lord will destroy you, and scatter you amongst all nations.

Note what solemn obtestation God useth, and what grievous punishments he threateneth to the breakers of the second commandment.

In the tabernacle and temple of God, no image was by God appointed openly to be set, nor by practice afterwards used or permitted, so long as religion was purely observed; so that the use and execution of the law is a good interpreter of the true meaning of the same.

If, by virtue of the second commandment, images were not lawful in the temple of the Jews, then by the same commandment they are not lawful in the churches of christians. For, being a moral commandment, and not ceremonial, (for by consent of writers, only a part of the precept of observing the sabbath is ceremonial) it is a perpetual commandment, and bindeth us as well as the Jews.

The Jews by no means would consent to Herod, Pilate, or Petronius, that images should be placed in the temple at Jerusalem, but rather offered themselves to death, than to assent unto it. Who, besides that they are commended by Josephus for observing the meaning of the law, would not have endangered themselves so far, if they had thought images had been indifferent in the temple of God. For, as St. Paul saith, 2 Cor. vi. What agreement hath the temple of God with idols? Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 8. lib. xviii. cap. 5 and 15.

God's scripture doth in no place commend the use of images, but in a great number of places doth disallow and condemn them. They are called in the book of Wisdom, The trap and snare of the feet of the ignorant.

It is said that the invention of them was the beginning of spiritual fornication; and that they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue to the end. In the 15th chapter of the aforesaid book, it is said to be a labour without fruit. And again, They are worthy of death both that put their trust in them, and that make them, and that love them, and that worship them.

The Psalms and prophets are full of like sentences, and how can we then praise the thing which God's Spirit doth always forbid?

Furthermore, an image made by a father (as appeareth in the same book) for the memorial of his son departed, was the first invention of images, and occasion of idolatry, Wisdom xiv.

How much more then shall an image made in the memory of Christ, and set up in the place of religion, occasion the same offence? Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. vii. cap. 18. Images have their beginning from the heathen, and of no good ground; therefore they cannot be profitable to christians. Whereunto Athanasius agreeth: writing of images against the Gentiles, The invention of images, saith he, came of no good, but of evil; and whatsoever hath an evil beginning, can never in any thing be judged good, seeing it is wholly naught.

St. John saith, My little children, beware of images: but to set them in the churches, which are places dedicated to the service and invocation of God, and that over the Lord's table, being the highest and most honourable place, where most danger of abuse both is, and ever hath been, is not to beware of them, nor to fly from them, but rather to embrace and receive them. Tertullian, expounding the same words, writeth thus: Little children, keep yourselves from the shape itself, or form of them.

Images in the church either serve to edify or destroy. If they edify, then there is one kind of edification which the scriptures neither teach nor command, but always disallow; if they destroy, they are not to be used; for in the church of God all things ought to be done to edify, 1 Cor. xiv.

The commandment of God is, Thou shalt not lay a stumbling-block or a stone before the blind: and cursed is he that maketh the blind wander in his way.

The simple and unlearned people, who have been so long under blind guides, are blind in matters of religion, and inclined to error and idolatry. Therefore, to set images before them to stumble at, (they be snares and traps for the feet of the ignorant) or to lead them out of the true way, is not only against the commandment of God, but deserveth also the malediction and curse of God, Wisd. xiv.

The use of images to the learned and confirmed in knowledge, is neither necessary nor profitable. To the superstitious, a confirmation in error; to the simple and weak, an occasion of fall, and very offensive and wounding to their consciences; and therefore very dan-dangerous. For St. Paul saith, 1 Cor. ix. Offending the brethren, and wounding their weak consciences, they sin against Christ. And Matt. xviii. Woe be to him by whom offence or occasion of falling cometh; it were better that a mill-stone were tied about his neck, and he cast into the sea, than to offend one of the little ones that believe in Christ. And where objection may be made, that such offence may be taken away by sincere doctrine and preaching; it is to be answered, that that is not sufficient, as hereafter more at large shall appear.

And though it should be admitted as true, yet would it follow, that sincere doctrine and preaching should always, and in all places, continue as well as images; and so wheresoever an image to offend were erected, there should also of reason a godly and sincere preacher be continually maintained: for it is reason that the remedy be as large as the offence, the medicine as general as the poison; but it is not possible in the realm of England that images should be generally allowed, as reason and experience may teach.

As good magistrates, who intend to banish all whoredom, do drive away all licentious persons, especially out of such places as are suspected; even so images, being whores, (for the worshipping of them is called in the prophets fornication and adultery) ought to be banished, and especially out of churches, which is the most suspected place, and where the spiritual fornication hath been most committed.

It is not expedient to allow and admit the thing which is hurtful to the greatest number; but in all churches and commonwealths the ignorant and weak are the greatest number, to whom images are hurtful, and not profitable.

And where it is commonly alledged, that images in churches do stir up the mind to devotion, it may be answered, that contrariwise they do rather distract the mind from prayer, hearing of God's word, and other godly meditations, as we read, that in the council-chamber of the Lacedemonians, no picture or image was suffered, lest in consultation of weighty matters of the commonweal, their minds by the sight of the outward image might be occasioned to be withdrawn, or to wander from the matter.

The experience of this present time doth declare, that those parts of the realm which think, and are persuaded, that God is not offended by doing outward reverence to an image, do most desire the restitution of images, and have been most diligent to set them up again: restitution, therefore, of them, by common authority, shall confirm them more in their error, to the danger of their souls, than ever they were before. For, as one man writeth, nothing is more certain or sure, than that which of doubtful is made certain.

The profit of images is uncertain; the peril, by experience of all ages and states of the church (as before) is most certain.

The benefit to be taken of them (if there be any) is very small; the danger in seeing of them, which is the danger of idolatry, is the greatest of all other. Now, to allow a most certain peril for an uncertain profit, and the greatest danger for the smallest benefit, in matters of faith and religion, is a tempting of God, and grievous offence.

PROBATIONS out of the FATHERS, COUNCILS, and HISTORIES.

FIRST, it is manifest, that in the primitive church, images were not commonly used in churches, oratories, or places of assembly for religion; but they were generally detested and abhorred, insomuch, that the want of imagery was objected to the christians for a crime.

Origen reporteth, that Celsus objected the lack of images, lib. iv. contra Celsum.

Arnobius saith also, that the heathens accused the christians that they had neither altars nor images.

Zephirus, in his commentary upon the apology of Tertullian, gathereth thus of Tertullian's words, which No. 61.

place of persuasion were very cold, and to no purpose at all, except we hold this always, that christians in those days did hate most of all images with their trim decking and ornaments.

Ireneus, lib. i. cap. 4. reproveth the heretics called Gnostici, for that they carried about the image of Christ made in Pilate's time after his own proportion, (which were much more to be esteemed than any that can be made now,) using also for declaration of their affection towards it, to set garlands upon the head of it.

Lactantius affirmeth plainly, Inst. ii. cap. 19. That it is not to be doubted, that there is no religion, wheresoever is any image. If christians then had used images, he would not have made his proposition so large.

St. Augustine De Civitate Dei, lib. iv. cap. 31. commendeth Varro the Roman in these words: When Varro thought religion might be kept more purely without images, who doth not see how near he came to the truth? So that not only by M. Varro's judgment, but also by St. Augustine's approbation, the most pure and chaste observation of religion, and nearest the truth, is to be without images.

The same St. Augustine, in Psal. cxiii. hath these words: Images have more force to bow down and crook the silly soul, than to teach it.

And upon the same psalm he moveth this question; Every Child, yea, every beast, knoweth that it is not God which they see; why then doth the Holy Ghost so often give warning to beware of that thing which all do know?

ST. AUGUSTINE'S ANSWER.

FOR when they are set in churches, and begin once to be worshipped of the multitude or common people, straightway springeth up a most filthy affection of error.

This place of St. Augustine doth well open how weak a reason it is to say, images are a thing indifferent in chambers and in churches. For the alteration of the place, manner, and other circumstances, doth alter oftentimes the nature of the thing. It is lawful to buy and sell in the market, but not so in churches. It is lawful to eat and drink, but not so in churches. And therefore saith St. Paul, Have you not houses to eat and drink in? Do you condemn the church of God?

Many other actions there be which are lawful and honest in private places, which are neither comely nor honest, not only in churches, but also in other assemblies of honest people.

Tertullian saith, he used sometimes to burn frankincense in his chamber, which was then used by idolaters, and is yet in the Romish churches; but he joineth withal, but not after such a rite or ceremony, nor after such a fashion, nor with such preparation or sumptuousness, as it is done before the idols.

So that images placed in churches, and set in an honourable place of estimation, as St. Augustine saith, and especially over the Lord's table, which is done (using the words of Tertullian) after the same manner and fashion which the papists used, especially after so long continuance of abuse of images, and so many being blinded with superstitious opinion towards them, cannot be counted a thing indifferent, but a most certain ruin of many souls.

Epiphanius, in his epistle to John, bishop of Jerusalem, (which epistle was translated from the Greek by St. Jerom, being a likelihood that Jerom disliked not the doctrine of the same) doth write a fact of his own, which doth most clearly declare the judgment of that notable learned bishop concerning the use of images; his words are these: When I came to a village called Anablatha, and saw there, as I passed by, a candle burning, and inquiring what place it was, and learning that it was a church, and had entered into the same to pray, I found there a veil, or cloth, hanging at the door of the same church, dyed and painted, having on it the image of Christ, as it were, or of some saint, (for

I remember not well whose it was): then, when I saw this, that in the church of Christ, against the authority of the scriptures, the image of a man did hang, I cut it in pieces, &c. and commanded that such manner of vails, or clothes, which are contrary to our religion, be not hanged in the church of Christ.

Out of this place of Epiphanius divers notes are to be observed.

First, That by the judgment of this ancient father, to permit images in churches is against the authority of the scriptures, meaning against the second commandment, Thou shalt not take to thyself any graven image, &c.

Secondly, That Epiphanius doth reject not only graven and molten, but also painted images: forsomuch as he cut in pieces the image painted in a vail hanging at the church door; what would he have done, if he had found it over the Lord's table?

Thirdly, That he spareth not the image of Christ: for no doubt that image is most perillous in the church of all other.

Fourthly, That he did not only remove it, but with a vehemency of zeal cut it in pieces, following the example of the good king Ezechias, who broke the brazen serpent, and burnt it to ashes.

Last of all, That Epiphanius thinketh it the duty of vigilant bishops to be careful, that no kind of images be permitted in the church.

Serenus, bishop of Massilia, broke down images, and destroyed them when he saw them begin to be worshipped, Greg. in regist. epist. 109.

Experience of the times since hath declared, whether of these two sentences were better. For since Gregorius's time, the images standing in the west church, it hath been overflowed with idolatry, notwithstanding his or other men's doctrine: whereas, if Serenus's judgment had universally taken place, no such thing had happened. For if no images had been suffered, none could have been worshipped: and consequently no idolatry committed by them.

It is manifest to them that read histories, that not only emperors, but also divers and sundry councils in the east church, have condemned and abolished images, both by decrees and examples.

Petrus Crinitus, in his book of honest discipline, book ix. chap. 9. wrote out of the emperors' books these words: Valens and Theodosius, the emperors, wrote to the high Marshal, or lieutenant, in this sort: Whereas we are very careful that the religion of Almighty God should be in all things kept, we permit no man to cast, grave, or paint the image of our Saviour Christ, either in colours, stone, or other matter; but wheresoever it be found, we command it to be taken away, punishing them most grievously that shall attempt any thing contrary to our decrees and empire.

Leo the Third, a man commended in histories for his excellent virtues and godliness, who (as is judged by some men) was the author of the book De re militari, that is, of the feat of war, being translated from the Greek by John Cheeke, and dedicated to king Henry the Eighth, your highness's father, by public authority commanded abolishing of images; and in Constantinople caused all the images to be gathered together on a heap, and burned them to ashes.

Constantine the First's son assembled a council of the bishops of the east church: in which council it was decreed as followeth: It is not lawful for them that believe in God through Jesus Christ, to have any images, either of the Creator, or of any creatures set up in temples to be worshipped, but rather that all images, by the law of God, and for the avoiding of offence, ought to be taken out of churches. Which decree was executed in all places where any images were, both in Greece and Asia. But in all these times, the bishops of Rome rather maintaining the authority of Gregory, weighing, like christian bishops, the peril of the church, always in their assemblies allowed images.

Not long after, the bishop of Rome, practising with Tharasius, patriarch of Constantinople, obtained of Irene the empress, her son Constantine being then young, that a council should be called at Nice, in which the people's legates were presidents, which appeared well by their fruits: for in that council it was decreed, that images should not only be permitted in churches, but also worshipped: which council was confuted by a book written by Carolus Magnus, the emperor, calling it a foolish and an arrogant council.

Soon after this council, arose a sharp contention between Irene the empress, and her son Constantine the Sixth, the emperor who destroyed images. And in the end, as she had before wickedly burned the bones of her father-in-law, Constantine the Fifth, so afterward unnaturally she put out the eyes of her son Constantine the Sixth.

About which time, as Eutropius writeth, the sun was darkened most terribly for the space of seventeen days, God shewing, by that dreadful sign, how much he disliked that kind of proceeding.

To be short, there was never a thing that made more division, or brought more mischief into the church, than the controversy of images: by reason whereof, not only the east church was divided from the west, and never since properly reconciled, but also the empire was cut asunder and divided, and the gates opened to the Saracens and Turks to enter and overcome a great part of Christendom. The fault whereof most justly is to be ascribed to the patrons of images, who could not be contented with the example of the primitive church, being most simple and sincere, and most agreeable to the scripture: (for as Tertullian saith, That that is first, is true, and that that is latter, is counterfeit.) But with all extremity maintained the use of images in churches, whereof no profit nor conveniency did ever grow to the church of God. For it is evident, that infinite millions of souls have been cast into eternal damnation by the occasion of images used in places of religion, and no history can record, that ever any one soul was won unto Christ by having of images. But lest it might appear that the west church had always generally retained and commended images, it is to be noted, that in a council holden in Spain, called Consilium Eliberinum, the use of images in churches was clearly prohibited in this form of words: We decree, that pictures ought not to be in churches, lest that be painted upon the walls which is worshipped or adored.

But this notwithstanding experience hath declared, that neither assembling in councils, neither writings, preachings, decrees, making of laws, prescribing of punishments, hath holpen against images, to which idolatry hath been committed, nor against idolatry whilst images stood. For these blind books and dumb school-masters (which they call laymen's books) have more prevailed by their carved and painted preaching of idolatry, than all other written books and preachings in teaching the truth, and the horror of that vice.

Having thus declared unto your highness a few causes of many which do move our consciences in this matter; we beseech your highness most humbly not to strain us any further, but to consider that God's word doth threaten a terrible judgment unto us, if we, being pastors and ministers in his church, should assent unto the thing which in our learning and conscience we are persuaded doth tend to the confirmation of error, superstition, and idolatry: and finally, to the ruin of the souls committed to our charge, for which we must give an account to the Prince of pastors at the last day, Hebrews xii. 1 Pet. v. We pray your majesty also not to be offended with this our plainness and liberty, which all good and christian princes have ever taken in good part at the hands of godly bishops.

Saint Ambrose, writing to Theodosius the emperor, useth these words: But neither is it the part of an emperor to deny free liberty of speaking, nor the duty of a priest not to speak what he thinketh. And again; In God's cause whom wilt thou hear, if thou wilt not hear the priest, to whose great peril the fault should be committed? Who dare say the truth unto thee, if the priest dare not? These and such like speeches of St. Ambrose, Theodosius, and Valentinianus, the emperors, did always take in good part, and we doubt not but your grace will do do the like, not only of whose clemency, but also beneficence, we have largely tasted.

We beseech your majesty also, in these and such like controversies of religion, to refer the discussion and deciding of them to a synod of our bishops, and other godly learned men, according to the example of Constantinus Maximus, and other christian emperors, that the reasons of both parties being examined by them, the judgment may be given uprightly, as in all doubtful matters.

And to return to this present matter, we most humbly beseech your majesty to consider, that besides weighty causes in policy, which we leave to the wisdom of your honourable counsellors, the establishment of images by your authority shall not only utterly discredit our ministers, as builders up of the things which we have destroyed, but also blemish the fame of your most god-like father, and such notable fathers as have given their life for the testimony of God's truth, who by public law removed all images.

The almighty and everlasting God plentifully indue your majesty with his Spirit and heavenly wisdom, and long preserve your most gracious reign and prosperous government over us, to the advancement of his glory, to the overthrow of superstition, and to the benefit and comfort of all your highness's loving subjects.

Note, Dr. Ridley, some time bishop of London, was a man so revered for his learning and knowledge in the scripture, that even his very enemies have reported him to have been an excellent scholar, whose life, if it might have been redeemed with the sum of 10,000 marks, yea, 10,000. the lord Dacres of the North, being his kinsman, would have given it to queen Mary, rather than he should have been burned. And yet was she so unmerciful, for all his gentleness in king Edward's days, that it would not be granted for any interest that could be made. Oh, that she had remembered his labour for her to king Edward the Sixth, with archbishop Cranmer, in such sort that even she had yielded but the reward of a publican, Matt. v. then had the earth not so been bereft of him as it was; but the Lord forgive us our sins, which were the cause thereof, and grant that we never so provoke his anger again, if it be his blessed will, Amen.

IT is given to the queen's majesty to understand, that certain of her subjects by their evil dispositions do sow and spread abroad divers seditions, to the derogation and dishonour of Almighty God, in the state of religion established by the laws of this realm, and also to the dishonour of her highness, in disproving her lawful right of supremacy amongst her subjects. And this that they do, is not done as in secrecy or by stealth, but openly avouched, and in all companies disputed on. And thus by their bold attempts they seem not to obey or regard the authority of laws, nor the quiet of her subjects. As for example, by bringing in and spreading abroad divers lewd libels, and seditious books from beyond the seas, and in such boldness, that they do commend those writers in their seditious books, containing manifest matter against the state established. Which boldness of men, so universally and every where seen and heard, cannot be thought to be done but by the comfort and aid, or at the least winked at by them whom the queen's highness hath placed in authority to repress those insolencies. And the queen's highness cannot more justly charge any for this disorder, than such who be in commissions chosen to repress those disorders. If it be answered me, that they cannot see such open boldness and factious disorders, I must say that they have no eyes to see: and if they hear not of such contemptuous talk, I may say that they have no ears. I would have those men judge what will come of those unbridled speeches in the end, if reformation be not had thereof. What cometh of factions and seditions, we have been taught of late years, and what the fruits thereof be, which I beseech God long to defend us from. If such disorders be not redressed by law, then must force and violence reform. Which when they take place, may happen to fall as soon on them that seem to have least consideration in this matter. If force and violence prevail, then you know that law is put to silence, and cannot be executed, which should only maintain good order. If it be replied against me, that to the suppressing of these open talks there is no law, which by special letter can charge any man as an offender; I must say, that whatsoever the letter of the law may be, the meaning of the law was and is clean contrary to the liberty of these doings. If it be said, that no man can be charged by the law, except it can be proved against him, that his speech and deeds be done maliciously; what you call malice I cannot tell. But if the bringing in of these seditious books make men's minds to be at variance one with another, distraction of minds maketh sedition, sedition bringeth in tumults, tumults work insurrections and rebellion, insurrections make depopulation and desolation, and bring in utter ruin and destruction of men's bodies, goods, and lands; and if any sow the root whereof these men come, and it be said that he hath no malice, or that he doth not maliciously labour to destroy both public and private wealth, I cannot tell what act may be thought to be done maliciously: and further, if it be said to me, that the man who should be charged with offence, must be proved to have done his act advisedly; to that I answer, If any bring in those books, distribute them to others, commend and defend them, and yet cannot be charged to have done advisedly, I have no skill of their advisedness. If it be said, that the law treateth of such acts as be directly derogatory and of none other, what is direct overthwarting the law, when the contrary thereof is plainly treated, holden, and defended, and the truth by arguments condemned? It may be said again, that the world doth not now like extremity in laws penal, and calleth them bloody laws. As for extreme and bloody laws, I approve not of them: but where the execution of such laws toucheth half a dozen offenders, and the non-execution may bring in danger half an hundred, I think this law nor the execution thereof may justly be called extreme and bloody: in such like comparison I may utter my meaning, as to make a difference between whipping and hanging. Indeed, though whipping may be thought extreme, yet if by whipping a man may escape hanging, in this respect, not whipping bringeth in this bloodiness and extremity, and not the execution of the law; and better it were, a man to be twice whipped than once hanged: the pains do differ, but wise men will soon consider the diversity. The truth is, to suffer disobedient subjects to take boldness against the laws of God and their prince, to wink at the obstinate minds of such as be unbridled in their affections, to maintain a foreign power of the bishop of Rome, directly against the prince's prerogative established by laws, is not this to hatch diffention, and to cherish sedition? To extol the writings of such, who by their wits devise to supplant the prince's lawful authority. If these doing be not meant to the disturbance and utter ruin of this realm, I know not what is good government. If these be not the sparks of rebellion, what be they? Thus much having spoken to your wisdoms, I doubt not of your assenting with me; the rather also because I utter them unto you as from the queen's majesty by commandment, who doth require of us all more diligence in the execution of the laws, than commonly hath been observed: whereby we shall do our duty to Almighty God the better, declare our allegiance to our sovereign, regard the majesty of the laws, love the quiet of our country, and procure the safety of ourselves.

God save the QUEEN.

ABOUT the month of July, Anno 1581, one Richard Atkins, an Englishman, born in Hertfordshire, came to Rome, and having found the English college, knocked at the door, to whom divers of the students there came out, to welcome him, understanding that he was an Englishman. They willed him to go to the hospital, and there to receive his meat and lodging, according as the order was appointed: whereunto he answered, I come not (my countrymen) to any such intent, as you judge, but I come lovingly to rebuke the great disorder of your lives, which I grieve to hear, and pity to behold: I come likewise to let your proud Antichrist understand, that he doth offend the heavenly Majesty, rob God of his honour, and poisoneth the whole world with his abominable blasphemies, making them do homage to stocks and stones, and that filthy sacrament, which is nothing else but a foolish idol. When they heard these words, one Hugh Griffin, a Welshman, and student in the college, caused him to be put in the inquisition; where, how they examined him, and how he answered them, I know not, but after certain days he was set at liberty again; and one day going in the street, he met a priest carrying the sacrament; which offending his conscience, to see the people crouch and bow down to it, he caught at it to have thrown it down; but missing of his purpose, and it being judged by the people, that he did catch at the holiness that (they say) cometh from the sacrament, upon mere devotion, he was let pass, and nothing said to him: a few days after he came to St. Peter's church, where divers gentlemen and others were hearing mass, and the priest at the elevation; he using no reverence, stepped among the people to the altar, and threw down the chalice with the wine, striving likewise to have pulled the cake out of the priest's hands; for which divers rose up and beat him with their fists, and one drew his rapier, and would have slain him: so that in brief he was carried to prison, where he was examined, wherefore he had committed such a heinous offence; whereunto he answered, That he came purposely for that intent, to rebuke the pope's wickedness and their idolatry. Upon this he was condemned to be burned; which sentence (he said) he was right willing to suffer, and the rather, because the sum of his offence pertained to the glory of God. During the time he remained in prison, sundry Englishmen came unto him, willing him to be sorry for what he had done, and to recant from his damnable opinion; but all the means they used were in vain, he confuted their dealings by divers places of scripture, and willed them to be sorry for their wickedness; while God did permit them time, else they were in danger of everlasting damnation; these words made the Englishmen depart: for they could not abide to hear them. Within a while after, he was set upon an ass without any saddle, he being from the middle upward naked, having some English priests with him to talk with him, but he regarded them not, but spake to the people in as good language as he could, and told them they were in a wrong way, and willed them for Christ's sake to have regard to the saving of their souls. All the way as he went, there were four who did nothing else but thrust at his body with burning torches, whereat he never moved, nor shrunk one jot, but with a cheerful countenance laboured to persuade the people, often bending his body to meet the torches, as they were thrust at him, and would take them in his own hand, and hold them burning still upon his body, whereat the people not a little wondered. Thus he continued almost the space of half a mile, till he came before St. Peter's, where the place of execution was. When he was come to the place of execution, there they made a device, not to make the fire about him, but to burn his legs first, which they did, he not dismayed any whit, but suffered all marvellous cheerfully; which moved the people to such a quandary as was not in Rome many a day. Then they offered him a cross, and willed him to embrace it, in token that he died a christian; but he put it away with his hand, telling them, that they were evil men to trouble him with such matters, when he was preparing himself for God, whom he beheld in majesty and mercy, ready to receive him into eternal rest. They seeing him in this mind, departed, saying, Let us go and leave him to the devil, whom he serves. Thus ended this faithful soldier and martyr of Christ, who is, no doubt, in glory with his Master: whereunto God grant us all to come, Amen.

This is faithfully avouched by John Young, who was at that time, and a good while after in Rome, in the service of his master, doctor Morton; who seeing the martyrdom of this man, when he came home to his house, in presence of Mr. Smith, his son, Mr. Creed, and the said John Young, spake as followeth: Surely this fellow was marvellously obstinate, he nothing regarded the good counsel which was given to him, nor shrunk all the time when the torches were thrust at his naked body. Beside, in the place of execution he did not faint nor cry one jot in the fire, although they tormented him very cruelly, and burned him by degrees, as his legs first, to put him to the greater pain; yet all this he did but smile at. Doubtless, but that the word of God cannot be but true, else we might judge this fellow to be of God; for who could have suffered so much pain as he did? But truly I believe the devil was in him.

The LIFE and DEATH of Dr. STORY, a cruel PERSECUTOR of CHRIST in his MEMBERS.

THIS Dr. Story, being an Englishman by birth, and from his infancy being not only nursed in papistry, but also even as it were by nature earnestly affected to the same, and growing somewhat in riper years, in the days of queen Mary became a bloody tyrant, and cruel persecutor of Christ in his members (as all the histories in this book almost do declare). Thus he raging all the reign of the aforesaid queen Mary against the infallible truth of Christ's gospel, and the true professors thereof, never ceasing till he had consumed to ashes two or three hundred blessed martyrs, who willingly gave their lives for the testimony of his truth; and thinking their punishment in the fire not cruel enough, he went about to invent new torments for the holy martyrs of Christ, such was his hatred to the truth of Christ's gospel: but in the end the Lord God looking upon the affliction and cruel blood-shedding of his servants, took away queen Mary, the great pillar of papistry. After whom succeeded lady Elizabeth, now queen of England, who staying the bloody sword of persecution from raging any further, caused the same Dr. Story to be apprehended, and committed to ward, with many others his accomplices, sworn enemies to Christ's glorious gospel. The said Story having been a while detained in prison, at last, by what means I know not, got out and conveyed himself over the seas, where he continued a most bloody persecutor, still raging against God's saints with fire and sword. Inasmuch as he growing to be familiar and right dear to the duke of Alva, in Antwerp, received special commission commission from him to search the ships for goods forfeited, and for English books, and such like.

And in this favour and authority he continued there for a time, by which means he did much hurt, and brought many a good man and woman into trouble and extreme peril of life through his blood-thirsty cruelty: but at last the Lord (when the measure of his iniquity was full) proceeded in judgment against him, and cut him off from the face of the earth, according to the prayers of many a good man; which came to pass in order as followeth. It being certainly known (for the report thereof was gone forth into all lands) that he not only intended the subversion and overthrow of his native country of England, by bringing in foreign hostility, if by any means he might encompass it; but also daily and hourly murdered God's people; there was this platform laid (by God's providence no doubt) that one Mr. Parker, a merchant should sail unto Antwerp, and by some means convey Story into England.

This Parker arriving at Antwerp, suborned certain to repair to Dr. Story, and to signify unto him, that there was an English ship come, loaded with merchandize, and that if he would make search thereof himself, he should find store of English books, and other things for his purpose. Story hearing this, and suspecting nothing, made haste towards the ship, thinking to make the same his prey; and coming on board, searched for English heretical books (as he called them); and going down under the hatches, because he would be sure to have their blood if he could, they clapped down the hatches, hoisted up their sail, having (as God would) a good gale, and sailed away unto England. Where they arriving, presented this bloody butcher, and traitorous rebel, Story, to the no little rejoicing of many an English heart. He being now committed to prison, continued there a good space: during all which time he was importuned and solicited daily by wife and learned fathers to recant his devilish and erroneous opinions, to conform himself to the truth, and to acknowledge the queen's supremacy. All which he utterly denied to the death, saying, that he was a sworn subject to the king of Spain, and was no subject to the queen of England, nor she his sovereign queen; and therefore (as he well deserved) he was condemned (as a traitor to God, the queen's majesty, and the realm) to be drawn, hanged, and quartered; which was performed accordingly, he being laid upon an hurdle, and drawn from the Tower along the streets to Tyburn, where he being hanged till he was half dead, was cut down and stripped; and (which is not to be forgot) when the executioner had cut off his privy members, he rushing up upon a sudden, gave him a blow upon the ear, to the great wonder of all that stood by: and thus ended this bloody Nimrod's wretched life, whose judgment I leave to the Lord.

C H A P. III.

Containing an HISTORICAL ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS, SUFFERINGS, and cruel DEATHS of PROTESTANT MARTYRS in FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

A brief RELATION of the horrible MASSACRE in FRANCE, Anno 1752.

AND first for brevity's sake to overpass the bloody butchery of the Roman catholics in Orange against the protestants, more fiercely and unawares breaking into their houses, and there, without mercy, killing man, woman, and child; of whom some being spoiled and naked, they threw out of their lofts into the streets; some they smothered in their houses with smoke, with sword and weapon sparing none, the carcases of some they threw to dogs, which was in the year 1570, in the reign of Charles IX. Likewise to pass over the cruel slaughter at Rhone, where the protestants being at a sermon without the city walls, upon the king's edict, the papists in fury ran upon them coming home, and slew of them above 40 at least, many more they wounded. This example at Rhone, stirred up the papists at Dieppe, to practise the like rage also against the christians there, returning from a sermon likewise; whose slaughter had been the greater, had they not more wisely before been provided with weapons for their own defence if needed. All which happened about the same year aforesaid, viz. 1570. But these with such like I briefly overslip, to enter now into the matter above promised, that is, briefly to treat of the horrible and most barbarous massacre committed in Paris, such as I suppose never was heard of before in any civil dissention amongst the very heathens. In a few words, to touch the substance of the matter:

After long troubles in France, the papists foreseeing no good to be done against the protestants by open force, began to devise how by crafty means to entrap them, and that by two manner of ways: the one by pretending a power to be sent into the lower country, whereof the admiral to be the captain; not that the king so meant indeed, but only to understand thereby what power and force the admiral had under him, who they were, and what were their names. The second was by a certain marriage suborned between the prince of Navarre, and the king's sister. To this pretended marriage, it was advised, that all the chief protestants of France should be invited, and meet in Paris. Among whom first they began with the queen of Navarre, mother to the prince that was to marry the king's sister, attempting by all means possible to gain her consent thereunto. She being then at Rochelle, and allured by many fair words to repair unto the king, consented at length to come, and was received at Paris; where she, after much ado, was at length won over to the king's mind, and providing for the marriage, shortly upon the same fell sick, and within five days departed, not without suspicion, as some said, of poison. But her body being opened, no sign of poison could there be found, save only but that a certain apothecary made his boast, that he had killed the queen by certain venomous odours and smells by him confected.

After this, notwithstanding the marriage still going forward, the admiral prince of Navarre and Conde, with divers other chief states of the protestants, induced by the king's letters and many fair promises, at last were brought to Paris, where with great solemnity they were received, but especially the admiral. To make the matter short, the day of the marriage came, which was the eighteenth of August, 1572. Which marriage being solemnized by the cardinal of Borbonne, upon an high stage set up on purpose without the church walls, the prince of Navarre and Conde came down, waiting for the king's sister, she being then at mass. This done, they resorted all together to the bishop's palace to dinner. In the evening they were had to a palace in the middle of Paris to supper. Not long after this, being the 22d of August, the admiral coming from the council table, by the way was shot at with a pistol, charged with three bullets, in both his arms. He being thus wounded, and yet still remaining in Paris, although the Vidam gave him counsel to flee away, it so fell out that certain soldiers were appointed in divers places of the city to be ready at a watch-word at the command of the prince, upon which watch-word given, they burst out to the slaughter of the protestants, first beginning with the admiral himself, who being wounded with many sore wounds, was cast out of the window into the street, where his head being first struck off, and embalmed with spices to be sent to the pope, the savage people raging against him, cut off his arms and privy members, and so drawing him three days through the streets of Paris, they dragged him to the place of execution, out of the city, and there hanged him up by the heels, to the greater shew and scorn of him.

After the martyrdom of this good man, the armed soldiers with rage and violence ran upon all the others of the same profession, slaying and killing all the protestants they knew, or could find within the city gates inclosed. This bloody slaughter continued the space of many days, but especially the greatest slaughter was in the three first days, in which were numbered to be slain, as the story writeth, above 10,000 men and women, old and young, of all sorts and conditions. The bodies of the dead were carried in carts to be thrown in the river: so that not only the river was all stained therewith, but also whole streams in certain places of the city did run with the blood of the slain bodies. So great was the outrage of that hellish persecution, that not only the protestants, but also certain whom they thought indifferent papists, they put to the sword instead of protestants. In the number of them that were slain of the more learned sort, was Petrus Ramus, also Lambinus, another notorious learned man; Plateanus, Lomenius, Chapesius, with others.

And not only within the walls of Paris this uproar was contained, but it extended further into other cities and quarters of the realm, especially Lyons, Orleans, Thoulouse, and Rouen. In these cities it is almost incredible, and scarce ever heard of in any nation, what cruelty was shewed, what numbers of good men were destroyed; insomuch, that within the space of one month, thirty thousand at least of religious protestants are numbered to be slain, as is credibly reported in the commentaries of them who testify purposely of the matter.

Furthermore there is to be noted, that when the pope first heard of this bloody stir, he, with his cardinals, made such joy at Rome, with the procession, with their gun-shot, and singing of Te Deum, that in honour of that festival act, a jubilee was commanded by the pope, with great indulgence, and much solemnity. Whereby thou hast here to discern and judge, with what spirit and charity these papists are moved to maintain their religion, which otherwise would fall to the ground without all hope of recovery. Likewise in France no less rejoicing there was upon the 28th day of the month, the king commanding public processions through the whole city to be made, with bonfires, ringing, and singing; where the king himself, with the queen his mother, and his whole court resorting together to the church, gave thanks and praise to God, for that so worthy victory achieved upon St. Bartholomew's day against the protestants, whom they thought to be utterly overthrown and vanquished in all the realm for ever.

And, indeed, to man's thinking, it might appear no less, after such a great destruction of the protestants, having lost so many worthy and noble captains as then were cut off, whereupon many, for fear revoking their religion, returned to the pope; divers fled out of the realm, such as would not turn, keeping themselves secret, durst not be known nor seen, so that it was past all hope of man, that the gospel should ever have any more place in France: but such is the admirable working of God, where man's help and hope most faileth, there he most sheweth his strength, and helpeth, as here is to be seen. For whereas the little remnant of the gospel side, being now brought to utter desperation, were now ready to give over unto the king, and many were gone already against conscience, yielding to time; yet, the Lord of his goodness so wrought, that many were stayed and reclaimed again through the occasion first of them in Rochelle: who, hearing of the cruel massacre in Paris, and slaughter at Thoulouse, most constantly, with valiant hearts, (the Lord so working) thought to stand to their defence against the king's power, by whose example certain other cities, hearing thereof, took no little courage to do the like; namely, Montalbane, the city called Nemanium, Sanser in Occitania, Millialdum, Mirebellum, Fuduzia, with other towns and cities more: who, being confederate together, exhorted one another to be circumspect, and take good heed of the false dissembling practices not to be trusted of the merciless papists, intending nothing but blood and destruction.

These things thus passing at Rochelle, the king hearing thereof, giveth in commandment to captains Strozzius and Gardius to see to Rochelle. After this, he sendeth a nobleman, one Bironius, requiring of the Rochelle men to receive him for their governor, under the king. A great consultation being held, at length the Rochelle men began to condescend, upon certain conditions; which being not easily consented to, and especially they hearing in the mean time what was done to others of their fellows, who had submitted themselves, thought it better to stand to the defence of their lives and consciences, and to hazard the worst. Whereupon began great siege and battery to be laid against Rochelle, both by land and sea, which was in the year 1572, about the fourth day of December. It would require another volume to describe all things during the time of this siege, that passed on either side, between the king's part and the town of Rochelle. Briefly to run over some parts of the matter: In the beginning of the year following, which was 1573, in the month of January, commandment was given out by the king, to all and sundry nobles and peers of France, upon great punishment, to address themselves in a most forcible manner to the assaulting of Rochelle. Whereupon, a great concourse of all the nobility, with the whole power of France, was there assembled; amongst whom was also the prince of Anjou, the king's brother, (who, there, not long after, was proclaimed king of Poland) accompanied by his other brother, duke Alanfon, Navarre, Conde, and a great number of states besides. Thus the whole power of France being gathered against one poor town, had not the mighty hand of God been on their side, it had been impossible for them to escape. During the time of this siege, which lasted seven months, what skirmishes and conflicts were on, both sides, it were endless to recite. To make short, seven principal assaults were given to the poor town of Rochelle, with all the power that France could make. In all which assaults the pope's catholic side had the worst. Concerning the first assault, thus I find written—that within the space of 26 days were charged against the walls and houses of Rochelle, to the number of thirty thousand shot of iron bullets and globes, whereby a great breach was made for the adversary to invade the city: but such was the courage of them within, (not men only, but women, matrons, and maidens, with spits, fire, and such other weapons as come to hand) that the adversary was driven back, with no small slaughter of their soldiers: only of the inhabitants were slain and wounded to the number of sixty persons. Likewise, in the second assault, 2000 great field-pieces were laid against the town; whereupon the adversary attempted the next day to invade the town, but through the industry of the soldiers and citizens, and also of the women and maids, the invaders were forced at length to fly faster than they came. No better success had all the assaults that followed: whereby, consider (gentle reader) with thyself, in what great distress these good people were, not of Rochelle only, but of other cities also, during these seven months above-mentioned, had not the powerful hand of the Lord Almighty sustained them. Concerning whose wonderful operation for his servants in these distresses, three memorable things I find in history to be noted.

The one concerning the siege of Sanser; which city being terribly battered and razed with the shot of great cannons and field-pieces, having at one siege no less than three thousand bullets and gun stones flying upon them, wherewith the crests of their helmets were pierced; their sleeves, their hose, their hats pierced; their weapons in their hands broken, their walls shaken, their their houses rent down; yet not one person slain nor wounded with all this, save only at the first a certain maiden, with the blast of the shot flying by her, was struck down, and died.

The second thing to be noted is, that in the same city, during all the time of the siege, which lasted seven months and a half, notwithstanding all the ordnance and battering-pieces discharged against them, which are numbered to six thousand, not so much as 25 persons in all were slain.

The third example, no less memorable, was at Rochelle: whereas the poorer sort began to lack corn and victuals, there was sent to them every day in the river, (by the hand of the Lord no doubt) a great multitude of fish, called sardones, which the poorer people used instead of bread. Which fish, the same day the siege broke up, departed and came no more. Testified by them who were present in Rochelle all the time.

What number was lost on both sides during all this seven months war, is not certainly known. The number of captains slain of the king's camp, however, leaves room for conjecture; which was no less than 132, of whom the chief was duke Damoule.

To close up this tragical story, respecting the breaking up of this seven months siege: Thus it fell out, that shortly after the seventh assault given against Rochelle, which was in the year 1573, about the month of June, word came to the camp, that duke Anjou, the king's brother, was proclaimed king of Poland; at which great joy was in the camp. By occasion whereof, the new king more willing to have peace, entered talk with them of Rochelle: who, as he shewed himself to them not ungentle, so found he them again to him not unconformable. Whereupon, a certain agreement pacificatory was concluded between them, upon conditions. Which agreement, the new king of Poland soon preferred to the French king his brother, not without some suit and intercession to have it ratified. The king also himself, partly being weary of these chargeable wars, was the more willing to assent thereunto. And thus, at length, through the Lord's great work, the king's royal consent, under form of an edict, was set down in writing, and confirmed by the king, containing 25 articles. In which also were included certain other cities of the protestants, granting to them the benefit of peace, and liberty of religion. This edict, or mandate sent down from the king by his herald at arms, Bironius, in the king's name, caused to be solemnly proclaimed at Rochelle, in the year 1573, the tenth day of June.

The year following, which was 1574, for two things seemeth fatal and famous; first, for the death of Charles the Ninth, the French king; also, most of all, for the death of Charles, cardinal of Lorraine, brother to Guise. Of the manner of the cardinal's death, I find little mention in stories. Touching the king's death, although Ric. Dinothus saith nothing, likely from fear, because he being a Frenchman, his name is expressed and known: but another story, (whom the said Dinothus doth follow) bearing no name, saith thus: that he died the 25th day of May, upon Whitsun-eve, being aged 25 years: and addeth more, Certain it is, that his sickness came of bleeding. And saith further: The constant report so goeth, that his blood gushing out of divers parts of his body, he tossing in his bed, and uttering many horrible blasphemies, laid upon pillows, with his heels upward and head downward, voided so much blood at his mouth, that in a few hours he expired. Which story, if it be true, as is recorded and testified, may be a spectacle and example to all persecuting kings and princes, polluted with the blood of christian martyrs. And thus much briefly touching the terrible persecution in France.

To the CHRISTIAN READER.

Whereas that excellent man, both for learning and godliness, Mr. John Fox, of blessed memory, ended this worthy work with his short declaration of that horrible massacre and murder of God's saints and servants in France; we have thought good to set down the same more particularly and largely, and afterwards to add thereto a declaration of other outrageous cruelties, committed in France by the favourers and followers of the church of Rome upon faithful christians, both before and after the said massacre: all faithfully collected and taken out of the history of that honourable man, James August Thuanus, president of the parliament of Paris, and counsellor of state to the late French king, Henry the Fourth. And thus we have done, that we may thereby be the more moved to hate and abhor that bloody Babylon of Rome, and to take better heed, that by our sins and contempt of God's holy word, by his great mercy committed unto us, we do not again fall into the cruel claws thereof, and into the bloody hands of her followers; as most certainly we had done, if God in great mercy had not prevented that savage, barbarous, and most monstrous Powder-Treason; of which great and merciful deliverance, God make us mindful and truly thankful in glorifying his name, and serving him in true holiness and righteousness all the days of our life, Amen."

WHEN the admiral was wounded in both his arms, he immediately thereupon said to Maure, preacher to the queen of Navarre, O my brother, I do now perceive that I am beloved of my God, seeing that for his most holy name's sake I do suffer these wounds. Then he whispered in the ear of one of them that bore up his arm, that he should deliver an hundred crowns to Marlin his preacher, to be given to the poor of the church of Paris.

The admiral was slain by Bernjus, of whom Alineus (one of them that came to kill him) did afterwards report, that he never saw man in so present peril, so constantly and confidently suffer death.

Many honourable men, and great personages, were then murdered, as count Rochfulcaud; Telinius, the admiral's son-in-law; Antonius Claromontus, marquis of Ravely; Lewis Buffius, Bandineus, Pluvialius, Bernius, &c.

Francis Nomparr Caumontius, being in bed with his two sons, was slain, with one of them: the other was strangely preserved, who after came to great honour and dignity.

Stephen Cevalerie Prime, chief treasurer to the king in Poictiers, a very good man, and careful of the commonwealth, after he had paid for his life a good sum of money, was cruelly murdered by some cut-throats, whom Stephen Fargon Parandery (who gaped for his office) had sent for that purpose.

Magdalen Briffonet, an excellent woman, and learned, the widow of Ivermus, master of requests to the king, flying out of the city in poor apparel, was taken, cruelly murdered, and cast into the river.

Two thousand were murdered in one day; and the same liberty of killing and spoiling continued certain days after.

Peter Placie was repeatedly stabbed with daggers, and killed.

At Meldis two hundred were cast into prison, and being brought out as sheep to the slaughter, were cruelly murdered. There also were twenty-five women slain.

At Orleans, a thousand men, women, and children, were murdered.

The citizens of Augustobona, when they heard of the massacre at Paris, shut the gates of their town that no protestants might escape, and cast all that they suspected into prison, which afterward were brought forth and murdered.

At Avaricum, in like manner, the suspected for religion were cast into prison, and afterwards murdered.

At the town of Charite, a troop of Lewes Gonzaga's horsemen killed 18 persons.

At Lyons there were 800 most miserably and cruelly murdered; the children hanging at their fathers' necks, and the fathers embracing their children, &c. Three hundred hundred were slain in the archbishop's house. The monks would not suffer their bodies to be buried.

At Romanium seven were killed.

At Tholossa 200 were murdered.

At Roan 500 were put to death. At last Thuanus writeth thus; this example passed unto other cities, and from cities to towns and villages, so that it is by many published, that in all the kingdom above 30,000 were in these tumults divers ways destroyed; although I think the number was somewhat less.

A little before this massacre, a man, nurse, and infant, carried to be baptized, were all three murdered.

There was wonderful great joy in Rome for this massacre, and the pope with his cardinals went in solemn procession to the church of St. Mark, to give thanks to God for this great benefit bestowed upon the see of Rome and the Christian world. And the Monday following there was solemn service in the church of Minerva, at which the pope and the cardinals were present. A jubilee also was published, and in the evening the great ordinance was shot off in the castle of St. Angelo. The cardinal of Lorrain gave a thousand crowns to him that brought news of it.

Bricamotius, an old man of seventy years, and Cavagnius, were laid upon hurdles and drawn to execution: and being in the way reviled and defiled with dirt cast upon them, they were hanged. Bricamotius might have been pardoned, if he would publicly confess, that the admiral had conspired against the king; which he refused to do.

Caster, a city in the county of the Albingens, held by the protestants, being upon the king's great promises of their safety, delivered up into the hands of Crucete a nobleman, was notwithstanding with murders and spoil cruelly wasted.

At Bourdeaux, by the instigation of a monk, called Enimund Angerius, were 264 cruelly murdered, of whom some were senators. This monk continually provoked them in his sermons to this slaughter.

At Agendicum in Main, a cruel slaughter of the protestants was committed by the instigation of Æmarus, inquisitor of criminal causes. A rumour being spread abroad, that the protestants had taken secret counsel to invade and spoil the churches, above an hundred of every estate and sex were by the enraged people killed or drowned in the river Igonna, which runneth by the city; the houses of many were spoiled; the church without the city, where the protestants assembled, was pulled down and made level with the ground, and their vines pulled up by the roots.

The duke of Guise entered into Blois; which although he got without any fight, yet all furious liberty was permitted to the soldiers, houses were spoiled, many protestants which had remained were slain, or drowned in the river; neither were women spared, of whom some were defiled, and more murdered. Amongst whom one matron of good birth, having escaped drowning in water, could not escape from the hand of the murderers. From thence he went to Mere, a town two leagues from Blois, where protestants had frequent assembly at sermons; which for many days together was spoiled, and many killed, and Caslebonius, the pastor, was drowned in the next river.

At Anjou, Albiacus, the pastor, was murdered; certain women slain, and some defiled: amongst whom, two sisters were abused in the sight of their father, who was bound to a well to behold that sight.

John Burgeolus, president of Turin, an old man, being suspected to be a protestant, having bought with a great sum of money his life and safety, was notwithstanding taken and beaten cruelly with clubs and flaves, and being stripped of his clothes, was brought to the bank of the river Liger, and was hanged by his feet upward, and head downward in the water up to his breast; then (he yet alive) they opened his belly, plucked out his guts, and threw them into the river, and taking his heart, put it upon a spear, carrying it with contumelious words about the city.

The town of Barre, being taken by the papists, all kind of cruelty was there used, children were cut up, and the gurs of some of them and hearts pulled out, which in rage they gnawed with their teeth. They that were in the castle, when they had yielded themselves to the will of the conqueror, were almost all hanged. One Ralet spared not his own son, but suffered him in that tumult to be hanged.

When the city Matiscou was taken, by corrupting the keeper of the keys, whom yet they killed, great cruelty was shewed, so that they counted it a sport to cut off men's legs and arms.

Sapontius inviting gentlewomen to supper, would walk with them, and having his soldiers about him, used to cast some of his prisoners (of which he had many) from the bridge into the river, and with that spectacle did satisfy the eyes of his guests; of whom he would often ask, whether they did ever see men leap better.

At Albia of Cahors, upon the Lord's day, the 16th of December, the papists at the ringing of a bell broke open the doors, where the protestants were assembled, and killed without difference, some in the place, some as they were getting away, were here and there slain, among whom was one Guacerius, a rich merchant; who being drawn into his house, was with his wife and children murdered, and his house spoiled. About forty-five were in that tumult murdered, and their bodies contumeliously used.

In a town called Penna, 300 (notwithstanding the safety of their lives was promised them) were cruelly murdered by Spaniards, which were newly come to serve the French king; who also killed certain women there: scoffingly saying, that they were Lutheran men, dissembling their sex by their apparel.

The town of Nonne being yielded to the papists, upon condition that the foreign soldiers should depart safe with horse and armour, leaving their ensigns, and that the enemy's soldiers that were footmen should not enter into the town, and that no harm should be done to the townsmen; but that they might (if they would) go into the castle; after the yielding of it, the gates were set open, and straight they came to murdering and spoiling, without any regard of the foresaid conditions. Men and women without difference were killed; the streets founded with miserable mourning, blood flowing in the ways, and the lascivious soldiers' swords shining in the flames of fire, which they had cast upon the houses. Many were cruelly killed, being thrown down headlong from on high. Among others, this example of inordinate filthiness and cruelty is reported: a certain woman being drawn out of a private place, into which to avoid the rage of the soldiers she had fled with her husband, was in his sight shamefully defiled: and then being commanded to draw a sword, not knowing to what end, was forced by others, who ordered her hand, to give her husband a deadly wound, whereof he died; the soldiers not being content to defile her body, but also to make her to defile her hand with the slaughter of her husband.

At Samarobridge, in Picardy, in the time of peace, above 100 protestants were murdered: and at Antissiodore, which the protestants having held in the last war, had now yielded up, 150 were cruelly killed, and their dead bodies were drawn, and cast partly into jakes, and partly into the river.

Bordis, a captain under the prince of Conde, at Mirabellum, was contrary to promise cruelly killed, and his naked body cast into the street, that, being unburied, the dogs might eat it.

The prince of Conde being taking prisoner, and his life promised him, was shot in the neck by Montisquius, captain of the duke of Anjou's guard, of whom Thuanus writeth thus: This was the end of Lewis Bourbon, prince of Conde, of the King's blood, a man above the honour of his birth, most honourable in courage and virtue; who in valour, constancy, wit, wisdom, experience, courtesy, eloquence, and liberality, all which virtues excelled in him, had few his equals, and none, even by the confession of his enemies, superior to him.

Robert Stuart (a valiant Scottish gentleman) being taken prisoner, was notwithstanding stabbed with daggers, and killed.

At Orleans, 100 men and women being committed to prison, were, by the furious people that rushed in, most cruelly murdered.

Hitherto, out of the history of Jacobus Augustus Thuanus (who is reported to be a catholic), which endeth in the year 1578, wherein I have for shortness sake omitted sundry particular outrages and murders committed by that bloody Babylonical generation; from whose bloody hands, God in mercy defend and preserve us.

The HISTORY of ROBERT OGUIER and his WIFE, BAUDICON and MARTIN their two SONS, who were burned at LISLE, in FLANDERS.

UPON Saturday, March 6, 1556; between nine and ten o'clock in the night, the provost of the city with his serjeants, armed themselves to make search, if they could find any met together in houses; but then there was no assembly. Therefore they came to the house of Robert Oguier, which was a little church, for all both great and small, men-servants and maids, were familiarly instructed there in the knowledge of God.

Being entered into the said house, and seeking here and there for their prey, they found certain books which they carried away. But he whom they principally aimed at was not then in the house; namely, Baudicon, the son of the said Robert Oguier, who at that time was gone abroad to commune and talk of the word of God with some of the brethren, as he often used to do. Returning home, he knocked at the door; Martin, his younger brother, watching his coming, bade him be gone: but Baudicon, thinking his brother mistook him for some other, said, It is I, open the door: with that the serjeants opened the same, and let him in, saying, Ah, sir, you are well met; to whom he answered, I thank you, my friends, you are also welcome hither. Then said the provost, I arrest you all in the emperor's name; and with that commanded each of them to be bound, to wit, the husband and his wife with their two sons, leaving their two daughters to look to the house, and confined them in several prisons. Within a few days after, the prisoners were presented before the magistrates of the city, and examined concerning their course of life, who directed their speech first to Robert Oguier, in these words: It is told us that you never come to mass, yea, and also dissuade others from coming thereto; we are further informed that you maintain conventicles in your house, causing erroneous doctrines to be preached there, contrary to the ordinance of our holy mother the church, whereby you have transgressed the laws of his Imperial majesty.

Robert Oguier answered, Whereas first of all you lay to my charge that I go not to mass; I refuse so to do indeed, because the death and precious blood of the Son of God, and his sacrifice, is utterly abolished there, and trodden under foot; "For Christ by one sacrifice hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." The apostle saith by one offering. For do we read in all the scriptures, that either the prophets, Christ, or any of his apostles, ever said mass? For they knew not what it meant. Christ indeed instituted the holy supper, in which all christian people do communicate together, but they sacrificed not. If you please to read the Bible over, you shall never find the mass once mentioned therein. And therefore it is the mere invention of men. You know then what Christ saith, "In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." If either myself, or any of mine had been at mass, which is ordained by the commandment of men, Christ would have told us, "We had worshipped him in vain."

As for the second accusation, I cannot nor will deny, but there have met together in my house honest people fearing God; I assure you not with intention to wrong or harm any, but rather for the advancement of God's glory, and the good of many. I knew indeed that the emperor had forbidden it, but what then? I knew also that Christ in his gospel had commanded it. "Where two or three, saith he, are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Thus you see I could not well obey the emperor, but I must disobey Christ. In this case then, I chuse rather to obey my God, than man.

One of the magistrates demanded what they did when they met together. To which Baudicon, the eldest son, answered, If it please you, my masters, to give me leave, I will open the business at large unto you.

The sheriffs seeing his promptness, looking one upon another, said, Well, let us hear it then. Baudicon lifting up his eyes to heaven, began thus: When we meet together in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to hear the word of God, we first of all prostrate upon our knees before God, and in the humility of our spirits do make a confession of our sins before his Divine Majesty. Then we pray that the word of God may be rightly divided, and purely preached: we also pray for our sovereign lord the emperor, and for all his honourable counsellors, that the common-wealth may be peaceably governed to the glory of God; yea, we forgot not you whom we acknowledge our superiors; intreating our good God for you, and for this whole city, that you may maintain it in all tranquillity. Thus I have exactly related unto you what we do: think you now, whether we have offended so highly in this matter of our assembling.

Whilst they were thus examined, each of them made an open confession of the faith which they held. After this, being returned again to prison, they not long after were put to the torture, to make them confess who they were that frequented their house, but they would discover none, unless such as were well known to the judges, or else were at that time absent. About four or five days after, they were convened again before their judges, namely, the father and his two sons; and after many words passed, they asked them whether they would submit themselves to the will of the magistrates. Robert Oguier, and Baudicon his son, with some deliberation said, Yea, we will.

Then demanding the same of Martin, the younger brother, he answered, That he would not submit himself thereto, but would accompany his mother; so he was sent back again to prison, whilst the father and the son were sentenced to be burnt alive to ashes. Now as they went to receive the sentence, one of the judges sitting in his place, after sentence pronounced, said, To-day you shall go to dwell with all the devils in hell-fire (which he spake as one transported with fury in beholding the great patience of these two servants of Christ); having received the sentence of death, they were returned to the prison from whence they came, being joyful that the Lord did them that honour to be enrolled in the number of his martyrs. They no sooner entered the prison, than a band of friars came thither: one amongst the rest told them, the hour was come in which they must finish their days. Robert Oguier and his son answered, We know it well; but blessed be the Lord our God, who now delivering our bodies out of this vile prison, will receive our souls into his glorious and heavenly kingdom.

One of the friars, whose name was Lazard, endeavoured to turn them from their faith, saying, Father Robert, thou art an old man, let me intreat thee in this thy last hour to think of saving thine own soul; and if thou wilt give ear unto me, I warrant thee thou shalt do well.

The old man answered, Poor man, how darest thou attribute that to thyself which belongs to the eternal God, and so rob him of his honour? For it seems by thy speech, that if I will hearken to thee, thou wilt become my saviour. No, no, I have one only Saviour, Jesus Christ, who by and by will deliver me from this miserable world. I have one doctor, whom the heavenly Father hath commanded me to hear, and I purpose to hearken to none other.

A friar, called the father of St. Clare, exhorted him to take pity of his soul which Christ hath redeemed: Thou willest me, said Robert, to pity mine own soul, dost thou not see what pity I have on it, when for the name of Christ I willingly abandon this body of mine to the fire, hoping to-day to be with him in paradise? I have put all my confidence in God, and my hope wholly is fixed upon the merits of Christ, his death and passion, he will direct me the right way to his kingdom. I believe whatsoever the holy prophets and apostles have written, and in that faith will I live and die.

The friar hearing this, said, Out, dog, thou art not worthy the name of a christian; thou and thy son with thee are both resolved to damn your bodies and souls with all the devils in the bottom of hell.

As they were about to separate Baudicon from his father, he said, Let my father alone, and trouble him not thus; he is an old man, and hath an infirm body, hinder him not, I pray you, from receiving the crown of martyrdom.

Baudicon was then conveyed into a chamber apart, and there being stripped of his clothes, was fitted to be sacrificed; now as one brought him gunpowder to put to his breast, an odd fellow standing by, said, Wert thou my brother, I would sell all that I am worth to buy faggots to burn thee, thou findest but too much favour. The young man answered, Well, sir, the Lord shew you more mercy. Some that were present, saying, Good God, is it not a pitiful sight to behold these poor men? a doctor standing by, answered, And what pity would you have shewed toward them? I would, instead of allowing them this powder, have them fried on gridirons, as St. Laurence was.

Whilst they spake thus to Baudicon, some of the friars closed in with the old man, persuading him at least to take a crucifix into his hands, lest the people (said they) should murmur against you; adding further, that he might for all that lift up his heart to God, because you know, said they, it is but a piece of wood.

Thus they fastened it between his hands, but as soon as Baudicon was come down, and espied what they had done to his father, he said, Alas, father, what do you now, will you play the idolator even at our last hour? And then pulling the idol out of his hands which they had fastened therein, he threw it away, saying, What cause hath the people to be offended at us, for not receiving a Jesus Christ of wood? We bear upon our hearts the cross of Christ the Son of the ever-living God, feeling his holy word written therein in letters of gold.

As they were led to execution, a band of soldiers were attendant upon them, no less than if a prince had been conducted into his kingdom. Being come to the place where they were to suffer, they ascended up the scaffold which was there prepared for them. Then Baudicon asked leave of the sheriffs to make a confession of his faith before the people. Answer was made, that he was to look unto his spiritual father and confessor: Confess yourself (said they) to him. He was then hauled rudely to the stake, where he began to sing the 16th Psalm. The friar cried out, Do you not hear, my masters, what wicked errors these heretics sing, to beguile the people with. Baudicon hearing what he said, replied thus; Now, simple idiot, callest thou the psalms of the prophet David errors? But no wonder, for thus you are wont to blaspheme against the Spirit of God.

Then turning his eyes towards his father, who was about to be chained to the stake, he said, Be of good courage, father, the worst will be past by and by. As the executioner was fastening him to the post, he happened to hit him with his hammer on the foot, to make him stand nearer to the same. The old man being sensible of the blow, said, Friend, thou hurtest my foot, why dost thou abuse me thus? The friar hearing this, said, Ah, these heretics; they would be counted martyrs forsooth; but if they be but touched a little, they cry out as though they were killed. To which Baudicon thus replied: Think you then that we fear the tormentors? No such matter; for had we feared the same, we had never exposed our bodies to this so shameful and painful a kind of death.

Then he often reiterated these short breathings, O God, Father everlasting, accept the sacrifice of our bodies, for thy well beloved Son Jesus Christ's sake. One of the friars cried out, Heretic, thou liest, he is none of thy Father, the devil is thy father. And thus, during these conflicts, he bent his eyes to heaven, and speaking to his father, said, Behold, I see the heavens open, and millions of angels ready prest to receive us, rejoicing to see us thus witnessing the truth in the view of the world. Father, let us be glad and rejoice, for the joys of heaven are set open to us.

Then said one of the friars, I see hell open, and millions of devils present to carry you thither. But the Lord, who never forsakes any that put their trust in him, stirred up the heart and opened the mouth of a poor man who stood among the multitude, beholding this spectacle, who being moved with compassion, cried aloud, Be of good comfort, Baudicon, stand thou to it, thou fightest in a good quarrel, I am on thy side; after which words he departed thence; and a way being made for him, saved himself from danger.

Fire was forthwith put to the straw and wood, which burnt beneath, whilst they (not shrinking from the pains) spake one to another; Baudicon often repeating this in his father's ears, "Faint not, father, nor be afraid; yet a very little while, and we shall enter into the heavenly mansions."

In the end, the fire growing hot upon them, the last words they were heard to pronounce, were, Jesus Christ, thou Son of God, into thy hands we commend our spirits. And thus these two slept sweetly in the Lord.

In eight days after, Jane the mother, and Martin her son, were executed in the same city.

But before we come to describe their happy ends, we will, as briefly as we can, take notice by the way, of the very great conflicts of spirit which both of them sustained.

There were sent unto them many of the popish rabble, to turn them from their faith. Now that this their devilish enterprize might the better be effected, they separated the one from the other, by the politic advice of a monk; the poor woman began to waver, and let go her first faith. At this their enemies rejoiced not a little, whilst the poor little flock of Christ, hearing such sad news, were in continual perplexity, but the Lord left them not in their mournful condition.

On a day one of the monks waited on her in the prison, counselling her to win her son Martin, and to draw him from his errors; which she promised to do. But when he was come to his mother, and perceived that she was not only fallen, but also quite turned out of the right way, he began with tears to bewail her miserable state.

O mother, said he, what have you done? Have you denied him who hath redeemed you? Alas, what evil hath he done you, that you should requite him with this so great an injury and dishonour? Now I am plunged into that woe, which I have most feared. Ah, good God, that I should live to see this, which pierceth me to the very heart.

His mother hearing these his pitiful complaints, and seeing the tears which her son shed for her, began again to renew her strength in the Lord, and with tears cried out, O Father of mercies, be merciful unto me a miserable sinner, and cover my transgression under the righteousness of thy blessed Son; Lord, enable me with strength from above, to stand to my first confession, and make me to abide stedfast therein even unto my last breath.

It was not long before this change, that the same instruments of Satan, who had seduced her, came in, supposing to find her in the same mind wherein they left her: whom she no sooner espied, but with detestation said, Away, Satan, get thee behind me: for henceforth thou hast neither part nor portion in me. I will, by the help of God, stand to my first confession; and, if I may not sign it with ink, I will seal it with my blood.

blood. And so, from that time, this frail vessel, who for a while relented, after her recovery, grew stronger and stronger.

The judges, seeing their constancy, delayed not to dispatch them out of the way, condemning them to be burned alive, and their bodies being reduced to ashes, the same to be scattered and dispersed in the air. The mother and the son having heard their sentence read, in the way as they were going back again to prison, said, Now blessed be our God, who causeth us thus to triumph over our enemies: this is the wished-for hour, our gladsome day is come; let us not then, said Martin, forget to be thankful for the honour he doth us, in thus conforming us unto the image of his Son. Let us remember those who have traced this path before us: for this is the high-way to the kingdom of heaven. Let us then, good mother, go on boldly out of the camp with the Son of God, bearing his reproach, with all his holy martyrs; for so we shall find passage into the glorious kingdom of the everlasting God.

Some of the company hearing, but not being able to brook these words, said, We see now, thou heretic, that thou art wholly possessed, body and soul, with a devil; as was thy father, and thy brother, who are both in hell. Martin said, Sirs, as for your railings and curfings, our God will this day turn them into blessings, in the sight of himself and of his angels.

A certain temporizer said to Martin, Thou silly youth, thou sayest thou knowest not what; thou art too much conceited of thyself, and of thy cause. Seest thou not all these people here about thee? what thinkest thou of them? They believe not as thou dost, and yet I doubt not but they shall be saved. But you imagine to do that which will never come to pass, though you pretend ever so much that you are in the faith, and have the scriptures for you.

The good woman hearing this, answered, Sir, Christ Jesus our Lord saith, that it is the wide gate and broad way which leads to destruction, and therefore many go in thereat: but the gate, saith she, is narrow that leads to life, and few there be that find it. Do ye then doubt whether we are in the straight way or no, when ye behold our sufferings? Would you have a better sign than this, to know whether we are in the right way or no? Compare our doctrine with that of your priests and monks: we, for our parts, are determined to have but one Christ, and him crucified; we only embrace the scriptures of the Old and New Testament. Are we deceived in believing that which the holy prophets and apostles have taught?

Soon after, Martin and his mother were bound and brought to the place of their martyrdom: his mother having ascended the scaffold, cried to Martin, Come up; come up, my son. And as he was speaking to the people, she said, Speak out, Martin, that it may appear to all that we do not die heretics. Martin would have made a confession of his faith, but could not be suffered. His mother being bound to the stake, spake in the hearing of the spectators, We are christians; and that which we now suffer, is not for murder nor theft, but because we will believe no more than that which the word of God teacheth us: both rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer for the same.

The fire being kindled, the vehemency thereof did nothing cool or abate the fervency of their zeal, but they continued constant in the faith, and with lifting up their hands to heaven, in an holy accord said, Lord Jesus, into thy hand we commend our spirits. And thus they blessedly slept in the Lord.

A brief RELATION of the MASSACRE at VASSY, in the COUNTRY of CHAMPAIGNE, in FRANCE.

THE duke of Guise being arrived at Joinville, asked some that he was familiar with, whether those of Vassy used to have sermons preached constantly by their minister. It was answered, they had, and that they increased daily more and more. At the hearing of which report, he fell into a grievous passion; and upon Saturday, the last day of February, 1562, that he might the more covertly execute his conceived wrath against the religious sort at Vassy, he departed from Joinville, accompanied with the cardinal of Guise, his brother, and those of their train, and lodged in the village of Dammartin the Free, which is distant from Joinville about two French miles and an half.

The next day, being Sunday, after he had heard mass very early in the morning, being attended with about two hundred men, armed with harquebusses, pistols, and cutlasses, he left Dammartin, passing along to Vassy. As he went by the village of Bronzeval, which is distant from Vassy a short quarter of a mile, the bell (after the usual manner) rang for sermon. The duke hearing it, asked those he met, why the bell rang so loud at Vassy; they told him it was to give the people warning of the sermon which was to be preached there. Then one, called La Montague, said, It is for the assembling of the Hugonots; adding moreover, that there were many in the said Bronzeval who frequented the sermons preached at Vassy; and, therefore, that the duke would do well to begin there, and offer them violence. But the duke answered, March on, march on, we shall take them amongst the rest of the assembly. Many who followed the duke, namely, pages and footmen, rejoiced not a little concerning this bloody enterprise, not sticking to say, that the booty and pillage would fall to their shares; swearing by blood and wounds, that there would be good store of Hugonots there.

Now, there were certain soldiers and archers accompanying the duke, who compassed about Vassy; for having been mustered at Monthierender, instead of returning home, as they were wont to do after the muster was ended, they took their way thence to Vassy, most of them being lodged in the houses of papists. The Saturday before the slaughter, they were seen to make ready their weapons, harquebusses, and pistols; but the faithful not dreaming of such a conspiracy, thought the duke would offer them no hard measure, being the king's subjects; also, that not above two months before, the duke and his brethren passing by near unto the said Vassy, gave no sign of their displeasure.

The duke of Guise being arrived at Vassy, with all his troops, a young man, a shoemaker, stepped out of his house, not far from the door where the assembly was, Montague, pointing to him with his finger, said he was one of the ministers. Whereupon the duke called this shoemaker to him, and asked him, whether he was a minister, and of what university he was. He answered, that he was not of that calling, neither was he a scholar. Notwithstanding, he hardly escaped from this troop, which had environed him round about: only one of the company told him, that if he had been a minister, he had taken upon him a very base calling.

From thence, the duke La Brosse, and La Montague, passed on in the said city with their soldiers, as if they intended to take their way towards the village of Esclairon, where it was given out they meant to dine. But passing by the market-house of Vassy, which is near the monastery, in the way leading to Esclairon, he turned and went directly towards the common-hall, or market-house, and then entered into the monastery; where, having called to him one Desfalses, the prior of Vassy, and another whose name was Claud le Sain, being provost of the said Vassy, he talked a while with them, and issuing hastily out of the monastery, was attended by many of his followers. Then command was given to such as were papists, to retire into the monastery, and not to be seen in the streets, unless they would venture the loss of their lives. The duke perceiving others of his retinue to be walking to and fro under the town-hall, and about the church-yard, commanded them to march on towards the place where the sermon was, being in a barn, about an hundred paces distant from the monastery, quite opposite to that way which the duke should have taken to Esclairon. This command was by and by put in execution by such of the the company as went on foot going directly thither. He that marched foremost of this rabble, was La Brosse, and on the side of these marched the horsemen, after whom followed the duke with another company of his own followers, likewise those of the cardinal of Guise, his brother.

By this time, Mr. Leonard Morel, the minister, after the first prayer ended, and having begun his sermon before his auditors, which might amount to about 1200 persons, consisting of men, women, and children; the horsemen first approaching to the barn within about twenty-five paces, shot off two harquebusses right upon those who were placed in the galleries joining to the windows. The people within perceiving that, endeavoured to shut the door, but were prevented by the ruffians rushing in upon them, who drawing their swords, furiously cried out, Death of God, kill, kill these Hugonots.

The first they seized on was a poor crier of wine, that stood next the door, asking him if he were not a Hugonot; and in whom he believed. Having answered, that he believed in Jesus Christ, they smote him twice with a sword, which felled him to the ground. Having got up again, thinking to recover himself, they struck him the third time; whereby, being overcharged with wounds, he fell down, and died instantly. Two other men, at the same time, were slain at the entry of the said door, as they were pressing out to escape.

Then did the duke of Guise, with his company, violently enter in among them, striking the poor people down with their swords, daggers, and cutlasses, not sparing any age or sex: besides, they within were so astonished, that they knew not which way to turn them, but running hither and thither, fell one upon another, flying as poor sheep before a company of ravening wolves entering in among the flock.

Some of the murderers shot off their pieces against them that were in the galleries; others cut in pieces such as they lighted upon; some had their heads cleft in twain, their arms and hands cut off; so that many of them gave up the ghost even in the place. The walls and galleries of the said place were dyed with the blood of those who were every where murdered: yea, so great was the fury of the murderers, that part of the people within were forced to break open the roof of the house, in hopes they might save themselves upon the top thereof.

Being got thither, and then fearing to fall again into the hands of these cruel tygers, some of them leaped over the walls of the city, which were very high, flying into the woods and amongst the vines, which with most expedition they could soonest attain unto; some hurt in their arms, others in their heads, and other parts of their bodies. The duke presented himself in the house with his sword drawn in his hand, charging his men to kill especially the young men. Only, in the end, women with child were spared. And pursuing those who went upon the house tops, they cried, Come down, ye dogs, come down, using many cruel threatening speeches to them.

The cause why women with child escaped, was, as the report went, for the duchess's sake, his wife, who, passing along by the walls of the city, and hearing so hideous outcries amongst these poor creatures with the noise of the pieces and pistols continually discharging, sent in all haste to the duke her husband with much intreaties to cease his persecution, for frightening women with child.

During this slaughter, the cardinal of Guise remained before the church of the said city of Vassy, leaning upon the walls of the church-yard, looking towards the place where his followers were busied in killing and slaying whom they could. Many of this assembly being thus hotly pursued, did in the first brunt save themselves upon the roof of the house, not being discerned by those who stood without: but at length, some of this bloody crew espying where they lay hid, shot at them with long pieces, wherewith many of them were hurt and slain. The household servants of Dessalles, prior of Vassy, shooting at the people on the roof, caused them to fall down like pigeons: one of that wretched company was not ashamed to boast, after the massacre was ended, that he for his part had caused six at least to tumble down in that pitiful plight, saying, that if others had done the like, not many of them could possibly have escaped.

The minister, in the beginning of the massacre, ceased not to preach, till one discharged his piece against the pulpit where he stood, after which, falling down upon his knees, he intreated the Lord not only to have mercy upon himself, but also upon his poor persecuted flock. Having ended his prayer, he left his gown behind him, thinking thereby to keep himself unknown: but whilst he approached towards the door, in his fear he stumbled upon a dead body, where he received a blow with a sword upon his right shoulder. Getting up again, and then thinking to get forth, he was immediately laid hold of, and grievously hurt on the head with a sword, whereupon being felled to the ground, and feeling himself mortally wounded, he cried, Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit, for thou hast redeemed me, thou God of truth.

While he thus prayed, one of this bloody crew ran upon him, with an intent to have ham-stringed him; but it pleased God his sword broke in the hilt. Now, to let you understand by what means he was delivered from so terrible a death: two gentlemen taking knowledge of him, said, He is the minister, let him be conveyed to my lord duke. These leading him away by both the arms, brought him before the gate of the monastery, from whence the duke, and the cardinal his brother, coming forth, said, Come hither; and asked him, saying, Art thou the minister of this place? Who made thee so bold to seduce this people thus? Sir, said the minister, I am no seducer, for I have preached to them the gospel of Jesus Christ. The duke perceiving that this answer condemned his cruel outrages, began to curse and swear, saying, Death of God, doth the gospel preach sedition? Provost, go and let a gibbet be set up, and hang this fellow.

At which words the minister was delivered into the hands of two pages, who misused him vilely. The women of the city, being ignorant papists, caught up dirt to throw in his face, and with extended outcries, said, Kill him, kill this varlet, who hath been the cause of the death of so many. Much ado there was to hold off the women from being revenged upon the poor minister.

Whilst the pages had him thus in their handling, the duke went into the barn, to whom they presented a great Bible, which they used for the service of God. The duke taking it into his hands, calling his brother the cardinal, said, Lo, here the title of the Hugonot books. The cardinal viewing it, said, There is nothing but good in this book, for it is the Bible, to wit, the holy scriptures. The duke being offended, that his brother suited not to his humour, grew into a greater rage than before, saying, Blood of God, how now? What! the holy scripture. It is one thousand five hundred years ago since Jesus Christ suffered his death and passion, and it is but a year since these books were imprinted, how then say you that this is the gospel? By the death of God, you say you know not what. This unbridled fury of the duke displeased the cardinal, so that he was heard secretly to mutter, An unworthy brother.

This massacre continued a full hour, the duke's trumpeters sounding the while two several times. When any of these desired to have mercy shewed them for the love of Jesus Christ, the murderers in scorn would say unto them, You use the name of Christ, but where is your Christ now? And when they said, Lord God, they blasphemously would say, Lord devil.

There died in this massacre, within a few days, fifty or threescore persons; besides these, there were about two hundred and fifty, as well men as women, that were wounded and spoiled, whereof some died, one losing a leg, another an arm, another his fingers. The poor's box, which was fastened to the door of the church with two iron hooks, was wrested thence, with twelve twelve pounds therein, and never restored again. Nothing was to be seen in the streets but women with their hair hanging about their ears, faces besmeared with blood, being wounded in many places with swords and daggers, with weeping and lamentations. Barbers and surgeons were set on work, that he that had least had threescore under his hand to be dressed, and many perished for want thereof.

The minister was kept close prisoner, so that for four and twenty hours none were permitted to supply him with any necessities at all, nor any suffered to see him or speak with him, and was often threatened by his keepers to be sewed up in a sack and drowned. Fain would they have drawn him to have kept his Easter after the popish manner, under fair promises of his enlargement; but he would by no means consent thereto. Thus he continued a prisoner until the 8th day of May, 1563, at which time he was set free at the suit of the most illustrious prince of Portien.

Whilst the duke was at Esclairon, the lackeys and others of his servants put to sale, unto such as would give most, cloaks, hats, girdles, coifs, handkerchiefs, with other things which they had robbed the massacred of; crying them with a loud voice, as if a common crier had cried household goods to be sold.

Of the Coming of JANE, QUEEN of NAVARRE, to the CITY of PARIS, in FRANCE, with the MANNER of her SICKNESS and DEATH there.

THIS good queen, before she could be drawn to come to Paris to solemnize the marriage of her son the prince of Navarre, with the sister of Charles the Ninth, then king of France, received letters upon letters from the said king, to accompany the prince her son in that solemnity: now, whereas she had some doubts concerning her son's marriage with one of another religion, the king assured her that all things should be so wrought, as should give her good satisfaction and content; promising that he would get a dispensation from the pope to that end. But when the queen understood that the king was minded to have this marriage solemnized at Paris, she would by no means hear of it; For I will not, said she, put any confidence in so mutinous a people, being the sworn enemies both of myself and mine.

Still the king persisted in his suit for the obtaining of the same at her hands. Also having intelligence by some of his agents, that the queen of Navarre began a little to waver, he solicited her yet once again to come, assuring her that all things should be carried in such a peaceable manner, that she should have no cause to complain. At length the queen came from Rochelle to Blois, in the month of March, 1572, with great attendance, where it is incredible to think what a welcome she received on all sides, especially from the king and his brothers, &c. who yet, when all was done, could say to his mother, Now, madam, have I not acquitted myself well? Let me alone, and I will bring them all into the net.

In April following the articles were concluded concerning the marriage of the prince of Navarre with the king's sister. In the beginning of May, the king solicits the queen of Navarre again to come to Paris, for preparing of things fitting for this marriage; which she accordingly yielded unto, and parting from Blois on the sixth of the said month, came to Paris on the fifteenth of the same.

The queen-mother could by no means abide this good queen; and therefore not finding with what colour she could dispatch her with the rest, and yet fearing the height of her spirit if she should survive, as also that she could not then so work upon the flexibility of the prince her son as she intended, she consulted with one Rene, an apothecary, whose practice it was to poison things; who by such means ventured to poison the prince of Conde by the scent of a poisoned apple, which upon some suspicion was first tried upon a dog; and it had almost cost the prince's surgeon his life, by smelling too nigh thereunto. This Rene, selling to the queen of Navarre his perfumed drugs, found the way how to poison her therewith, although others thought the contrary. But the said Rene was heard afterwards to make his brags, that he had the like in store for two or three more, who suspected no such matter.

On Wednesday, June the 4th, the queen fell sick of a continual fever, and kept her bed; which proceeded, as it was given out, from her incessant grief, which by long continuance brought on an imposthume, she being also distempered with the heat of the season and her extraordinary long journies. This burning fever grew so strong upon her, that within five days after she died, to the great grief of the better sort, but the joy of the secret council.

The malady indeed was in her brain, which was not searched: in which the queen-mother had an hand, though she seemed much to mourn for the affliction of her good friend. Now forasmuch as in the time of her sickness, she manifested with what spirit she was guided, we will here set down the true narration of her behaviour, both in sickness, and at her death.

Perceiving that she could not long continue, she made herself ready to receive from the hand of God that which he had appointed concerning her: and to that end requested she might have such about her, as might comfort her in this case out of the word of God, as also to pray with her and for her, according to that which St. James saith, Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over such a one, knowing that the fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much with God.

Thus, according to her desire, a minister resorting unto her, shewed out of the scriptures, That christians ought in all things to submit themselves to the will of God as to the Father of spirits, that they might live. And although the rigour of his chastisements doth sometimes seem to our flesh, as if they were sent for no other end but our ruin and destruction; yet ought we to consider, that because he is just, he can do nothing but justly; and being a Father, he cannot but therein seek the welfare of his afflicted children.

To which she replied, I take all this as sent from the hand of God, my most merciful Father; nor have I, during this extremity, feared to die, much less murmured against him for inflicting the same upon me; knowing, that whatsoever he doth, he doth the same so as all in the end shall turn to my everlasting good.

The minister continuing in his speech, added, That the cause of sickness and diseases must be sought beyond the course of physick, which always looks to the corruption of the humours, or to the more noble parts of the body any way distempered: for howsoever it was not amiss to have respect to these things, as to second causes, yet ought we to ascend higher, namely, to the first, even to God himself, who disposeth of all his creatures as it pleaseth him. He it is that makes the wound and heals, that kills and makes alive. And therefore to him we ought to direct our prayers for comfort in all our griefs and sufferings, and in the end for full deliverance; seeing it is no hard matter with him to restore health unto us, if his good pleasure be such.

To this she answered, That she depended wholly upon God's providence, knowing that all things are wisely disposed by him, and therefore besought him to furnish her with all such graces as he saw to be necessary for her salvation. As for this life, said she, I am in a manner weaned from the love of it, in regard to the afflictions which have followed me from my youth hitherto, but especially because I cannot live without daily offending my good God, with whom I desire to be with all my heart.

The minister told her, that long life, how full of trouble soever it were, was notwithstanding to be esteemed among the blessings of God, seeing his promise implies so much; and not only so, but because our life may many ways serve to his glory, and is both an honour and a pledge of his favour, even as it is to him whom his prince employs long in his service, having had experience of his fidelity for many years together. In which respect she was earnestly requested to pray, That if it were the will of God to employ her yet longer in his service, for the further enlargement of his gospel, that he would grant unto her such recovery of health, and good disposition of body, that with renewed strength she might be encouraged to finish her course much more nobly than heretofore.

Whereupon she protested, that in regard of her own particular, her life was not dear unto her, seeing so long as she lived in this frail flesh, she was still prone and apt to sin against God: only her care was somewhat for her children (which God had given her), in respect they should so soon be deprived of her now in their young years; yet not doubting (though it should please God to take me from them) but that God himself will be a father and protector over them, as he hath been to me in my greatest afflictions; and therefore I commit them wholly to his government and fatherly care. These were her very words.

The minister blessed God to find her majesty in this assurance of faith; advising her to make choice of such, who, for their sincerity both in life and doctrine, might continue to water in these young princely plants the seeds of piety, which had been sown in them by her indefatigable care and industry; telling her, that it was to be hoped, that the example of her faith and constancy in the service of God, which she had set before them, would serve as a perpetual inducement to imitate her so noble virtues.

She again declared, That death was not terrible unto her, because it was the way by which we pass hence to our eternal rest. Upon this expression the minister told her, That christians had little cause to fear death, in regard they should not die at all, according to Christ's words in the gospel of St. John, "He that liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." For death (to speak properly) is no death to them, but a sleep, being often so called in the scriptures; and therefore Christ for their sakes hath overcome and triumphed over it in his own person: so as now we may cry out with St. Paul, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?"

She was often admonished by him to make confession of her sins before God, shewing, That bodily diseases tended to the dissolution of nature, and that death was the wages of sin; declaring moreover, that by this her chastisement she might discern what she had deserved, if God should now enter into judgment with her, not only in regard of the fall of our first parents, in which guilt she was enwrapped, as well as others, but also by her own personal sins, seeing the best of men or women in the world are in themselves but poor, miserable, and wretched offenders; yea, if the Lord should punish us according to our demerits, we could expect nothing at his hands but eternal death and condemnation.

At these words she began, with her hands and eyes lifted up to heaven, to acknowledge that her sins which she had committed against the Lord were innumerable; but yet she hoped that God for Christ's sake, in whom she put her whole trust, would be merciful unto her.

The minister, fearing his long discourse might be too tedious for her (and especially because the physicians thought it might be hurtful), held his peace; but her majesty earnestly requested him not to forbear speaking to her about these matters of life and eternal salvation; adding, that she now felt the want of it, in regard that since her coming to Paris, she had been somewhat remiss in hearing such exhortations out of the word of God: and therefore I am now the more glad (said she) to receive comfort out of it in this my so great extremity.

The minister then endeavoured to set before her the happiness of heaven, and what those joys are which the faithful there possess in the presence of God: which when the scriptures intend to discover unto us, they only tell us, that "The eye hath not seen, nor hath the ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what those things are, which God hath prepared for them that love him." To which purpose he used this similitude, That if a king, intending greatly to honour some noble personage, should bring him to his court, and there shew him his state and attendance, his treasures, with all his most precious jewels: even so, said he, will the Lord one day reveal to all his elect and faithful people, his magnificence and glory, with all the treasures of his kingdom, after he hath gathered them home to himself, decking and adorning them with light, incorruption, and immortality.

This happiness therefore being so great, her highness, he said, ought to be the less careful about the leaving of this transitory life, seeing that for an earthly kingdom, which she was now to forego, she should inherit an heavenly; and for temporal good things, which vanish and come to nothing in the using, she should for ever enjoy those that were eternal and everlasting: for her faith being now firmly settled upon our Lord Jesus Christ, she might be suffered to obtain everlasting salvation by him. On which words he took occasion to direct his speech more particularly unto her, saying:

Madam, do you verily believe that Jesus Christ came into the world to save you? And do you expect the full forgiveness of all your sins, by the shedding of his blood for you?

To which she readily answered, She did; believing that he was her only Saviour and Mediator, looking for salvation from none other, knowing that he hath abundantly satisfied for the sins of the whole world, and therefore was assured that God for his sake, according to his gracious promises in him, would have mercy upon her.

Thus you have in part the godly speeches which passed from this religious lady in the beginning of her sickness; all which was within the space of three or four days.

In the end, feeling her strength to decay more and more, she gave order to have her last will and testament made, wherein she above all wished, that her children might have but the grace to honour and fear the Lord, exhorting them constantly to continue in the profession of the gospel, in which they had been trained up from their youth; ordaining especially that her daughter, the princess, should be educated and instructed therein, by the four ladies which she had appointed, and brought with her out of Berne for that end and purpose. And being come to age, her desire was that she might be joined in marriage to some prince of the same religion, by the counsel and advice of the cardinal of Bourbon and Gasper, count of Colligny, admiral of France, whom she made executors and overseers of her said testament.

This good queen departed this life, to take possession of a far better, June 9, 1572, sweetly yielding up her spirit into the hands of God, the sixth day after she fell sick, and in the 44th year of her age.

After the death of the queen, certain princes were solicited by the king to give their attendance at Paris for the solemnizing the marriage of the prince of Navarre (now made king by the death of his mother), according to the ceremonies which were thereunto appertaining. Amongst the rest, letters were directed to the admiral by the king himself, to come to this marriage; wherein the king assured him he would not tarry long after him; willing him not to be afraid of the fury of the Parisians, nor of their threats, which they had formerly uttered against him: for he was not ignorant of the deadly hatred they bore him, and therefore wrote unto the mayor of the city, to look unto it at his peril, that the admiral had no wrong offered him by the citizens, either at his entrance, or continuance in the city.

The queen-mother and the duke of Anjou wrote unto the mayor also, and likewise to the rest of the magistrates, to the same effect, but especially to their servants, some whereof had a little light given them touching that device. To be short, they endeavoured to take all impediments out of his way, that he might with the less mistrust fall into the same.

The admiral, not fearing any perils, resolved to take his journey to Paris. Although he lacked not sundry adver-advertisements from his own followers, and others his well-wishers in the kingdom, who honoured him much, desiring him, that howsoever he had no sinister opinion of the king, of his mother, or any of their's, yet at the least he was to take into his consideration the place whither he went, and amongst what enemies he was now to venture himself. But he always leaning upon the testimony of a good conscience, and being confident in God's providence, not moved by these advertisements, took his journey to Paris with very few attendants. Being come thither, he was honourably received by the king and his brethren, and by the queen-mother, with others also.

The marriage of the king of Navarre with the king's sister, being solemnized on the 17th and 18th of August, 1572, and all the triumphs and feastings accompanying the same being finished, the admiral determining to take his leave at court, and so to return homewards, the deputies of the reformed churches brought him their requests on a sudden, to present the same to the king, in regard of many wrongs the said churches had sustained; and therefore they instantly besought him, that he would not leave the court till some order might be taken for redress thereof.

This, with other impediments, were the occasion of detaining him still there.

Mauravell, coming to Paris whilst these feasts lasted, having presented his service first to the king and his mother, the duke of Anjou, and the duke of Guise; after some speech had with the king and queen-mother, one named Chaill, had a command to direct him to the house whence the blow should be given; who left him with a woman in the house, which woman was forbidden not only to ask his name, but also so much as to inquire for what cause he was lodged there.

On Friday, the 22d of August, in the morning he trimmed up his harquebuss, watching secretly the admiral's coming.

The admiral at his going forth out of the Louvre, meeting the king coming out of a chapel which is before the same, passing thence to play at tennis, he scarcely had gone a hundred paces from the place, but as he returned to his lodging on foot to dine there, attended by twelve or fifteen gentlemen, reading a petition; out of the window of a lodging (where Villemur, tutor to the duke of Guise, usually lay) he was shot with an harquebuss, charged with three brass bullets, one of which took off the fore-finger of his right hand, and he was hurt with another in his left arm. Feeling himself thus wounded, he asked some of his followers to enter that house, and to inquire who it was that had done that, or who set him on work to do it; and then to inform the king thereof, giving him to understand how well his commandment was observed.

Now whilst they were busy to force open the door, the murderer fled out by a back way, escaping thence out of the gate of St. Anthony; where one attended him, holding a Spanish gennet, brought out of the duke of Guise's stable; whereon he galloped away, yet not without some difficulty: for flying thus in some fear, he fell off his horse twice or thrice.

A gentleman seeing the admiral hurt, came to support his left arm, binding up the hurt thereon with his handkerchief. And thus was he conducted to his lodging, which was distant from thence about twenty paces. In his passing, a gentleman said, It was to be feared the bullets were poisoned: to which the admiral replied, All must be as it pleaseth God.

The king hearing of the admiral's hurt, left his game, where he was playing till then with the duke of Guise, and throwing away his racket as it seemed in an anger, with a sad and heavy countenance withdrew himself into his chamber: the duke of Guise followed him within a little while after.

The king of Navarre, the prince of Conde, with many other of their religion, having notice of the admiral's hurt, complained to the king of this untimely accident; intreating they might have leave to depart out of the city, seeing they could expect little safety there. The king made great lamentations to them of the mischance that had happened, swearing and protesting that he would execute such impartial justice upon the offender, and on all the complotters, as should give the admiral and all his friends content; only he willed them to stay, promising them ere long to provide for their security.

The surgeons and physicians were presently sent for, amongst whom was Ambrose Pare, the king's surgeon, a man very expert. He began first with the admiral's finger, which put him to much pain, because the scissors were not sharp enough to cut it off at once; besides he was obliged to stop and open the wound thrice; then he began on the left arm, making incisions in two places into which the bullet had pierced. The admiral endured all this with an undaunted countenance, and wonderful patience; whilst those which stood by and saw him so mangled, could not refrain from tears. Captain Monins held him with both his arms about the middle; and Cornaton held his hands. He seeing them astonished, My friends, said he, why weep you? I think myself happy to be thus handled in the cause of God. And now casting his eyes upon a minister, called Merlin, he said, Here you see, my friend, God's blessings. I am hurt indeed; but I know it is come to pass by the will of my heavenly Father, humbly thanking his Majesty in that he is pleased to honour me so far, as to suffer any thing for his holy name. Let us pray unto him, that he would grant unto me the gift of perseverance.

Then looking upon the said minister, who wept over him; Oh, master Merlin, said he, what, will you not comfort me? Yes, sir, said he, for wherein may you take greater comfort, than in calling to mind how greatly God hath always honoured you, in esteeming you worthy to suffer reproach for his name's sake, and true religion? The admiral replied, Alas! if God should deal with me according to my deserts, he might have put me to worse torments than these. But blessed be his holy name, in that he is pleased to take pity on me his poor and unworthy servant. Be of good cheer then, sir, said another unto him; for seeing God hath spared your more noble parts, you have cause therein to magnify his goodness. In these wounds you have received from God a testimony of his love, rather than of his displeasure, seeing he hath preserved your head and understanding safe.

Then said Merlin, Sir, you do well in turning your thoughts away from him who hath committed this outrage upon you, in looking only unto God; for no doubt it is his hand that hath smitten you: therefore for the present, cease to think of the malefactor. I assure you, said the admiral, I do freely forgive him, from the bottom of my heart, and those also that are his abettors; being fully persuaded that none of them all could have done me the least hurt, no, though with violent hands they had put me to death. For what is death itself to God's children, but an assured passage to an eternal rest and life.

The king of Navarre and the prince of Conde having bitterly bewailed this outrage committed upon the admiral (as you heard before), about two o'clock in the afternoon, the king, accompanied with the queen-mother, his brother, and other of the lords, went to visit the admiral.

The king with tears seemed to be exceeding sorry for that which was come to pass, promising him, with one blasphemous oath upon another, to revenge the fact, no less than if it had been committed upon his own person: praying him to come and take up his lodging with him, in the Louvre, for his greater security and safety. Whereupon, the admiral, after some discourse made to the king in secret, gave him most humble thanks for so great a favour, as to visit him in his own person.

Upon the motion made by the king, Mazilles, his chief physician, was called, demanding of him, whether the admiral might safely be removed thence into the Louvre, or no? His answer to the king was, That it could not be done without danger. Some of the admiral's friends thought it fitting to request a guard of soldiers to be assigned by the king unto him for his better security. The king answered, he liked well that advice, being fully determined to provide for the admiral's safety as his own, and and would preserve him no less than the apple of his eye. After the king called for the bullet of brass, wherewith the admiral was hurt, that he might see it, asking whether he was not put to great pain when his finger was cut off, as likewise touching the dressing of his arm; now as Cornaton shewed the bullet, having his sleeve all bloody (because he was appointed to hold the admiral's arm, while it was in dressing), the king asked if that were of the admiral's blood? And whether so much blood issued out of his wounds? Adding (after Cornaton's answer), he never saw man in his life shew greater constancy and magnanimity of spirit than the admiral did.

Then was the queen-mother desirous to see the bullet, saying, I am glad the bullet is taken out. For I remember when the duke of Guise was killed before Orleans, the physician told me, that if the bullet was gotten out, there was no danger of death, though it were poisoned.

Then Cornaton answered, We have foreseen that, madam; for being careful to prevent that danger, the admiral had a medicine given him to expel the poison, if peradventure any such thing should be.

The Saturday before the admiral was slain, he began to be somewhat cheered, so that the surgeons and physicians gave out, they would warrant the admiral's life: because his arm, having lost but little of it's strength, would soon be healed. This news was brought to the king, who seemed to entertain the same joyfully. The new-married wife came also to visit the admiral. But all this was but a lightening before death. For that night there was heard a great clattering of armour in the city, and many torches lighted every where, borne by many of the people. Some gentlemen, whose lodgings were nigh to the admiral's, rose, and went out, asking some of their acquaintance the reason why there were so many up in arms at that hour of the night: they answered, that the king much desired to see a castle assailed and defended, devised only in sport to give him content. They passing yet further, came to the Louvre, where they likewise saw many torches lighted, and troops of armed men.

The guard there could no longer contain themselves, but began to pick a quarrel with them; and as one of the said gentlemen was about to speak, a Gascoine soldier struck him with a partizan, and then they fell upon the rest. The noise hereof spreading, the queen-mother said, Seeing it is not possible to retain the fury of the soldiers any longer from breaking out, let the bell of the church of St. Germain be tolled; which was the signal to begin the massacre.

The admiral coming to the knowledge of this uproar (though he had but few of his followers about him) was not much moved thereat; trusting (as he often used to say) upon the king's favour, whereof he had large experience. Also he knew that when the Parisians should understand how much the king disliked their folly, though they had an intention of doing him some mischief, yet would they be quieted as soon as they saw Cossens and his guard.

This Cossens was appointed by the duke of Anjou to defend the admiral's lodgings, wherein the old proverb was verified, That the wolf was set to keep the sheep.

About break of day, August the 24th, 1572, being St. Bartholemew's-day, they began to knock at the door where the admiral lay. La Bonne, who lay not far from him, having the keys, perceiving there were some who came on a message from the king to the admiral, came down quickly and opened the door; presently Cossens fell upon him and stabbed him with his dagger, so that he died. Then with his harquebussers rushing into the house, killing such as they met, others fled. Cornaton awaking with the noise that he heard at the door (for he lay in the next chamber), ran thither, causing the Switzers and other officers to fortify it. Cossens hearing that, cried to him to open it in the king's name, and he so handled the matter, that with the help he had, he forced the door open, and after gained the stairs. The admiral and those that were with him, taking notice how they shot off pistols and guns, finding themselves inclosed in their enemy's hands, fell to prayer, begging pardon of God for their sins.

The admiral rising out of his bed, and putting on his night-gown, commanded Merlin, the minister, to make the prayer. He also, earnestly calling upon Jesus Christ his God and Saviour, commended his spirit into his hands. He that testified these things, and made report thereof, coming into the chamber, and being asked by the admiral what that tumult meant; Sir, saith he, God is now summoning us to look to our end. The admiral seeing what would be the issue, answered, I have long since expected death: save yourselves if it be possible, for you cannot secure me; I commend my soul into the hands of the merciful God. Those who were present and escaped, have affirmed, that the admiral was no more affrighted at death, which he saw present before his eyes, than if there had been no likelihood thereof at all.

Forthwith every one in the chamber getting up to the top of the house, and having found a window near the roof, saved themselves there; but the greater part, who were beneath in the next room to the admiral, were slain, others miraculously escaped. In the meanwhile Cossens having made his way, caused certain Switzers of the duke of Anjou's guard to enter into the house.

Besine, Cossens, and Sarlabour, with their targets in one hand, and their naked swords in the other, broke open the admiral's chamber-door, and Besine (who was afterwards slain himself by one Bertoville upon the way, after he had escaped out of prison) coming towards the admiral, holding the point of his sword to his breast, said thus, Art not thou the admiral? I am the man, said he, with an undaunted courage, as the murderers afterwards confessed. Then beholding the naked sword, Young man, said the admiral, thou oughtest somewhat to respect my years, and my infirmity of body, but it is not thou that canst shorten my days. Besine desperately thrust the admiral into the body with his sword, and then smote him therewith on the head; the rest had every one a blow at him; so that he presently fell down wounded to death.

Whilst this mischief was acting, the duke of Guise being below in the base court, with other Romish catholic lords, cried to the murderer above, Besine, hast thou done? It is done, saith he. Then the duke replied, Monsieur, our knight, (meaning king Henry's bastard) will not believe unless he see it with his eyes; throw him down out of the window.

Then Besine and Sarlabour, lifting up the body of the admiral, cast him down unto them, where he lay naked on the ground, exposed to all sort of scorn and mocks of the multitude, some trampling on him with their feet. Now because the blow which Besine had given the admiral on his head, had so covered his face with blood issuing thence, that his visage could not be discerned, the duke of Guise stooping down took his handkerchief, and wiping his face therewith, said, It is he, I know him well enough; and giving this poor dead body a spurn on the head with his foot (whom all the murderers in France feared whilst he lived), he passed thence, encouraging his soldiers, saying, We have made a good beginning; now let us go on to the rest, for the king hath so commanded, the king hath so commanded, repeating it twice over.

An Italian of the duke of Nevers' guard cut off the admiral's head, and brought it to the king and queen-mother: which being embalmed, was sent to Rome to the pope, and to the cardinal of Lorraine, being there at that time. The common people on the next day cut off his hands and privy members, and then in this woful plight being dragged up and down three days in the channels throughout the streets, he was at last carried out of the city to a gibbet in mount Faucon, where they hanged him by the feet; from whence some that were well disposed, going together in the night to this gibbet, took down the body of the admiral; which they interred in so secret a manner, that the papists could never find it out, and it remains buried still, so that they were obliged to make a body of straw, and and hung that up instead of the body itself, rather than none at all.

The following is the sentence which the court of parliament in Paris denounced against Gasper Coligni, admiral of France, after he was massacred.

1. First, That for his conspiracy against the king and state, in the year 1572, the said court hath condemned him for high treason.

2. That his memory shall be utterly rased out.

3. If his body, or any figure thereof, shall be taken, that the same shall be first drawn upon a hurdle to the place called Le Grene, and there hanged on a gibbet.

4. After which a gibbet shall be set upon Mount-Faucon, and he there to be hanged in the most eminent place.

5. His arms and armour to be drawn at a horse's tail through the streets of the said city, and other cities where they shall be found, and there to be broken in pieces, as a sign of his perpetual ignominy.

6. All his goods and possessions to be forfeited to the king's use.

7. All his children to be pronounced ignoble; as also held unworthy of any honour or dignity whatsoever.

8. His house and castle of Chastillon, upon the Loin, the Base Court, and all appurtenances thereunto appertaining, to be defaced and demolished to the ground.

9. Then in the said place this sentence shall be set up engraven in brass.

10. Lastly, That on the 24th of August, 1572, general processions be made through the city of Paris, by way of thanksgiving to God for this punishment inflicted upon the conspirator.

Pronounced and executed at Paris, the 27th and 29th of October, 1572.

Signed, MALON.

At Rome solemn masses were sung, and thanks rendered unto God for the good success which the Roman catholics had obtained in massacring the Hugonots. At night, in token of joy and gladness, were made many great bonfires in sundry places: and, as the report went, the cardinal of Lorraine gave a thousand crowns to the person that brought him this welcome news.

The same day the admiral was hurt, the king advised the king of Navarre, his brother-in-law, to lodge in his chamber, with ten or twelve of his trustiest servants, to protect him from the designs of the duke of Guise, whom he called an unhappy boy.

The admiral before his death made his will, in which he gave the king counsel, that he should not give his brethren over-great portions. The queen-mother hearing this, and reading the same to the duke of Alençon the king's brother; Now you see, saith she, the heart of your friend the admiral, whom you so much loved and respected.

The duke answered, I know not how much he loved me, but I well perceive by this how much he loved the king.

The English ambassador made almost the like answer when the said queen told him, how the admiral had advised the king not to trust the English too far.

Indeed, madam, saith he, hereby it appeared that though he bare but little good-will to the English, yet he manifested himself a loyal servant to the crown of France.

The Sieur de Brion, governor of the young marquis Conde, son to the late prince of Conde, hearing these stirrs, taking his little master even in his shirt, thinking to convey him somewhere out of the way, met these murderers, who plucking from him the young prince, massacred the old man in his presence, whilst the prince with tears intreated them to spare his governor. But they dyed his white hairs in his own blood, and then barbarously dragged him through the mire.

It was credibly reported, that the number of the slain that Sunday morning, and two other days following, in the city of Paris, and in the suburbs, did amount to above ten thousand; counting lords, gentlemen, presidents, counsellors, advocates, lawyers, scholars, physicians, merchants, tradesmen, women, maids, and children. The streets were covered with dead bodies, the river was dyed with blood, the gates and entrance into the king's palace painted with the same colour: but the blood-thirsty were not yet satisfied; for they still continued to go from house to house with their associates, where they thought to find any Hugonots, they broke open the doors, then cruelly murdered whomsoever they met, sparing neither sex nor age. Carts were laden with dead bodies of young maidens, women, men, and children, which were discharged into the river, it being covered in a manner all over with the slain, and dyed with their blood, which also streamed down the streets from sundry parts thereof, whereat the courtizans laughed their fill, saying, that the wars were now ended, and that hereafter they should live in peace, &c.

An Account of MONSIEUR PIERRE DE LA PLACE.

Monsieur Pierre de la Place was president of the court of requests, whose story we will relate somewhat at large, because his singular piety requires it. On Sunday morning, about six o'clock, one captain Michael, harquebuffer to the king, came into his lodging, into which he had easy access, for divers private reasons.

The captain, being armed, presented himself before the said De la Place: the first words he said were, that the duke of Guise had slain the admiral by the king's appointment, with many Hugonots besides: and because the rest of them, of what quality soever, were destined to death, he was come to his lodging to exempt him from the common destruction: only he desired to have a sight of what gold and silver was in the house. The lord De la Place, somewhat amazed at his audacity, who, in the midst of ten or twelve persons who were present in the room, durst presume to utter such language, asked him if he knew where he was, or whether he thought there was a king or no?

To this the captain, blaspheming, answered, that he willed him to go with him to know the king's pleasure. The lord De la Place hearing this, fearing also some danger towards himself by sedition in the city, slipped forth at a back door behind his lodging, proposing to get into a neighbour's house. In the mean while, most of his servants vanished out of sight; and this captain, having stored himself with a thousand crowns, was intreated by the lady Marets, daughter to the said lord, to convey her father, with the lord Marets, her husband, into the house of some Roman catholic; which he consented to do, and also performed it.

After this, De la Place, being refused at three several houses, was constrained to retire back again into his own, where he found his wife very pensive, and grieved beyond measure, fearing lest this captain in the end should cast her son-in-law and daughter into the river, and also for the imminent danger wherein her dear husband and all his family were.

But the lord De la Place, being strengthened by the Spirit of God, with incredible constancy sharply rebuked her; and afterwards mildly demonstrated unto her, that we must receive these and the like afflictions from the hand of God; and so having discoursed a while on the promises of God, comforted her.

Then he commanded all his servants that were in the house to be called together; who being come into his chamber, according to his custom on the Lord's day, he made a form of exhortation to his family; then went to prayer, and began to read a chapter out of the book of Job, with the exposition, or sermon, of Mr. John Calvin upon it. So having spoken somewhat of God's mercy and justice, (which he, as a good and wise father, useth to exercise his elect with sundry chastisements, lest they should be intangled here below with the things of this world) he shewed how needful afflictions were for christians, and that it was beyond the power of Satan, or men, to hurt or wrong them, unless the Lord of his good pleasure gave them leave. What need have we then, said he, to dread their authority, which at the most can but prevail over our bodies? Then he went to prayer again, preparing himself and his whole family rather to endure all sorts of torments, yea, death itself, than to speak or do any thing that might tend to the dishonour of God.

Having finished his prayer, word was brought him, that Seneca, the provost marshal, with many archers, were at the door of his lodgings, commanding the same to be opened in the king's name, saying, that he came to secure the person of the lord De la Place, and to preserve his house from being pillaged by the common rabble. The lord De la Place having intelligence of this speech, commanded the door to be opened to him, who entering in, declared the great slaughter that was made upon the Hugonots every where in the city by the king's command; adding this withal in Latin, that he would not suffer one to live, Qui mingat ad Parietem. Yet have I express charge from his majesty, faith he, to see that you shall sustain no wrong, but only conduct you to the Louvre, because the king is desirous to be informed touching many things about the affairs of those of the religion, which he hath now in hand, and therefore willed him to make himself ready to go to his majesty. The lord De la Place answered, that it had always been his greatest wish, and nothing could render him more perfectly happy, than to gain any opportunity by which he might give an account to his majesty of his behaviour and actions.

But in regard that such horrible massacres were every where committed, it was impossible for him to pass to the Louvre, without the certain danger of his person; but prayed him to assure his majesty of his willingness to come, meanwhile leaving in his lodgings as many archers as he thought fitting, until the fury of the people was somewhat pacified. The provost agreed to this request, and left with him one of his lieutenants, called Toute Voye, with four of his archers.

Not long after, came into his lodging, president Charron, then provost of the merchants, with whom conferring a little in secret, going his way, he left with the four archers who were there before, four more of the city archers. The whole night following was spent in the stopping up, and fortifying of all passages from entering the house; with logs and flint stones stopping up the windows; so that it seemed by this so exact and diligent a defence, that the archers were left in the house to free the said De la Place, and all his family, from the common calamity; till Seneca returning the next day, after two o'clock in the afternoon, declared that he had express charge from the king to bring him to his majesty without delay. He replied as before, that it was dangerous as yet to pass through the city, in regard that even the same morning there was an house pillaged next to his.

Seneca on the contrary insisted, saying, It was the common speech of these Hugonots, to protest that they were the king's most loyal and obedient subjects and servants: but when they were to manifest their obedience to his commands, then they came off but slowly, seeming rather to abhor and detest it. And whereas he pretended danger, Seneca answered, that he should have a captain of Paris, who was well known to the people, to accompany him. As Seneca continued his speech, the captain of Paris, surnamed Pazon, a principal actor in this sedition, entered the chamber of the said lord of Place, offering his service to conduct him through the city to the king; which De la Place would by no means yield to, telling Seneca, that he was one of the most cruel and bloody-minded men in all the city; and therefore, seeing that he must needs go to the king, he intreated that the said Seneca would be his guard. To which Seneca answered, that having now other affairs to look unto, he could not conduct him above fifty paces.

Then his wife, (though otherwise a very gracious and good lady) out of that intire love which she bore to her husband, prostrated herself at the feet of the said Seneca, beseeching and intreating him to accompany her husband to the king; but the said De la Place, who never shewed any sign of a dejected spirit, came to his wife, took her up from the ground, rebuked her, and told her, that it was not an arm of flesh that we must stoop to, but unto God only. Then turning himself about, he perceived in his son's hat a white cross, which through infirmity he had placed there, thinking thereby to save himself, for which his father sharply chid him, commanding him to pluck that mark of sedition thence; telling him, that they must now submit themselves to bear the true cross of Christ, namely, those afflictions and tribulations which it shall please our good God to lay upon us, as sure pledges of that eternal happiness, which he hath treasured up for all his elect servants. Thus seeing himself pressed by the said Seneca, to go with him to the king, resolving upon death, which he saw he could not avoid, he took his cloak, embracing his wife, earnestly wishing her above all things to have the fear of God, and his honour, in precious esteem; and then boldly went on his way. Coming into the street where the glass-house stood, certain murderers, who attended for his coming, with their daggers in readiness, killed him, about three o'clock in the afternoon, as an innocent lamb, in the midst of ten or twelve of Seneca's archers, who led him into that butchery; and then pillaged and imbezzled away what they found in his lodging, for the space of five or six days together. The body (his soul was now received into heaven) being carried into a stable, they covered his face over with dung, and the next day threw him into the river.

Peter Ramus, the king's professor in logic, a man renowned among the learned, was not forgotten. He had many enemies, particularly one James Carpenter, who sent the murderers to the college of priests, where the said Ramus was hidden. But being discovered, he offered a good sum of money to save his life; yet he was massacred, and cast down from an high chamber window upon the ground, so that his bowels issued out on the stones, and were afterwards trailed through the streets; the carcass was whipped by certain scholars, being set on by their tutors, to the great disgrace of good literature, of which Ramus was an eminent professor.

A young man, who preferred his mother's safety in these broils to his own, about the age of thirty-two years, a sincere christian of excellent learning, going abroad early on this dreadful Sunday morning, upon some extraordinary occasion, and hearing the rumour about the death of the admiral throughout the city of Paris, he, out of his singular affection to his mother, hastened home with all possible speed, informing her what had happened, and without delay, not regarding his own safety, secured her in a place fit for the purpose. After which he went to prayers in his study, as his custom was, where being found, the furious massacres asked him, if he would obey the king; he answered, Yes, but I must also obey God. Then immediately they began with battle-axes and staves to load him with blows on the head, that he received his own blood into his hands; and then making an end of him, they threw him into the river.

Note, It could not be found that above two ministers were slain in this bloody massacre.

Philip le Doux, a great jeweller, at his return home from Guybray fair, being gone to bed, his wife at that time had the midwife attending upon her, being ready to be delivered: she hearing these furies below bouncing at the door, commanding it to be opened to them in the king's name; ill as she was, she ventured down, and opened the door to these tigers, who presently stabbed her husband in his bed. The midwife seeing them bent to murder the woman also, now ready to be delivered, intreated them to stay, at least till the infant (which would be the twentieth child that God had given her) was born. Having contested some time with them, they took this poor woman, half dead with fear, and thrust into her fundament a dagger to the the very hilt. She finding herself mortally wounded, and yet desirous to bring forth her fruit, ran into a corn-loft, whither they pursued her, stabbing her likewise in the belly, and then threw her out of a window into the street: upon which fall, the child came from her, head foremost, gaping and yawning, to the great astonishment and confusion of the papists, who were constrained often with detestation to acknowledge and confess the cruelties of their butchers.

One of the massacrers having snatched up a little child in his arms, the poor innocent babe began to play with his beard, and to smile upon him; but instead of being moved to compassion therewith, this barbarous wretch wounded it with his dagger, and threw it all in gore into the river.

At the massacre at Meaux in Brie, one Quintin Croyer, an elder of the reformed church, seeing many of his companions massacred before his eyes, kneeled down, praying unto God to pardon these murderers; at which prayer they fell a laughing, and not being able with their daggers to pierce a jerkin of double buff which he wore, and which they were loth to spoil, (for it was a good booty) they cut asunder the points, and then gave him five or six stabs with a dagger into his body; and so this good man, wounded to death, calling upon God, rendered up his spirit into the hands of him that gave it.

Faron Haren, at the same time, a man zealously affected to religion, who had been sheriff of the city in the first troubles, having by his endeavours chased the maïs out of Meaux, for a time was mortally hated of these seditious papists; and, therefore, they were not contented simply to kill him, but first cutting off his nose, ears, and secret parts, then giving him many small thrusts in divers parts of his body, they constrained him to and fro among them, as if he had gone through the pikes. But being weakened, and not able any longer to hold out, in consequence of the blood that issued from all parts of his body, calling upon the name of the Lord, he fell with his face to the ground, receiving infinite gashes and wounds after he was dead.

PERSECUTION of the FAITHFUL at TROIS, in CHAMPAIGNE.

NEWS coming to Trois of the massacre executed at Paris, the greater part of the judges and officers of the king were sent to the bailiff of Trois, with commandment diligently to make search for all those of the religion, from house to house, and to imprison as many as they could meet with.

In this city, there was a merchant, called Peter Belin, a man of a turbulent nature. This Belin was at the massacre in Paris, on St. Bartholomew's-day; from whence he was sent with letters from the king, dated the eight-and-twentieth day of August, to the mayor and sheriffs of Trois, to cause all these persecutions to cease, and the prisoners to be set at liberty. On the third of September, he came to Trois with these two letters, (which had been first published in Paris) with commandment to deliver them to the foresaid magistrates to be proclaimed there also.

But at the first entrance into the city, he began to inquire, that all might hear him, whether they had not executed the Hugonots there as they had done in Paris; which was his language through the streets till he came home. But even some of the papists, who were not so cruelly minded, demanded of Belin the contents of the king's letters, whereof they had some inkling before. But he, like a bedlam, swelling with choler, swore, that whosoever said they contained any thing tending to pacification, lied. Hastening, therefore, to the bailiff's house at Trois, after he had delivered him the packet, and buzzed somewhat in his ear, he put him on to see this execution done. Now, that the same might pass the better for current, the help of the executioner of Trois was requested, whose name was Charles.

Yet, he shewing himself more just and humane than the rest, peremptorily refused to have his hand in an act of so great cruelty; answering, that it was contrary to his office to execute any man before sentence of death had first been pronounced by the magistrates. If they had such sentence to shew against any of the prisoners, he would do his office; otherwise, he would not presume, without a warrant, to bereave any man of his life: and so with these words he returned home to his house.

Now albeit this answer, proceeding from such a kind of person, whose office and custom it was to shed blood, might somewhat have assuaged and taken off the edge of the most barbarous tiger in the world; yet the bailiff, slighting it, was the further enraged. Upon this, he sent for one of the jailors of the prison, who kept those of the religion; but he being sick of a tertian ague, Martin de Bures was sent to know his pleasure.

The bailiff telling him at large, what Belin had signified to him in private; as also, that on a sudden all the prisoners of the religion must be put to death, that the place might be purged of them: this, he said, you must not fail to do.

But this De Bures made no haste to perform his charge, acquainting no man with aught that passed between the bailiff and him; no, not Perennet the keeper, who then lay sick in his bed.

The next day the bailiff came into the prison, about seven o'clock, and calling for Perennet, asked of him, with a smile, Perennet, is it done? Perennet, knowing nothing more or less, asked of him, what? Then said the bailiff, Why, are not the prisoners dispatched? and thereupon was ready with his dagger to have stabbed him. But coming a little better to himself, he told Perennet what his purpose was, and how he was to behave himself concerning the execution thereof. At which words, Perennet standing amazed, (though otherwise he was a fellow forward enough of himself to commit any outrages against the protestants) certified to the bailiff, that such an inhuman act could not be committed over to him, fearing lest in time to come, justice might be followed against him by the parents or allies of the prisoners. No, no, said the bailiff, fear not, I will stand between you and all harms. Others of the justices have consented thereunto besides myself, and would you have better security than that?

Within a short time after, the jailor coming into the court of the prison, where the prisoners were abroad recreating themselves, caused every one to resort to his cabin, because, said he, the bailiff will come by and by, to see whether the keepers have done as he commanded them; which they did. Then began these poor sheep to fear they were destined to the slaughter, and therefore went presently to prayers. Perennet instantly called his companions about him, reporting to them what the bailiff had given him in charge. Then they all took an oath to execute the same; but approaching near to the prisoners, they were so surprised with fear, and their hearts so failed them, that they stood gazing one upon another, having no courage to act such a barbarous cruelty, and so returned to the jailor's lodge, whence they came, without doing any thing.

But instead of laying this to heart, as a warning sent them from above; as if purposely they meant to resist against the checks of their own consciences, they sent to the tavern for sixteen pints of the best wine, and intoxicating their brains, they drew a list of all the prisoners; which they delivered to one who was to call them forth in order; and as they came they massacred them.

One Meurs was no sooner in their sight, but one of them let drive at him with the point of his halbert, redoubling the same often with intent to kill him, yet could not. The poor man took hold of the point of the halbert, and pointing, himself, to the seat of the heart, cried to the murderer, with a steadfast voice, Here, foldier, here, right at the heart, right at the heart; and so finished this life.

The massacre, faith my author, being ended, the murderers made a great pit on the back side of the chapel of the prison, whereinto they cast the bodies, one upon another, some of them yet breathing. One called Maufere, lying in the midst of them, being observed to raise up himself above his fellow-martyrs in this pit, they forthwith poured earth upon him, until they had stifled him. The blood ran in such abundance out at the prison door, and thence through a channel into a river, that it was turned into the colour of blood.

The day after, this worshipful bailiff of Trois, that he might apply the plaister when the parties were dead, caused the king's letters, which he had received before, to be published in all corners of the city with sound of trumpet. The bailiff was present in person at the publication; and as the notary read the contents thereof to him, he pronounced the same jeeringly, and not with a full and audible voice, as matters of such consequence ought to be read.

One Dechampeaux, lord of Bonilli, a worthy counsellor in the city of Orleans, was murdered in the following manner: One called Texier came with a small troop to his house, bidding himself and his company to supper with him. Dechampeaux bid them all kindly welcome, making them good cheer, being ignorant of that which had happened at Paris. But supper being ended, Texier bade him deliver his purse. Dechampeaux laughing thereat, thinking he had been but in jest, this cruel and unthankful guest, with blasphemous oaths, told him in few words what had happened in the city of Paris, and what preparation there was among the Roman catholics of Orleans, to cut off and root out the protestants there. Dechampeaux, seeing there was no time now to contest with him, gave money to this thief; who, to requite the courtesy and good entertainment he had received, embued his hands in the blood of his honest neighbour, a man of as good and upright a carriage as was in all the city; and afterwards himself, with his troop, pillaged the whole house.

The twenty-sixth day of August following, the massacres began the execution about the ramparts, in a violent manner; in these quarters there inhabited many of the religion. All the night long was heard nothing but shooting off of guns and pistols, forcing open of doors, and windows, fearful outcries of the massacred, both of men, women, and little children, trampling of horses, and rumbling of carts, hurrying off dead bodies to and fro; the street resounding with unwonted exclamations of those of the common sort, with horrible blasphemies of the murderers, laughing their fill at their barbarous exploits; some crying, Kill them all, and then take the spoil; others, Spoil not, but kill all.

On Wednesday the massacre began more fiercely, and so continued to the end of the week, not sparing to break these and the like jests upon the poor massacred: Where is now your God? What is become of all your prayers and psalms now? Let your God, whom you called upon, save you if he can. Yea, some of them, who in times past had been professors of the same religion, whilst they were massacring the poor innocents, durst sing unto them, in scorn, the beginning of the three-and-fortieth psalm: which runs, Judge me, O God, and plead my cause. Others, striking them, said, Sing now, Have mercy on me, O God: such treatment received these poor people in Paris, and elsewhere. But these execrable outrages by no means daunted the courage of the faithful, who died stedfast in the faith.

Touching the multitude of the slain, the murderers did not stick to vaunt, that in this city they caused eighteen thousand men to perish; also an hundred and fifty women, with a great number of children of nine years old and upwards. The manner of their death was, first to shoot them with pistols, then to strip them of their clothes, and either sink their bodies in the river, or bury them in pits.

On Tuesday, at night, certain of this bloody crew came and knocked at the door of one that was a doctor of the civil law, called Taillebous; who opening a casement, and understanding that they had somewhat to say to him, came down immediately, and opened the door to them. At the first greeting they told him he must die. Whereupon he fell to prayer, and that with such constancy and affection, that the massacres being astonished, and by a secret celestial power restrained, contented themselves only with taking his purse, in which were fifteen crowns, and so left him, offering him no more violence.

The day following, certain scholars resorting to his lodging, requested of him that they might see his library, into which having brought them, one asked this book of him, and another that, which he gave them. At length they told him they were not as yet satisfied, their purpose being to kill him. He, prostrating himself upon the ground, and having ended his prayer, willed them to kill him there, but they forced him out of his own house, from one place to another, and at length knocked him down.

A rich burghers of the city, called Nicholas Bougars, Sieur de Nove, a man of singular worth, and highly esteemed of all, was at that time deadly sick. Some of the murderers came into his chamber with a purpose to kill him: but seeing him in that case, spared him: yet finding there Noel Chaperon, apothecary, who brought him physic, they cut off one of his arms, then drew him into the open market-place, where they made an end of him.

The next day, there came one to the lodging of him that was sick, who was wont heretofore to visit him: as he was entering in, he met the mother of the sick party at the door going unto mass, and coming up into the chamber, he stabbed the sick man with a dagger in many places, and so killed a dying man. Then with all silence, as if he had done no such act, wiping his dagger, he went down stairs again, and meeting one at the door who came to visit him that was sick, this fellow, saluting him, passed along by him, without any change either in his behaviour or countenance.

Francis Stample, a rich merchant, was threatened to have his throat cut presently, if he gave not the murderers money: but having got none about him, he wrote a letter to his wife, to send him his ransom: he had no sooner sealed the letter, but the murderers deprived him thereof, and his life also, laughing at what they had done. And though they got from his widow a considerable sum of money, yet could she not obtain from them the body of her dead husband. And these are the fruits of popery.

Among those that confessed the name of Jesus Christ, Francis le Bossu, a merchant, with his two sons, well deserve our notice; for whilst he trampled in the blood of his brethren, being besmeared therewith, and spurring as it were in his face, he encouraged his children to take their death willingly and patiently, using this speech: "Children, we are not to learn now, that it hath always been the portion of believers, to be hated, cruelly used, and devoured by unbelievers, as Christ's silly sheep, of ravening wolves: if we suffer with Christ, we shall also reign with him. Let not these drawn swords terrify us; which only serve to cut that thread which ties us to a miserable life, and let loose the soul into endless felicity. We have resided long enough among the wicked, let us now go and live with our God; let us joyfully march after this great company which is here gone before us, and let us make way for them that shall follow after."

When he saw the murderers come, he clasped his arms about his two sons, and they likewise embraced their father; as if the father meant to be a buckler to his children, and the children, as if, by the bond of nature, (which binds them to defend his life from whence they received their's) they meant to ward off the blows which were coming towards their father, though with the loss of their own lives; who, when the massacre was ended, were all three found dead, thus embracing one another.

Now, at the conclusion of this furious assault, these barbarous monsters went up and down the city, displaying playing their white doublets, all besprinkled with blood; boasting, that some had killed an hundred, some more, some less.

As the multitude were dragging the dead bodies to the river, an apothecary came and informed them, that money might be made of the grease that was taken out of their bodies. Then were the most corpulent bodies presently sought for, which when they had ripped up, a great quantity of that commodity being gotten thence, was sold by these merchants for three shillings the pound.

Those of Dauphine, of Languedoc, and Provence, were amazed to see so many bodies floating upon the water, some dismembered, others fastened together with long poles, others lying on the shore, some having their eyes put out, others their noses, ears, and hands cut off, stabbed with daggers in every part of their body, so as some among them had no human shape remaining. Yea, so great a number of these mangled corpses presented themselves on the port of Tournon, that the men and women of the place began to make an outcry, as if their enemies had been at the gates.

Not many months after, when all these bloody tragedies were ended, the pope sent cardinal Urfin, as legate to the king, who was received with great solemnity at Lyons. Now having heard mass at St. John's church, and returning by the same door which he went in at, the greatest number of the massacrers attended his coming there, and all kneeled down for his absolution. But the legate not knowing the reason of it, one of the principal agents told him, that they were those who had been the actors in the massacre. When the legate perceived that, he absolved them all with making the sign of the cross.

As soon as the massacre was begun at Paris, a gentleman, named Monforeau, obtained a passport with letters to massacre those of the protestant religion at Angiers. Who, being disappointed of his prey in one place, came to the lodging of a reverend and learned minister, called Mr. John Mason, surnamed de Launay, sieur of Riviere. Meeting his wife at the entrance into the house, he saluted her and kissed her, as it is the manner in France, especially among the courtiers, and asked her where her husband was? She answered him, That he was walking in his garden; and then directed him the way unto him.

Monforeau having lovingly embraced la Riviere, said unto him, Do you know wherefore I am come? The king hath commanded me to kill you forthwith, and hath given me express charge to do it, as you shall see by his letters. After which words he shewed him a pistol ready charged. Riviere replied, That he knew not wherein he had offended the king; but seeing, saith he, you seek my life, give me a little time to cry to God for mercy, and to recommend my spirit into his hands.

Having made a short prayer, he willingly presented his body to the murderer, who shot him with his pistol, and he died immediately.

The minister's wife was soon after drowned with nine others.

Six thousand were murdered at Roan in much the same manner.

Now touching the prince of Conde, the king proposed three things to him; Either to go to mass, to die, or else perpetual imprisonment; and therefore to weigh well with himself which of the three he liked best. The prince answered, That by God's grace he would never choose the first; as for the latter, he referred himself to the king's pleasure.

About three hundred were barbarously murdered at Thoulouse, and after taking all their goods, they stripped them naked, and exposed them to public view for two days, and then they threw them in heaps into great pits. There were certain counsellors, who, after they were massacred, were hung up in their long gowns, upon a great elm which was in the court of the palace.

The massacre at Bourdeaux was begun and carried on much in the same manner of those before-mentioned.

But their ministers found means to escape, hiding themselves in the rocks and marshes, till they had an opportunity to take shipping for England.

One thing here may be noted; the house of a counsellor in parliament was forced open, pillaged, and spoiled; and himself cruelly murdered. His clerk seeing his master about to suffer a cruel death, embraced and comforted him: and being asked whether he were of the same religion, he answered, yea, and would die with his master for the same. And they were slain in one another's arms.

A deacon of the reformed church, named Du Tour, an old man, who in the days of his ignorance had been a priest in the popish church, being sick in his bed, was hauled forth into the open street; of whom it being demanded, whether he would go to mass, and thereby save his life; he freely answered, no, especially now drawing so near his end, both in regard of his years and grievous sickness: I hope (saith he) I shall not so far forget the eternal salvation of my soul; as for fear of death to prolong this life for a few days; for so I should buy a short term of life at too dear a rate. They hearing him say so, murdered him instantly.

It was lamentable to see the poor protestants wandering up and down, not knowing where to save their lives: some were rejected of their own parents and relations, who shut their doors against them, pretending as if they knew them not; others were betrayed and delivered up by those, to whose trust they had committed themselves: many were saved even by priests and others, from whom a man would have expected no such security. Some were saved by their very enemies, whose hearts abhorred such detestable outrages.

All the city was full of terror and horrible threats against those of this religion, saying, that the king's commandment was, that he would not have so much as one of them left in his kingdom; and if any refused to go to mass, that a hole should be digged for him in the earth, in which he should be buried without any more ado.

The judgment of God fell not long after upon one of these inhuman murderers, called Vincent; he fell dangerously sick, but in the end recovering again, and as he thought being in good health, told some of his friends that he felt his arms strong enough to handle his cutlafs as well as ever he had done. But within a while after he was overtaken by the hand of God, with such a flux of bleeding at his nose, as could not be restrained nor diverted by any of the remedies that were then used. It was an hideous sight to see him still bowing his head over a basin full of blood, which, without ceasing, issued out of his nose and mouth, even until his last gasp.

Another was taken with such a swelling in all the parts of his body, that there was scarcely to be discerned in him the form of a man, and so continued swelling till at length he burst asunder.

Thus we have taken a view of the extreme afflictions of the reformed churches in many parts of France, wherein within a few weeks nigh 30,000 were put to death.

In the year 1573, the place were the faithful fled for refuge, was assailed by open war; namely, Sancerre, the history whereof you have here in a short view.

Sancerre, being encompassed about with irreconcilable enemies, from about the beginning of April, the want of victuals having caused them to gather together all the asses and mules they had in the city, they were eaten up in less than a month.

Then they came to horses, cats, rats, moles, mice, and dogs. After these were spent, they fell to eat ox and cow-hides, sheep-skins, parchment, old shoes, bullocks, and horse-hoofs, horns, and lanthorns, ropes, and horse-harness, leather girdles, &c.

In the end of June, the third part of the besieged had not bread to eat. Such as could get hemp-seed, ground it, or stamped it in mortars, and made bread of it; the like they did with all sorts of herbs, mingling the same with bran if they had it. There they eat meal of chaff, nut-shells, and of slate, excrements of horses, and and men, yea, the offal which lay in the streets was not spared.

The 29th of July, a poor man and his wife were executed for having eaten the head, brains, and entrails of a young child, about three years old, which died of hunger; having made ready the other parts to eat at another meal. An old woman who lodged in their house, eating a part of this mournful diet, died in prison, within a few hours after her imprisonment.

They were found guilty of other offences; but this aggravated the same the more. All children under twelve years of age died. It was lamentable to hear the pitiful lamentations uttered by poor parents, for the misery wherein their eyes beheld their languishing and dying infants.

To which purpose you make take notice here of a memorable accident. A boy of ten years old, being ready to yield up the ghost, seeing his father and mother weeping over him (whose arms and legs, when handled, felt as if they had been dried sticks) said unto them, Wherefore weep ye thus, in seeing me famished to death? Mother, said he, I ask you no bread, I know you have none: but seeing it is God's will I must die this death, let us be thankful for it. Did not the holy man, Lazarus, die of famine? have I not read it in my bible? In uttering these, with the like speeches, he yielded up the ghost, the 30th of July.

That all the people died not of famine in the end of this month, it was by reason of certain horses which were reserved for service, if need should be, and six cows which were left to give milk for the sustenance of young infants. These beasts were killed, and their flesh sold for the relief of such as were living, with a little corn, which by stealth some brought into the city; so that a pound of wheat was sold for half a crown.

There died by fight in Sancerre but eighty-four persons, but of the famine more than five hundred. Many soldiers getting forth as they could out of the city, flying from the famine, chose rather to die by the sword of the enemy; whereof some were slain, others imprisoned, and the rest put to death by the executioner.

But when all help of man failed, the king having sworn that he would make them eat up one another, the King of kings delivered them by his wonderful providence. For at this instant the ambassadors from Poland came into France to accept the duke of Anjou for their king, at whose intreaty (which could not well be denied) poor Sancerre, more than half famished, was now set at liberty by raising the siege, who otherwise were determined to leave their bones there, rather than to yield themselves into their enemy's hands, in regard they had often threatened them with a general massacre. Whereas now by the king's appointment they were permitted to pass out of the city armed; if any would tarry, that they should not be molested: having liberty granted them to dispose of their affairs, as they pleased, with promise of preserving the honour and chastities as well of virgins, as women, &c.

There also died in the siege of Rochelle, October 20, 1628, sixteen thousand persons, the rest enduring a world of miseries; most of their food being hides, leather, and old gloves: other provisions being very scarce, were at an excessive rate, viz.

A bushel of wheat, 20l. a pound of bread, 20s. a quarter of mutton, 6l. odd money; a pound of butter, 30s. an egg, 8s. an ounce of sugar, 2s. 6d. a dried fish, 20s. a pint of wine, 20s. a pound of grapes, 3s. a pint of milk, 30s.

It is also reported, that through the famine, young maids of 14 or 16 years of age, did look like women of an hundred years old. The famine was such, that the poor people would cut off the buttocks of the dead as they lay in the church-yard unburied. All the English that came out looked like anatomies. They lived two months with nothing but cow-hides and goat-skins boiled; the dogs, cats, mice, and frogs, being all spent.

A brief DISCOURSE of the great PREPARATIONS of the SPANIARDS, in order to invade ENGLAND, in the REIGN of QUEEN ELIZABETH.

THE duke of Parma, in Flanders, by command of the Spaniards, built ships, and a great company of small broad vessels, each one able to transport thirty horses, with bridges fitted for them severally; and hired mariners from the East part of Germany, and provided long pieces of wood, sharpened at the end, and covered with iron, with hooks on one side; and 20,000 vessels, with an huge number of faggots; and placed an army ready in Flanders, of 103 companies of foot, and 4000 horsemen. Among these 700 English vagabonds, who were held of all others in most contempt. Neither was Stanley respected or obeyed, who was set over the English; nor Westmoreland, nor any other who offered their help; but for their unfaithfulness to their own country were shut out from all consultations, and as men unanimously rejected with detestation. And because pope Sixtus the Fifth in such a case would not be wanting, he sent cardinal Allen into Flanders, and renewed the bulls declaratory of pope Pius the Fifth, and Gregory the Thirteenth. He excommunicated and deposed queen Elizabeth, absolved her subjects from all allegiance, and, as if it had been against the Turks or infidels, he set forth in print a conceit, wherein he bestowed plenary indulgences, out of the treasure of the church, besides a million of gold, or ten hundred thousand ducats, to be distributed (the one half in hand, the rest when either England, or some famous haven therein should be won) upon all them that would join their help against England. By which means the marquis of Burgaw, of the house of Austria, the duke of Pastrana, Armady duke of Savoy, Vespasian, Gonzaga, John Medices, and divers other noblemen were drawn into these wars.

Queen Elizabeth, that she might not be surprized unawares, prepared as great a navy as she could, and with singular care and providence made all things ready necessary for war. And she herself, who was ever most judicious in discerning of men's wits and aptness, and most happy in making choice, when she made it out of her own judgment, and not at the direction of others, designed the best and most serviceable to each several employment. Over the whole navy she appointed the lord admiral Charles Howard, in whom she reposed much trust; and sent him to the west part of England, where captain Drake, whom she made vice-admiral, joined with him. She commanded Henry Seimor, the second son to the duke of Somerset, to watch upon the Belgic shore with forty English and Dutch ships, that the duke of Parma might not come out with his forces. Although some were of opinion, that the enemy was to be expected and set upon by land forces, according as it was upon deliberation resolved, in the time of Henry the Eighth, when the French brought a great navy on the English shore.

For the land fight, there were placed on the south shore twenty thousand; and two armies besides were mustered of the choicest men for war. The one of these which consisted of 1000 horse, and twenty-two thousand foot, was commanded by the earl of Leicester, and encamped at Tilbury, on the side of the Thames. For the enemy was resolved first to set upon London. The other army was commanded by the lord Hunsdon, consisting of thirty-four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, to guard the queen.

The lord Grey, sir Francis Knowles, sir John Norris, sir Richard Bingham, sir Roger Williams, men famously known for military experience, were chosen to confer of the land fight. These commanders thought fit that all those places should be fortified, with men and ammunition, which were commodious to land in, either out of Spain or out of Flanders, as Milford-Haven, Falmouth, Plymouth, Portland, the Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, the open side of Kent called the Downs, the Thames' mouth, Harwich, Yarmouth, Hull, &c. That trained soldiers through all the maritime provinces should meet upon warning given, to defend the places, that they they should, by their best means, hinder the enemy from landing; and if they did happen to land, then they were to destroy the fruits of the country all about, and spoil every thing that might be of any use to the enemy, that so they might find no more victuals than what they brought with them. And that by continual alarms the enemy should find no rest day or night. But they should not try any battle, until divers captains were met together with their companies. That one captain might be named in every shire which might command.

Two years before, the duke of Parma considering how hard a matter it was to end the Belgic war, so long as it was continually nourished and supported with aid from the queen, he moved for a treaty of peace, by the means of sir James Croft, one of the privy council, a man desirous of peace, and Andrew Loe, a Dutchman, and professed that the Spaniard had delegated authority to him for this purpose. But the queen fearing that the friendship between her and the confederate princes might be dissolved, and that so they might secretly be drawn to the Spaniard, she deferred that treaty for some time. But now, that the wars on both sides prepared might be turned away; she was content to treat of peace; but so, as still holding the weapons in her hand.

For this purpose, in February, delegates were sent into Flanders, the earl of Derby, the lord Cobham, sir James Croft, doctor Dale, and doctor Rogers. These were received with all humanity on the duke's behalf, and they presently sent doctor Dale to him, that a place might be appointed for their treating; and that they might see the authority delegated to him by the Spanish king. He appointed the place near to Ostend, not in Ostend, which at that time was held by the English against the Spanish king. His authority delegated, he promised them to shew, when they were once met together. He wished them to make good speed in the business, lest somewhat might fall out in the meantime which might trouble the motions of peace. Richardotus spoke somewhat more plainly, That he knew not what in this interim should be done against England.

Not long after, doctor Rogers was sent to the prince, by an express commandment from the queen, to know the truth, whether the Spaniard had resolved to invade England, which he and Richardotus seemed to signify. He affirmed, that he did not so much as think of the invasion of England, when he wished that the business might proceed with speed: and was in a manner offended with Richardotus, who denied that such words fell from him.

The 12th of April, the count Aremberg, Champigny, Richardotus, doctor Maesius, and Garnier, delegated from the prince of Parma, met with the English, and yielded to them the honour both in walking and sitting. And when they affirmed that the duke had full authority to treat of peace, the English moved, that first a truce might be made. Which they denied; alledging that that thing must needs be hurtful to the Spaniards, who had for six months maintained a great army, which might not be dismissed upon a truce, but upon an absolute peace. The English urged, that a truce was promised before they came into Flanders. The Spaniard against that held, That six months since a truce was promised: which they granted, but was not admitted. Neither was it in the queen's power to undertake a truce for Holland and Zealand, who daily attempted hostility. The English moved instantly, that the truce might be general for all the queen's territories, and for the kingdom of Scotland: but they would have it but for four Dutch towns which were in the queen's hands; that is, Ostend, Flushing, Bergen-up-Zoom, and the Briel; and these only during the treating, and twenty days after; and that in the meantime it might be lawful for the queen to invade Spain, or for the Spaniards to invade England, either from Spain or Flanders. At last, when the English could not obtain an armistice, and could by no means see the charter by which the duke of Parma was authorised to treat of peace, they proposed these things, that the ancient leagues between the kings of England and the dukes of Burgundy might be renewed and confirmed; that all the Dutch might fully enjoy their own privileges; that with freedom of conscience they might serve God; that the Spanish and foreign soldiers might be put out of Holland, that neither the Dutch nor their neighbouring nations might fear them. If these things might be granted, the queen would come to equal conditions concerning the towns which now she held (that all might know, that she took up arms not for her own gain, but for the necessary defence both of herself and of the Dutch), so that the money which is owing therefore be repaid. To which they answered, That for renewing the old leagues there should be no difficulty, when they might have a friendly conference of that thing. That concerning the privileges of the Dutch, there was no cause why foreign princes should take care, which privileges were most favourably granted not only to provinces and towns reconciled, but even to such as by force of arms are brought into subjection. That foreign soldiers were held upon urgent necessity, since Holland, England, and France, were all in arms.

Touching those towns taken from the king of Spain, and the repaying of the money, they answered, That the Spaniards might demand as many myriads of crowns to be from the queen repaid them, as the Belgic war hath cost since the time that she hath favoured and protected the Dutch against them.

At this time, doctor Dale, by the queen's command, going to the duke of Parma, gently expostulated with him touching a book printed there, set out lately by cardinal Allen, wherein he exhorts the nobles and people of England and Ireland to join themselves to the king of Spain's forces, under the conduct of the prince of Parma, for the execution of the sentence of pope Sixtus V. against the queen, declared by his bull; in which she is declared an heretic, illegitimate, cruel against Mary queen of Scots, and her subjects were commanded to help Parma against her: for at that time a great number of those bulls and books were printed at Antwerp to be dispersed through England. The duke denied that he had seen such a bull or book, neither would he do any thing by the pope's authority; as for his own king, him he must obey. Yet, he said, he so revered the queen for her princely virtues, that after the king of Spain, he offered all service to her. That he had persuaded the king of Spain to yield to this treaty of peace, which is more profitable to England than Spain: for if they should be overcome, they would easily repair their loss, but if you be overcome, the kingdom is lost.

To whom Dale replied, That our queen was sufficiently furnished with forces to defend the kingdom. That a kingdom will not easily be gotten by the events of one battle, seeing the king of Spain in so long a war is not able to recover his ancient patrimony in the Netherlands.

Well, quoth the duke, be it so, these things are in God's hands.

After this the delegates contended among themselves by mutual replications, weaving and unweaving the same web. The English were earnest in this, That freedom of religion might be granted at least for two years to the confederate princes. They answered, That as the king of Spain had not intreated that for English catholics, so they hoped the queen in her wisdom would not intreat any thing of the king of Spain, which might stand against his honour, his oath, and his conscience.

Then they demanded the money due from the states of Brabant; it was answered, That the money was lent without the king's knowledge; but let the account be taken, how much the money was, and how much the king hath spent in these wars, and then it may appear who should look for repayment.

Thus the English were from time to time put off, until the Spanish fleet was come near the English shore, and the noise of guns was heard from sea. Then had they leave to depart, and were by the delegates honourably brought to the borders of Calais. The duke of Parma had in the meantime brought all his forces to the sea shore.

Thus

Thus this conference came to nothing; undertaken by the queen, as the wiser then thought, to avert the Spanish fleet; continued by the Spaniard that he might oppress the queen, being as he supposed unprovided, and not expecting the danger. So both of them tried to use time to their best advantages.

In fine, the Spanish fleet, well furnished with men, ammunition, engines, and all warlike preparations, the best indeed that ever was seen upon the ocean, called by that arrogant title, The Invincible Armada, consisted of 130 ships, wherein there were in all 19,290. Mariners 8350. Chained rowers 11,080. Great ordnance 11,630. The chief commander was Perezius Gufmannus, duke of Medina Sidonia; and under him Joannes Martinus Ricaldus, a man of great experience in sea affairs.

The 30th of May they loosed out of the river Tagus, and bending their course to the Groin, in Galicia, they were beaten and scattered by a tempest: three galleys, by the help of David Gwin, an English servant, and by perfidiousness of Turks which rowed, were carried away into France. The fleet with much ado after some days came to the Groin and other harbours near adjoining. The report was, that the fleet was so shaken with this tempest, that the queen was persuaded, that she was not to expect that fleet this year. And sir Francis Walsingham, secretary, wrote to the lord admiral, that he might send back four of the greatest ships, as if the war had been ended. But the lord admiral did not easily give credit to that report; yet with a gentle answer intreated him to believe nothing hastily in so important a matter: as also that he might be permitted to keep those ships with him which he had, though it were upon his own charges. And getting a favourable wind, made sail towards Spain, to surprise the enemy's damaged ships in their harbours. When he was close in with the coast of Spain, the wind shifting, and he being charged to defend the English shore, fearing that the enemies might unseen by the same wind sail for England, he returned unto Plymouth.

Now with the same wind, the 12th of July, the duke of Medina with his fleet departed from the Groin. And after a few days he sent Rodericus Telius into Flanders, to advertise the duke of Parma, giving him warning that the fleet was approaching, and therefore he was to make himself ready. For Medina's commission was to join himself with the ships and soldiers of Parma; and under the protection of his fleet, to bring them into England, and to land his land forces upon the Thames side.

The sixteenth day (saith the relator), there was a great calm, and a thick cloud was upon the sea till noon: then the north-wind blowing roughly; and again the west-wind till midnight, and after that the east; the Spanish navy was scattered, and hardly gathered together until they came within sight of England, the nineteenth day of July. Upon which day the lord admiral was certified by Flemming (who had been a pirate) that the Spanish fleet was entered into the English sea, which the mariners call the channel, and was descried near to the Lizard. The lord admiral brought forth the English fleet into the sea, but not without great difficulty, by the skill, labour, and alacrity of the soldiers and mariners, every one labouring; yea, the lord admiral himself put his hand to this work.

The next day the English fleet viewed the Spanish fleet coming along like towering castles in height, her front crooked like the fashion of the moon, the wings of the fleet were extended one from the other about seven miles, or as some say eight miles asunder, sailing with the labour of the winds, the ocean as it were groaning under it; their sail was but slow, and yet at full sail before the wind. The English were willing to let them hold on their course, and when they were passed by, got behind them, and so got to windward of them.

Upon the 21st of July, the lord admiral of England sent a cutter before, called the Defiance, to denounce the battle by firing off pieces. And being himself in the Royal-Arch (the English admiral ship), he began the engagement with a ship which he took to be the Spanish admiral, but which was the ship of Alfonso Leva. Upon that he expended much shot. Presently Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher, came in upon the rear of the Spaniards, which Ricaldus commanded. Upon these they thundered. Ricaldus endeavoured as much as in him lay, to keep his men to their quarters, but all in vain, until his ship much beaten and battered with many shot hardly recovered the fleet. Then the duke of Medina gathered together his scattered fleet, and setting more sail, held on his course. Indeed they could do no other, for the English had gotten the advantage of the wind, and their ships being much easier managed, and ready with incredible celerity to come upon the enemy with a full course, and then to tack and retack, and be on every side at their pleasure. After a long fight, and each of them had taken a trial of their courage, the lord admiral thought proper to continue the fight no longer, because there were forty ships more, which were then absent, and at that very time were coming out of Plymouth Sound.

The night following, the St. Catherine, a Spanish ship, being sadly torn in the battle, was taken into the midst of the fleet to be repaired. Here a great Cantabrian ship, of Oquenda, wherein was the treasurer of the camp, by force of gunpowder took fire, yet it was quenched in time by the ships that came to help her. Of these which came to assist the fired ship, one was a galeon, commanded by Petrus Waldez; the fore-yard of the galeon was caught in the rigging of another ship, and carried away. This was taken by Drake, who sent Waldez to Dartmouth, and a great sum of money, viz. 55,000 ducats, which he distributed among the soldiers. This Waldez coming into Drake's presence, kissed his hand, and told him they had all resolved to die, if they had not been so happy as to fall into his hands, whom they knew to be noble. That night he was appointed to set forth a light, but neglected it; and some German merchant ships coming by that night, he thinking them to be enemies, followed them so far, that the English fleet lay to all night because they could see no light set forth. Neither did he nor the rest of the fleet find the admiral until the next evening. The admiral all the night proceeding with the Bear, and the Mary Rose, carefully followed the Spaniards with watchfulness. The duke was busied in ordering his squadron. Alfonso Leva was commanded to join the first and last divisions. Every ship had it's proper station assigned according to that prescribed form which was appointed in Spain; it was present death to any who forsook his station. This done, he sent Glicius, and Anceani, to Parma, which might declare to them in what situation they were, and left that Cantabrian ship of Oquenda to the wind and sea, having taken out the money and mariners, and put them on board of other ships. Yet it seemed that he had not care for all: for that ship the same day with fifty mariners, and soldiers wounded, and half burned, fell into the hands of the English, and was carried to Weymouth.

The 23d of the same month, the Spaniards having a favourable north wind tacked towards the English; but they being more expert in the management of their ships, tacked likewise and kept the advantage they had gained, keeping the Spaniards to leeward, till at last the fight became general on both sides. They fought a while confusedly with variable success: whilst on the one side the English with great courage delivered the London ships which were inclosed about by the Spaniards: and on the other side the Spaniards by valour freed Ricaldus from the extreme danger he was in: great and many were the explosions which by the continual firing of great guns were heard this day. But the loss (by the good providence of God) fell upon the Spaniards, their ships being so high that the shot went over our English ships; and the English having such a fair mark at their large ships never shot in vain. During this engagement, Cock, an Englishman, being surrounded by the Spanish ships, could not be recovered, but perished; however, with great honour he revenged himself. Thus a long time the English ships with great agility were sometimes upon the Spa-

Spaniards, giving them the fire of one side, and then of the other, and presently were off again, and still kept the sea, to make themselves ready to come in again. Whereas the Spanish ships being of great burthen were troubled and hindered, and stood to be the marks for the English shot. For all that, the English admiral would not permit his people to board their ships, because they had such a number of soldiers on board, which he had not; their ships were many in number, and greater, and higher, that if they had come to grapple as some would have had it, the English being much lower than the Spanish ships, must needs have had the worst of them that fought from the higher ships. And if the English had been overcome, the loss would have been greater than the victory could have been; for our being overcome would have put the kingdom in hazard.

The 24th day of July, they gave over fighting on both sides. The admiral sent some small barks to the English shore, for a supply of provisions, and divided his whole fleet into four squadrons; the first whereof he took under his own command, the next was commanded by Drake, the third by Hawkins, and the last by Forbisher. And he appointed out of every squadron certain little ships, which on divers sides might set upon the Spaniards in the night, but a sudden calm took them, so that expedient was without effect.

The 25th, the St. Anne, a galleon of Portugal, not being able to keep up with the rest, was attacked by some small English ships. To whose aid came in Leva, and Didacus Telles Enriques, with three galleasses: which the admiral, and the lord Thomas Howard, espying, made all the sail they could against the galleasses, but the calm continuing, they were obliged to be towed along with their boats: as soon as they reached the galleasses, they began to play away so fiercely with their great guns, that with much danger and great loss, they hardly recovered their galleon. The Spaniards reported that the Spanish admiral was that day in the rear of their fleet, which being come nearer the English ships than before, got terribly shattered with their great guns, many men were killed aboard, and her masts laid over the side. The Spanish admiral after this, in company with Ricaldus, and others, attacked the English admiral, who having the advantage of the wind suddenly tacked, and escaped. The Spaniards holding on their course again, sent to the duke of Parma, that with all possible speed he should join his ships with the king's fleet. These things the English knew not, who write that they had carried away the lanthorn from one of the Spanish ships, the stem from another, and sore mauled the third, very much disabling her. The Non-Parigly, and the Mary Rose fought a while with the Spaniards; and the Triumph being in danger, other ships came in good time to help her.

The next day, the lord admiral knighted the lord Thomas Howard, the lord Sheffield, Roger Townsend, John Hawkins, and Martin Forbisher, for their valour in the last engagement. After this, they agreed not to attack the enemy until they came into the straits of Calais, where Henry Seimor, and William Winter, waited for their coming. Thus with a fair gale the Spanish fleet went forward, and the English followed. This great Spanish Armada was so far from being esteemed invincible in the opinion of the English, that many young men and gentlemen, in hope to be partakers of a famous victory against the Spaniards, provided ships at their own expences, and joined themselves to the English fleet; among whom were the earls of Essex, Northumberland, and Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecil, Henry Brooks, William Hatton, Robert Cary, Ambrose Willoughby, Thomas Gerard, Arthur Gorge, and other gentlemen of good note and quality.

The seven-and-twentieth day at even, the Spaniards cast anchor near to Calais, being admonished by their skilful seamen, that if they went any further, they might be in danger, through the force of the tide, to be driven into the north ocean. Near to them lay the English admiral with his fleet within a great gun's shot. To the admiral, Seimor and Winter now join their ships; so that now there were an hundred and forty ships in the English fleet, able and well furnished for fighting, for sailing, and every thing else which was requisite: and yet there were but fifteen of these which bore the heat of the battle, and repulsed the enemy. The Spaniard, as often as he had done before, so now with great earnestness sent to the duke of Parma, to send forty fly-boats, without which they could not fight with the English, because of the greatness and slowness of their ships, and the agility of the English; and intreating him by all means now to come to sea with his army, which army was now to be protected as it were under the wings of the Spanish Armada, until they should land in England.

But the duke was unprovided, and could not come out at an instant. The broad ships with flat bottoms being then full of chinks must be mended. Victuals wanted and must be provided. The mariners being long kept against their wills, began to shrink away. The ports of Dunkirk and Newport, by which he must bring his army to the sea, were now so beset with the strong ships of Holland and Zealand, which were furnished with great and small ammunition, that he was not able to come to sea, unless he would come upon his own apparent destruction, and cast himself and his men wilfully into a headlong danger. Yet he omitted nothing that might be done, being a man eager and industrious, and inflamed with a desire of overcoming England.

But queen Elizabeth's providence and care prevented both the diligence of this man, and the credulous hope of the Spaniard: for by her command the next day the admiral took eight of their worst ships, charging the ordnance therein up to the mouth with small shot, nails, and stones, and dressed them with wild fire, pitch and rosin, and filled them full of brimstone and some other matter fit for fire, and these being set on fire by the management of Young and Prowse, were secretly in the night, by the help of the wind, set full upon the Spanish fleet, which on Sunday the seventh of August they sent in among them as they lay at anchor.

When the Spaniards saw them come near, the flame giving light all over the sea; they supposing those ships, besides the danger of fire, to have been also furnished with deadly engines, to make horrible destruction among them; lifting up a most hideous cry, some pull up anchors, some for haste cut their cables, they set up their sails, they apply their oars, and stricken with extreme terror, in great haste they fled most confusedly. Among them the Pretorian Galleass floating upon the seas, her rudder being broken, in great danger and fear drew towards Calais, and sticking in the sand was taken by Amias Preston, Thomas Gerard, and Harvey; Hugh Moncada the governor was slain, the soldiers and mariners were either killed or drowned; in her there was found great store of gold, which fell to be the prey of the English. The ship and ordnance went to the governor of Calais.

The Spaniards report, that the duke, when he saw the fire-ships coming, commanded all the fleet to heave up their anchors, but so as the danger being past, every ship might return again to his station: and he himself returned, giving a sign to the rest by shooting off a gun; which was heard but by a few, for they were far off scattered, some into the open ocean, some through fear were driven upon the shallows of the coast of Flanders.

Over against Graveling the Spanish fleet began to gather themselves together. But upon them came Drake and Fenner, and battered them with great ordnance: to these Fenton, Southwel, Beeston, Cross, Riman, and presently after the lord admiral, Thomas Howard, and Sheffield, came in and all joined together. The duke Medina, Leva, Oquenda, Ricaldus, and others with much ado getting themselves out of the shallows sustained the English force as well as they might, until most of their ships were pierced and torn; the galleon St. Matthew, governed by Diego Pimentellus, coming to aid Francis Toletan, being in the St. Philip, was pierced and shaken with the reiterated shots of Seimor and Winter, and driven to Ostend, and was at last taken by the Flushing. The St. Philip came to the like end: so did the galleon of Biscay and divers others.

The last day of this month, the Spanish fleet striving to recover the streights again, were driven towards Zealand. The English left off pursuing them, as the Spaniards thought, because they saw them in a manner cast away; for they could not avoid the shallows of Zealand. But the wind turning, they got them out of the shallows, and then began to consult what were best for them to do. By common consent they resolved to return into Spain by the Northern seas, for they wanted many necessities, especially shot, their ships were torn, and they had no hope that the duke of Parma could bring forth his forces. And so they took the sea, and followed the course toward the North. The English navy followed, and sometimes the Spanish turned upon the English, in so much that it was thought by many that they would turn back again.

Queen Elizabeth caused an army to encamp at Tilbury, a place by the sea side upon the river of Thames. After the army was come thither, her majesty, to shew her own courage, and for the comfort of her people, went in person to visit the camp, which then lay between the city of London and the sea, under the charge of the earl of Leicester, where placing herself between the enemy and her city, she viewed her army, passing through it divers times, and lodging in the borders of it, returned again and dined in the army. First viewing from place to place the people as they were by their countries lodged and quartered by their several camps. Afterwards when they were all reduced into battle, prepared as it were for fight, she rode round about with a leader's staff, in her hand, only accompanied with the general, and three or four others attending upon her: but yet to shew her state, (I well marked it) she had the sword carried before her by the earl of Ormond. There she was generally saluted with shouts, with all tokens of love, obedience, and readiness to fight for her, as the like hath seldom been seen in an army. All which tended to shew a marvellous concord, and mutual love between a queen and her subjects; which she requited with very princely thanks.

I could enlarge the description hereof with many more particulars of mine own observation (says the author), for I wandered, as many others did, from place to place, all the day, and never heard a word spoke of her, but in praising her for her stately person and princely behaviour, in praying for her long life, and earnestly desiring to venture their lives for her safety. In her presence they sung psalms of praise to Almighty God, for which she greatly commended them, and devoutly praised God with them. This that I write you may be sure I do not with any comfort, but to give you these manifest arguments, that neither this queen did discontent her people, nor her people shew any discontent in any thing they were commanded to do for her service, as heretofore hath been imagined.

This account was related by a popish spy, in a letter written here in England to Mendea. The copy of which letter was found upon Richard Leigh, a seminary priest, in French and English: which priest was executed for high treason whilst the Spanish Armada was at sea.

The same day whereon the last fight was, the duke of Parma, after his vows offered to the lady of Halla, came somewhat late to Dunkirk, and was received with very opprobrious language by the Spaniards, as if in favour of queen Elizabeth he had slipped the fairest opportunity that could be to do the service. He, to make some satisfaction, punished the purveyors that had not made provision of beer, bread, &c. which was not yet ready nor embarked, secretly smiling at the insolence of the Spaniards, when he heard them bragging, that what way soever they came upon England, they would have an undoubted victory; that the English were not able to endure the sight of them. Bernardinus Mendoza did indeed by books in France sing a foolish and triumphant song before the victory. The English admiral appointed Seimor and the Hollanders to watch upon the coast of Flanders, that the duke of Parma should not come out; whilst he himself close followed the Spaniards until they were past Edinburgh Frith.

The Spaniards seeing all hopes fail, fled again; and so this great navy, being three years preparing with great expence, was within one month overthrown, and after many were killed, being chased again, was driven about all England by Scotland, the Orcaes, and Ireland, tossed and damaged with tempests, much diminished, and went home without glory. There were not an hundred men of the English lost, and but one ship. Whereupon money was coined with a navy fleeing away in full sail, with this inscription, Venit, Vidit, Fugit. Others were coined with the ships on fire, the navy confounded, in honour of the queen, inscribed, Dux Fœmina Fœsti. As they fled, it is certain that many of their ships were cast away upon the shores of Scotland and Ireland. Above seven hundred soldiers and mariners were cast away upon the Scottish shore, who at the duke of Parma's intercession with the Scotch king, the queen of England consenting, were after a year sent into Flanders. But they that were cast upon the Irish shore came to more miserable fortunes; for some were killed by the wild Irish, and others were destroyed for fear they should join themselves with the wild Irish (which cruelty queen Elizabeth much condemned), and the rest being afraid, sick, and hungry, with their disabled ships, committed themselves to the sea, and many were drowned.

The queen went to public thanksgiving in St. Paul's church, accompanied by a glorious train of nobility through the streets of London, which were hung with blue cloth, the companies standing on both sides in their liveries; the banners that were taken from the enemies were spread; she heard the sermon, and public thanks were rendered unto God with great joy. This public joy was augmented when sir Robert Sidney returned from Scotland, and brought from the king assurances of his noble mind and affection to the queen, and to religion; which as in sincerity he had established, so he purposed to maintain with all his power. Sir Robert Sidney was sent to him when the Spanish fleet was coming, to congratulate and return thanks for his great affection towards the maintenance of the common cause; and to declare how ready she would be to help him if the Spaniards should land in Scotland; and that he might recal to memory with what strange ambition the Spaniards had gaped for all Britain, urging the pope to excommunicate him, to the end that he might be thrust from the kingdom of Scotland, and from the succession in England: and to give him notice of the threatening of Mendoza, and the pope's nuncio, who threatened his ruin if they could effect it; and therefore warned him to take special heed to the Scottish papists.

The king pleasantly answered, That he looked for no other benefit from the Spaniards, than that which Polyphemus promised to Ulysses, to devour him last after his fellows were devoured.

To close up this whole relation, hear what Theodore Beza says in his congratulatory verses written in Latin, and sent to her majesty: the effect of which in English is this:

WITH navy huge the Spaniard proud
The English seas had spread,
And all to set the English crown
Upon the Spanish head.
And would you gladly understand
The cause of all this rout,
Ambition first did lay the plot,
And lucre brought them out.
How well this pride thus puffed up,
A puff did overthrow:
And swelling wave such swelling wights,
How well did overflow.
How well that warrior of mankind,
That cruel Spanish wolf,
Was tost and tumbled up and down
Within the ocean gulph.

And you for whom both all the wind
 And all the waters fight;
 O noble queen, of all the world
 The only true delight,
 Go forward still to rule for God;
 Ambition lay aside;
 Go forward still for Christ his flock
 In bounty to provide.
 That thou may'st England govern long,
 Long England thee enjoy,
 As well a love unto the good,
 As to the bad annoy.

From Geneva, besieged by the duke of Savoy, the 12th day of August, 1589.

Your majesty's most humble servant,
 THEODORE BEZA.

*An ACCOUNT of the DISCOVERY of the GUNPOWDER
 TREASON, in the YEAR 1605, in the REIGN of KING JAMES I.*

WHILST every thing seemed to procure king James a quiet and peaceable reign, the devil envying the happiness of the English, inspired some of his agents with one of the most horrible plots that ever was heard of. I mean the gunpowder-treason plot, which has made so much noise in the world, and of which I shall relate the particulars without any exaggeration.

The chief persons concerned in this hellish contrivance were, Robert Catesby, a gentleman of Northamptonshire; Thomas Percy, the earl of Northumberland's cousin, John Grant, Ambrose Rockwood, John and Christopher Wright, Francis Tresham, Guy Fawkes, sir Everard Digby, Robert and Thomas Winter, Thomas Bates, and Robert Keyes: some of these consulting together how they might restore the popish religion in England, Percy, one of the most zealous, proposed to kill the king, and offered to perform it himself. To whom Catesby answered, That if the king was taken off, there were still two young princes and princesses, with the greatest part of the nobility and gentry, devoted to the protestant religion; and unless these were involved in the same fate with the king, they should render their condition rather worse than better, by attempting his majesty's life only. He proposed therefore the blowing up the king, queen, and prince, with both the houses of lords and commons, at the next assembly of the parliament, when the king should come to the house, and make his speech there, at the opening of the sessions; which being approved by the rest as a most glorious undertaking, it was resolved to put it into execution; only some, scrupling the lawfulness of committing so terrible a slaughter on a religious account, they agreed, before they proceeded in it, to demand the opinion of their confessors; whereupon Henry Garnet, the superior, with Oswald Tesmond and John Gerard, two other priests of the Jesuits order, were consulted; who did not only declare the enterprise lawful, but applauded the design as just, and even pious; since it was to be executed upon excommunicated heretics.

Then an oath of secrecy was taken by the conspirators; and mass being celebrated by Gerard, they also took the sacrament to be true to each other, and promote the plot with all their powers; after which, Percy took a house adjoining to the house of lords, from whence they proposed to dig a mine under it, which would contain a sufficient quantity of gunpowder to blow up the whole building; and they began to work on their mine about Christmas 1604. But the parliament being prorogued, first to February, then to October, and again to the 5th of November, 1605, they had time enough, or rather too much, to effect their design, though they were obliged to dig through the foundation of a very thick wall. When the conspirators had almost conquered this difficulty, they were surprised to hear a noise and the talking of people near the place where they were at work, and began to conclude they were discovered; but sending out Guy Fawkes for intelligence, he brought them word, that the voices they had heard were in an adjoining cellar, where coals were exposed to sale; that it was exactly under the house of lords, and now offered to be let. Whereupon Percy went immediately and hired it, putting thirty-six barrels of gunpowder into it, which he imported from Holland, and covered them with coals and faggots.

Having made this provision for their grand design, it was considered, that though the king and prince might be taken off by this means, yet the duke of York and the princess Elizabeth would be out of their power; and consequently the success of their enterprise must still be very doubtful: but Percy being one of the band of pensioners, and well acquainted with the palace, undertook to secure the duke of York; and it was looked upon as no difficult matter to surprise the princess, who resided at the lord Harrington's, in Warwickshire, under a pretence of a hunting match. It was next considered, what money and horses they could raise towards effecting their purpose: whereupon Digby promised fifteen hundred pounds, Tresham two hundred, Percy the rents of Northumberland, which he was empowered to receive, and computed they would amount to 4000l. He also engaged to provide ten horses from the same quarter; and the rest of the conspirators promised to raise what money and troops they could, that they might be able to make a stand, and encourage their friends to take arms in defence of their religion, when the great blow was given. It was debated also, whether they should require the assistance of any princes of their communion; but it was thought necessary to defer this till after the fact was committed, lest the plot should be discovered by being communicated to too many. And it was resolved to proclaim the princess Elizabeth queen, when they had assembled their troops, a proclamation being drawn up with this view, in which they made no mention of the intended alteration of religion; this being agreed to be deferred till their forces should be joined by some of the catholic powers. In the mean time, they resolved to charge the Puritans with the destruction that was intended: and it is supposed, they designed to assassinate the duke of York, by their promising to proclaim the princess Elizabeth.

Thus had the conspirators formed their scheme, and proceeded so far in the execution of it, that there remained little more for them to do, than to set fire to the train they had laid for blowing up the king, the queen, the prince, the nobility, and the representatives of a great and flourishing people. When, on a sudden, an unaccountable fit of tenderness seized one of these merciless wretches, who, by his endeavouring to rescue a friend from this unparalleled destruction, discovered the deep-laid design, which Lucifer only could be the contriver of. This discovery was made by the following letter, sent to the lord Monteagle by one of the conspirators, about ten days before the meeting of the parliament, viz.

A LETTER,

To the LORD MONTEAGLE.

My Lord,

OUT of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have regard to your preservation; therefore would advise you, as you tender your life, to invent some excuse to put off your attendance at this parliament; for God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of these times. Think not slightly of this advice, but retire yourself into the country, where you may expect the event in safety; for though there be no appearance of any stir, yet, I say, they shall receive a terrible blow in this parliament, and shall not see who hurt them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm, for the danger is past, as soon as you have burnt the letter: and I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it. To whose holy protection I commit you.

This

His lordship carried the letter, the same evening he received it, to secretary Cecil; who communicated it to some other members of the council: but they did not think it of that consequence, to make any inquiries about the matter, till the king should return from Royston, where he was gone to hunt, and did not return till the last day of October. The next day this letter was shewn to his majesty; who, upon perusing it, said, he did not think it was to be contemned: to which Cecil answered, He was of opinion, that it was written either by a fool or a madman, by that expression in it, "The danger is past, as soon as you have burnt the letter:" for he observed, the warning given by it could be of no use, if the burning the letter would remove the danger: but the king interpreted it, That the danger would be over in as little time as he could burn the letter; having great regard to that passage, "They should receive a terrible blow this parliament," and yet "should not see who hurt them." Which sudden blow, he apprehended, would be the effect of gun-powder; and therefore ordered all the cellars, and all other places near the parliament-house, to be searched. The earl of Suffolk, who was then lord-chamberlain, and whose proper place it was to see all places prepared for the king's reception, put off the search till the day before the meeting of parliament; and then, taking the lord Monteagle with him, viewed all the rooms about the parliament-house, and particularly the cellar under the house of lords; which he found full of wood and coals: and having inquired who it belonged to, was answered, to Mr. Percy; who being a servant of his majesty, and one who made some figure at court, the earl returned, and acquainted the king in what state he found things, without searching further. But the king's suspicion being rather increased than diminished by this report, he ordered all the wood and coals in the cellar, already mentioned, to be removed forthwith; and sir Thomas Knevet, a justice of peace for Westminster, and gentleman of the privy-chamber, was ordered to see it done, though it was then late at night. This gentleman was so fortunate, as to discover the six and thirty barrels of powder hidden under the coals; he also found a man standing near the place, booted and spurred, with his cloak on, whom he searched, and found upon him a dark lanthorn and three matches. This person proved to be Guy Fawkes, one of the conspirators, who passed for Percy's man; who seeing their hopeful plot discovered, swore, when he was apprehended, that had he been found within the cellar, he would have blown up himself, and them likewise. This discovery being made, the secretary and the lord-chamberlain immediately acquainted the king therewith, who was then in bed; and the prisoner, being examined before the council, was so far from being in any consternation, that he acknowledged the villainous design, took it all upon himself, said his religion and conscience prompted him to it, and would name none of his accomplices; only observed, That the devil had betrayed a very good design, and that there was no crime in destroying an heretical king. However, being carried to the Tower the next day, and threatened with the rack, he confessed the conspiracy, and named his accomplices; who having some intimation of the discovery, fled into Warwickshire; where some of his friends were preparing to rise in arms, and surprise the princess Elizabeth, according to the scheme they had laid; and they had actually broke open a stable belonging to one Benock, and seized seven or eight managed horses for their purpose: but understanding from their friends who fled from London, that the enterprize was entirely defeated, they assembled about an hundred horse, and endeavoured to persuade their brethren the papists, to take arms in the defence of their religion: but nobody joining them, they fled, and were pursued by sir Foulk Grevill, deputy-lieutenant of Warwickshire, and the sheriffs of that and the neighbouring counties, till the rebels took shelter in a house, at a place called Holbach, in Staffordshire. Here they endeavoured to defend themselves, when a spark of fire falling into a parcel of gunpowder, which they were drying by the fire, blew up part of the house; whereupon they endeavoured to fally out of the gate, and make their way with their swords in their hands, but were repulsed; Catesby, Percy, and Winter, setting themselves back to back, resolved to die fighting: the two first had their desire, but Winter was wounded and taken; Digby, Rockwood, Grant, and Boter surrendered; and Tresham, Robert Winter, and Littleton, were apprehended at their lodgings in London, and all of them committed to the Tower.

Thomas Winter, upon his examination, confessed the whole conspiracy, and acknowledged their crimes were too great to be forgiven; while Digby, on the other hand, said they were provoked to this desperate attempt through the severe usage they met with from the government, after hopes had been given them of a toleration; and Tresham, in his examination, accused Garnet the Jesuit as privy to the conspiracy, though he afterwards retracted it, and pretended he had not seen Garnet for sixteen years.

And thus these resolute and high aspiring papists, who dreaming of no less than the destruction of king and kingdoms, promised to themselves no less estate than the government of great and ancient monarchies, were miserably defeated, and quite overthrown in an instant; falling into the pit which they had prepared for others, and so fulfilling that sentence which his majesty did in a manner prophesy of them in his speech to the parliament; some immediately slain, others wounded, and stripped of their clothes, left lying miserably naked, and so died rather through cold than of their wounds; and the rest, that either were whole, or but slightly wounded, were taken and led by the sheriff, the ordinary minister of justice, to the gaol, the ordinary place even of the basest malefactors, where they remained till they were sent up to London, being met by an huge confluence of all sorts of people, desirous to see them as the greatest of monsters; fools to laugh at them, women and children to wonder, all the common people to gaze, the wiser sort to satisfy their curiosity in seeing the outward cases of so unparalleled a villainy, and generally all sorts of people to gratify their eyes with the sight of those whom in their hearts they detested: serving so for a fearful and public spectacle of God's fierce wrath and just indignation.

An Account of the TROUBLES and PERSECUTION of BARTHOLOMEW COPIN, MARTYR of CHRIST.

IN the year 1601, Bartholomew Copin, of the valley of Luferne, resorted unto a place called Ast, in Piedmont, with certain merchandize, purposing to vend the same at a fair there, which was to be kept the day following. It so fell out, that sitting at supper in the evening with sundry other merchants, one amongst the rest began a discourse about the diversities of religions, and therewith cast several reflections, tending to the disgrace of the inhabitants of the valley of Angrougne, and the neighbouring villages.

Copin hearing such reflections cast forth against his brethren, as he little expected from men of that sort, and also against their religion, all which tended to the dishonour of God; he feared lest it should be offensively taken, if he should not make some reply unto those blasphemies which he heard with his ears, and so answered him who held such a discourse against the religion which he himself professed. He who reproved Copin, asked, Are you one of Vandois? He answered, Yes, I am. And what, said the other, believe you not that God is in the Host? No, said Copin. Oh, said the other, see how false your religion is! My religion, said Copin, is no less true than God is God, and as certain as I am sure to die.

The next day Copin was called before the bishop of Ast, who told him that report had been made to him of some offensive speeches which he had used the night before in his lodging: and therefore it behoved him now to acknowledge his fault, if he meant to obtain pardon for the

the same, otherwise he must look to be chastised according to his demerits.

Copin answered, he had uttered nothing, but that which he was first provided to speak; nor had he said aught, but what he was resolved to maintain to the hazard of his life. He affirmed that God had bestowed upon him some worldly goods, as also a wife and children, but that he was not so glued in his affection to any of them, but he could be content to forego them all rather than the peace of a good conscience.

As touching his carriage and behaviour, if it pleased him, he said, to make inquiry thereof among the merchants of Ast, they could all resolve him as touching his honest dealing: who also he knew would witness with him, that he had wronged none in all that time he had conversed among them. And inasmuch as he was a merchant trafficking in and about his lawful calling, he ought to be dismissed and to be no further molested. For if it were lawful for Jews and Turks to trade in fairs and markets, and to use commerce throughout Piedmont; that favour ought much more to be permitted unto him who was a christian. And as touching the matter of religion, whereabout he was accused, he meddled not at all therewith for his own particular, but had questions propounded to him concerning the same by others: in which regard leave was granted him to answer, and to yield a reason of his faith in any place, to any whosoever they were that should ask what he thought of the same: yea, a liberty was granted even by his excellency, to those of the valleys of Vandois, to answer any man to a question demanded; provided that he proceeded not to teach and instruct others.

The bishop regarded none of these allegations, but commanded he should be put into prison. The next day the bishop's secretary came to visit Copin, testifying how much good-will he bore him; advising him as a friend, that if he acknowledged not his fault, he was in great danger of his life.

Copin answered, That his life was in the hands of God, and that he would never seek to save it to the prejudice of God's glory: also, that he had not above two or three turns to fetch here in this world before he arrived in heaven; and therefore prayed God so to assist him by his grace, that he might never leave the strait way which leadeth thereto.

A few days after he was examined by a monk, who was an inquisitor, in the presence of the bishop, who vexed him a long while with his sugared discourse, and by fair words endeavoured to draw him to abjure his religion. But Copin resisted him still by the holy scriptures; shewing that if he should now be ashamed of Christ, and deny him, Christ might justly be ashamed of him, and utterly deny him before his heavenly Father.

The monk finished his dispute with this dogged farewell, "Away thou cursed Lutheran, thou shalt go to all the devils in hell; and when thou comest to be tormented among those unclean spirits, then wilt thou remember these holy admonitions which we have tendered unto thee for the saving of thy soul; but thou hadst rather go to hell, than to reconcile thyself to thy holy mother the church." To which Copin answered, It is not long since I was reconciled to the true church.

After many violent assaults, they gave leave for his wife to come unto him, and with her one of his sons, promising them to set him at liberty to go home with them, if he would make amends for his fault, by acknowledging the same. His wife and son staid to supper with him in prison: during which time he used many exhortations tending to patience; albeit the wife should depart to her house without an husband, or the child without his father: For be you well assured, said he, that God will be a better husband and father unto you, than ever I was or can be. For his own part, he said, he was not bound to love wife or children more than Christ: besides, they had cause to rejoice, and to think him happy, that God would honour him so far as to bear witness to his truth with the loss of his life, and hoped, he said, that God would be so favourable to him, as to support him under any torments he was to endure, for his glory's sake.

In conclusion, he committed his son and daughter to his wife's care, which God had given them in holy wedlock, charging her again and again, to see them brought up virtuously and in the fear of God. He charged his son to obey his mother, so should he be made partaker of the promised blessing. He intreated them both to pray for him, that God would fortify him against all temptations. And thus having blessed his son, and taken leave of his wife, they were conducted out of the prison, and he shut up as he was before.

The woman and her son were dissolved into tears, sighing and crying out, that it would have moved the stoniest heart to compassion: but this holy man not contenting himself with what he had said to them by word of mouth, wrote unto his wife the following letter, the original whereof she hath exhibited to us, written and signed with the hand of the said Copin, with this inscription:

*To my well-beloved WIFE, SUSANNAH COPIN, from

DEAR yoke-fellow, I received much consolation by your coming to this place, and by so much the more as it were beyond my expectation; and I suppose you also were not a little comforted that you had such an opportunity offered you, as to sup with me the last night, being Saturday the 15th of September 1601. I know not well what they aimed at in permitting you so to do. But God ordereth all these things. But as far as I can guess, it shall be the last time that ever we shall sup together in this life: and therefore pray to God that he will not cease to be a comfort unto you. Trust you still in him, for he hath promised never to leave nor forsake those that put their trust in him. God hath endued you with wisdom; govern your own family in such a manner that our children Samuel and Martha may be obedient unto you: whom in the name and authority of God, I command that they obey you, for so the blessing of Almighty God shall light upon them.

Dear wife, be not over pensive for me, for if God hath ordained me now to attain unto the end of the race, and that I must render into the hands of the Almighty my soul, which so long time he hath lent me; my hope is, that of his holy and divine mercy he will receive it into his kingdom, for his own beloved Son's sake Jesus Christ our Lord, through whom I believe that my sins are forgiven, for the only merit of his holy death and passion. Also my prayer is, that he will assist me by the power of his holy Spirit unto my last breath.

Be fervent in prayer, and in all other parts of God's worship and service, for this is the way to true blessedness. Take no care about sending any thing unto me for these three weeks, and then I pray you send me some money, if you think good, to give the jailor, and somewhat more for mine own necessities, if it please God I live so long. Also I pray you call to mind what I have often told you, namely, how God prolonged king Hezekiah's life for fifteen years. But he hath preserved my life much longer; for it is many years ago since you saw me at the point of death, and through God's goodness I am alive; and I hope, yea I am assured, that he will so long preserve me as shall be for his glory and my good, through his eternal goodness.

From the prison of Ast, September 16, 1601.

The bishop of Ast was somewhat troubled about this his prisoner; for if he had let him go, he feared it would breed some scandal, and many might thereby be emboldened to open their mouths wide against the Roman religion. Besides, there was a clause in the contract made between his excellency and the people of Vandois, which exempted those of the religion from offence, in these words: And if it shall fall out that they be asked or questioned withal in Piedmont, about the cause of religion, by any of his excellency's subjects, it shall be lawful for those of the said religion to answer without suffering any penal or personal punishment for the same.

Now Copin had a question put to him, in which respect he ought to have been cleared. But the bishop would by no means hear that he had unjustly imprisoned him; and therefore that his death should not be laid to his charge, nor yet that he should be sent away absolved, he sent the cause of his indictment to pope Clement the Eighth, to know what should be done with him. We cannot learn what answer the pope returned to the bishop; but not long after, this good man was found dead in prison, not without some apparent suspicion of his being strangled there; lest if they had executed him in public, the people should have been edified by his constancy.

Being dead, he was condemned to be burned, and therefore having caused him to be brought out of prison, they read his sentence openly, and the body was cast into the fire.

The DEATH of HENRY III. KING of FRANCE.

A Friar, of the order of St. Dominic, pretended he had matters of great consequence to impart to the king: who being admitted into his presence, upon his knees presented a letter to him, which he drew out of one sleeve; which whilst the king attentively read, the friar pulled forth a poisoned knife out of his other sleeve, wherewith he stabbed the king in the lower part of his belly. The king finding himself wounded, snatched out the knife, and struck it into the friar's eye, who hastening to get away, the king cried out. His lords and gentlemen perceiving what the friar had done, slew him immediately with rapiers and swords.

An ACCOUNT of the BLOODY MASSACRE in the VALTOLINE, in the YEAR 1620.

THE beginning of the murders were at Tyrane. The ringleaders of this cruel massacre gave orders, that all the ways and passages should be well guarded, that their bloody designs might not be so readily discovered, and they less troubled in the execution. Then about six o'clock in the night, they entered the country, like so many foaming wild boars, and caused four muskets to be discharged before the palace of the seignior Podesta, the principal magistrate of the place, and rung the great bell of Tyrane; upon which signal all the inhabitants of that vicinity took the alarm, and made head towards the said house. They gave orders to break the bridges which lay towards Bruce, and on the place they planted a strong guard, and this was done before day. Upon the dawning of the day, the bells began to ring another peal at Mareello, and then these traitors began to range themselves together. The protestants, who without fear or suspicion came out of their houses to see what the matter was, were suddenly shot in the place. Others by force entered into the houses of protestants, drew them out of their beds, and without any compassion, slew all they could meet with.

One poor gentleman hid himself in a garret, but the villains finding him, threw him out of the window; and when they found him yet alive, they dispatched him with a piece of timber.

Antonio de Salva, a chancellor in that valley, being appointed judge upon criminal causes, a man of the greatest authority in the place, being desirous to save himself, together with his deputy, was drawn out of the house, and shot.

Another gentleman of great worth, very singularly learned, and skilful in many languages, being at that time governor of Teglio, being by chance in this hurly burly at Tyrane, was also with his servant strangled to death, in the chamber where he was found.

The reverend pastor of the church of Tyrane, a man of great sanctity and wisdom, and a lover of the peace of the country, hearing the noise of these uproars, he and the pastor of Mello withdrew themselves into a hall, where having commended their souls to God, were there murdered.

The furious wretches cut off Basso's head, and carried it into the church, and fixed it upon a pole in the pulpit where he used to preach, scornfully saying, Come down, Basso, thou hast preached long enough already.

In like manner at the same time the palace of the chequer of Tyrane was besieged by those hell-hounds; wherein dwelled seignior John de Cappaul, being at that time governor. To which place, Michael Lazarone, a man of good account, and chancellor of that office, had retired himself early in the morning to save his life. But because he was extremely hated by the papists, for his singular piety and sincerity, he was continually pursued by them; insomuch that those rebels followed him even to the palace, threatening to set fire to the same, if he were not delivered into their hands. Lazarone seeing that, was forced that evening to leave the house, and hide himself about the banks of the river Adda, wherein he covered himself, and lay close three whole hours all naked to save himself. But his enemies followed him closely, and at last found him, and dragged him out of the water; and though with tears in his eyes he begged for his life, in consideration of his dear small children, yet they answered, That this was no time for pity and favour: but if he would swear by the pope's bull, and abjure his faith, they would grant him his life. But he, with a courageous resolution, answered, God forbid, that I, for love of this temporal life, should deny my Lord Jesus Christ, who with his precious blood upon the cross, did at so dear a rate redeem me, and after I have so long time, through his grace, freely and publicly confessed him, should now hazard the loss of eternal life; I say, God forbid. Upon this they immediately murdered him.

The very same evening, the gate of the palace was burnt to the ground by those rebels, who the next morning entered into the same, raging with fury, and took the governor prisoner, with his young son; spoiling and ransacking wives and maidens, and carrying away all they could lay hands on. The governor of the place was taken away, and after he had remained a long time prisoner, he was shot.

John Antonio Mazano, endeavouring to make resistance against those rebels, and his wife defending him, was with herself and two young children miserably killed.

Another called John Antonio Schloffer, a Gardonese, having made long resistance, and killed one of the rebels, was at last taken, and tied to a tree, and so shot to death.

To be short, these villains had no regard of any person, neither young, old, weak, or strong, many of all sorts were either shot to death, or cut in pieces, or in one manner or other destroyed; and the number of those persons in estimation, who in Tyrane received the crown of martyrdom for the profession of the gospel, was about sixty.

The ladies who were not slain, were constrained to change their religion, and to go to mass; except the wife of the said Lazarone and her daughters, and her niece, being the wife of one Egido, who by the assistance of Almighty God continued in safety. And there also the 8th of August, the said ladies were released, who retired themselves into Retia, viz. the wife of this Lazarone, and her two daughters, leaving behind them in the Valtoline one daughter and two young sons who could not obtain leave to depart the country.

At the massacre of Teglio were murdered about sixty persons. These wicked wretches, apparelled in red cassocks, and well mounted on horseback, marched in the morning to Tellat, the hour when the sermon was, and ran like famished wolves to the Volta church: the protestants who were in the church, observing the evil intention intention of those villains, arose suddenly from their seats, and endeavoured to shut the door, and to barricado the place with the benches. They without laboured with all their power to enter the church; but not being able so speedily to do it, some of them climbed up unto the windows, and discharged their muskets among the people without respect of any person, and killed many of them. At last they opened the door, entered, and slew all they found, saving a few who promised to go to mass. Some of the men and women with their children fled into the belfrey to save themselves; but they set fire to the place, and burnt all that were within.

At the massacre at Sondres, in the mountain of Sondrium and Malenk, were left dead above one hundred and forty persons. But the chancellor Giovan Andrea Migardino, with his brother Gregory, and others of the church of Sondres, withdrew themselves, to the number of eighteen, together with certain ladies and their young children, into their own house, which joined to the palace, and there they fortified themselves with resolution to defend themselves even unto death, seeing that in the street wherein they dwelt none durst come out of their doors, nor enter into the church which stood over against them. Nevertheless, the enemy resolved to set upon the house with a thousand armed men, threatening also to kill the magistrate, in case any of them should take any harm by those who were in the house. Whereupon the magistrate commanded those in the house to depart; who being well armed, immediately took their way by Sondres towards the bridge, where for a time they fortified themselves, then returning again, they drew unto them certain others, and marched towards the church of the mountain of Sondres. In which place being gathered together with the pastor, they made their prayers to God, and afterwards, to the number of threescore and thirteen persons in all, they passed the valley of Malenco, which was beset by the enemy on two sides: but those that kept those places were by the providence of God so astonished, that they fled away, and the protestants, though they were pursued to the tops of the hills, did miraculously escape with safety.

Annaidi Lita, wife of Anthoni Grotti, of Chio, in the territory of Vincentine, of an honourable and ancient house, was come out of Italy but a few years before for the liberty of her conscience. She was first by them exhorted with fair words to change her religion; but she constantly persevering therein, was admonished that she would at least have a care of her young infant which she held in her arms, being about two months old; otherwise she would make reckoning, that in the twinkling of an eye both she and her babe should die: but she with a bold and undaunted courage answered, That she had not departed out of Italy her native country, neither had she forsaken all the estate she had, to renounce at last that faith which had been inspired into her by the Lord Jesus Christ; yea, that she would rather suffer, if it were possible, a thousand deaths. And how, said she, should I have regard in this cause of my infant, since God our heavenly Father spared not his only Son, my Lord Jesus, but delivered him up to death for the love of me and of all sinners? Then giving them the child, she said, Behold the child; the Lord God, who hath the care of the birds of the air, will much more be able to save this poor creature, although by you it were left in those wild mountains. So unlacing her gown, she opened her breast, and said, Here is the body which you have power to kill; but my soul, on which you have no power to lay hands, that I commend to my God, and immediately she was cut in pieces, being thirty-five years of age. The infant, because it was a lovely and sweet babe to look on, was suffered to live, and was delivered to a popish woman to nurse. The husband of this gentlewoman was murdered for the faith before.

Some women were by force taken up to the tops of high and craggy mountains, and threatened to be thrown down headlong with their children, unless they would go to mass. And although some were moved and terrified with the horrors of death, and had consented to change their religion, yet were they murdered for all that without any pity at all.

The same befel a gentleman of Soglio, in the Pregaglia; for though his life was promised him, he was brought into the market place pinioned with a cord, and miserably slain by two musketeers, being seventy-two years of age, after he had been robbed of his gold and silver, whereof great store was found in his house, according to the common and too much practised rule of the Roman catholics.

An aged man of sixty-seven years was set upon an ass, his face turned to the tail, which he held in his hand instead of a bridle, and in his other hand a book, whom in this manner they carried through Sondres, with great joy and triumph. Then they cut off his ears, nose, and cheeks, boring holes into divers parts of his body, with a strange and unparalleled barbarity, until they had quite killed him; but he for the love of Christ his Saviour with great and incredible courage endured all those varieties of torments.

Anthony de Prati, of the hills, was exhorted with many words to abjure his religion; but he constantly persevered, and with a generous courage replied in these words, "My soul shall be taken up into Abraham's bosom, and after my death my enemies shall see the angel of God hard by me, &c." And accordingly an angel appeared over his body in a white garment, being seen by those who stood near him, who of their own accord have publicly confessed the same.

An aged man of seventy-five years, being set upon by those inhuman wretches, leaped out of a window and passed the river Maletto, and having got to his house, and shifted his clothes, he was assailed again, taken prisoner, and carried to the palace, put often to the strapado, and at last was so hewn and sliced with a sword, that he had nothing left him but his arms, which were fastened to the cord.

Paulo Beretta, of Chio, in the county of Vicence, a virgin of the age of seventy-five years, of an honourable, noble, and ancient family, who came twenty-seven years before to Sondres to embrace the gospel, was by these villains carried through Sondres, with all disgrace, shame, and scorn, having a mitre of paper put upon her head, her face besmeared with dirt, and many buffets given in her cheeks, and in many other fashions abused. Being required to call upon the holy virgin Mary and the saints, and to place her trust in them, she smiling, readily answered them, My trust and my salvation is in my only Saviour Jesus Christ, and in him only will I trust. And it is also true, that I acknowledge the virgin Mary for the most holy virgin above all others, which ever was, or ever will be; who was a virgin before the birth, a virgin in the birth, and after birth, and so shall remain. Who though she be favoured and beloved of God, above all women in the world, to be made the mother of my Lord Jesus the Saviour of the world; nevertheless, because she is not able to know our necessities, as not being omnipotent, (for otherwise she would be God himself) and besides hath had need of the merits of her Son, it was not lawful for her to call upon any other than the eternal God, who knoweth all things, and upon no creature of any quality whatsoever, &c. In this manner she endured their scorns and outrages with an incredible constancy and cheerfulness, saying continually, I do willingly endure as becometh me to do, desiring no better usage, since the very same hath been done to my Lord and Saviour Jesus, and to his apostles, and to thousands of the holy martyrs. At last she was carried away to be sent to Milan. On the eighteenth of July an elderly woman was found murdered in the highway, in the plain of St. Gregory, in the Valtoline, which some conjectured to be the body of this gentlewoman, who it was thought was murdered by the assassins in that place.

Many hid themselves in holes and caves, and woods, out of which they durst not come but by night only to get some food, and that with great fear and terror, on account of the watching of the enemy; and others for want of convenient food to eat, and others that fed only upon roots, leaves, and grass, made an end of their lives; and many were murdered in divers places, who had no burial at all; so that many carcases were to be seen seen in groves and woods in the mountains, and in the waters in many places.

At the massacre of Berbonne, were slain about eleven persons. And likewise

At Caspano, and Trahorn, about the same number: one of them was by trade a taylor, who being discovered by his countrymen and kindred, was taken and carried to Morbegnio, and being solicited to forsake the true religion, and to embrace the Roman, and standing with great manfulness thereto, was condemned to the fire, and was placed between two heaps of wood, to make him recant; but all was in vain; for being asked, If he were a catholic, he answered, That he was. Then, if he were a Roman catholic; he likewise affirmed he was so. But being demanded, if he held the Roman faith as it is at this day, he answered, No. It is true, said he, that I hold the ancient catholic Roman faith, which was preached by St. Paul, That a man is saved by grace by the means of faith, and not by works, lest any man should boast. Being demanded, if he believed the pope to be the head of the church, he answered, No; because Christ only is the head of the church, according to the promise, "I will be with you unto the end of the world." And though the fire was kindled and put out again on purpose to draw him to a recantation, nevertheless he persevered and endured that cruel death with admirable constancy, the 15th day of August, being sixty years old.

Giovan Pietro Malacrida, although he were little of stature, yet was he great and mighty in the confession of the truth, inasmuch that for the love of his Saviour he suffered death with singular cheerfulness, being forty years of age. His example was devoutly and constantly imitated by Elizabeth his wife, who was killed in the 38th year of her age: and moreover these Herodian murderers not therewith content, but joining one barbarous inhumanity to another, observing a daughter of her's, being an infant of three years old, to lie in the cradle, although it was a child of a sweet countenance, and these wretches seeing that the babe looked lovingly and pleasantly upon them, which would have been enough to have moved any adamant heart to compassion, yet notwithstanding they took this pretty innocent babe by the feet, and dashed out her brains against the wall.

Upon the most serious consideration it every way appeareth, that the aforesaid persons underwent those sufferings for no other cause, but only for the truth of the gospel; even as by the eternal decree of God, the holy prophet St. John the Baptist, the holy apostles, yea, even our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and after him those many millions of the martyrs in all ages have done before, and especially in these times, in Germany, France, England, Scotland, Low-Countries, Bohemia, Italy, Spain, Portugal, &c.

Which martyrdom they endured willingly, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer blame for the name of Jesus, remembering the promise of our Lord, Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness sake, because the kingdom of heaven is their's. Blessed are you when others shall revile and persecute you, and shall falsely speak all evil of you for my sake: rejoice and triumph, for great is your reward in heaven, for so have they persecuted the prophets who were before you. Read to this purpose, 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16; which words, by all good christians are to be well pondered and weighed. For first, By such trial we perish not. Secondly, We are thereby made conformable to Christ our head. Thirdly, Such sufferings cause unto us greater joy than sorrow. Fourthly, They are infallible marks that the spirit of God rests upon us. Fifthly, They manifest to all our unfeigned love to Christ and his gospel. Sixthly, Hereby we have good proof that the Lord doth correct us, not as a severe judge, but as a most loving and tender-hearted Father; to whom therefore with his blessed Son, and Holy Spirit, be all glory and honour ascribed in all the churches of the saints, world without end, Amen.

SIGNS and PRODIGES, which happened before and after the MASSACRE in the VALTOLINE.

THE protestants having appointed guards in the churches of the Valtoline, besides others which were commanded to watch in certain places, to give the sign by fire, to the intent that the whole valley being warned partly by the beacons, partly by the sound of the bells, might be ready together on a sudden to take arms for their defence against the Spaniards, if they should make any excursion upon the valley: about the month of May, 1620, in Sondres, the aforesaid centinels reported, that in the night as they watched, they heard in the church of Gervase, a murmuring as it were of many persons, with great earnestness and vehemency of arguing and contesting among themselves: and from the church there shined upwards through the steeple a great brightness, insomuch that the centinels lighted their torches, and assembled themselves to go down into the church to see what the matter might be. But as they were descending down the stairs, their lights were put out, and returning afresh to light their torches, they were put out again with greater strength, and with much astonishment and trembling; and the brightness which filled the church suddenly vanished, the weights also of the great clock fell down, and they heard about ten tolls of a bell, in such a manner as it useth to ring to give the alarm, which was heard by many.

Likewise in Tyrane, the great bell was heard in like manner; and the magistrates commanded them suddenly to go and know the cause, but he found that it was not done by the hand of men, and instantly the servants running from the belfrey, and diligently attending to see this business, they discerned a thing like a cat to descend down into the place.

After the massacre, in the Valtoline, the evangelic protestant church, and principally from Teglio and Tyrane, a voice hath been heard to cry, Woe, woe to you, the vengeance of God is upon you for the blood of the innocent.

Also the bell of the evangelic church of Tyrane, used to ring even at the same time that the sermon was wont to be: and in that church a voice was heard, like the voice of Seignior Antonio Basso, who some time had been there a minister, and was murdered in the said place, as if himself had been preaching there.

In Sondres there was seen to descend an army from the mountains every way furnished; which sight was the cause that many took their flight, and departed out of Sondres; but suddenly this apparition vanished like a cloud. Which struck a great terror into the minds of the people, insomuch that many departed out of the valley, as fearing a dreadful punishment from heaven.

EMINENT PROTESTANTS.

CHAP. I.

An ACCOUNT of the RISE, PROGRESS, PERSECUTIONS, and SUFFERINGS, of the PEOPLE commonly called QUAKERS.

IN treating of these people in an historical manner, we are obliged to have recourse to much tenderness. That they differ from the generality of Protestants in some of the capital points of religion, cannot be denied; and yet, as Protestant Dissenters, they are included under the description of the toleration act. It is not our business to inquire whether people of similar sentiments had any existence in the primitive ages of Christianity; perhaps, in some respects, they had not; but we are to write of them not as what they were, but what they now are. That they have been treated by several writers in a very contemptuous manner, is certain; that they did not deserve such treatment, is equally certain.

The appellation Quakers was bestowed upon them as a term of reproach, in consequence of their apparent convulsions which they laboured under when they delivered their discourses, because they imagined they were the effect of Divine inspiration.

It is not our business, at present, to inquire whether the sentiments of these people are agreeable to the gospel, but this much is certain, that the first leader of them, as a separate body, was a man of obscure birth, who had his first existence in Leicestershire, about the year 1624. In speaking of this man we shall deliver our own sentiments in an historical manner, and joining these to what have been said by the Friends themselves, we shall endeavour to furnish out a complete narrative.

He was descended of honest and respected parents, who brought him up in the national religion: but from a child he appeared religious, still, solid, and observing, beyond his years, and uncommonly knowing in divine things. He was brought up to husbandry, and other country business, and was particularly inclined to the solitary occupation of a shepherd; "an employment," says our author, "that very well suited his mind in several respects, both for its innocency and solitude; and was a just emblem of his after ministry and service." In the year 1646, he entirely forsook the national church, in whose tenets he had been brought up, as before observed; and in 1647, he travelled into Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, without any set purpose of visiting particular places, but in a solitary manner he walked through several towns and villages, which way soever his mind turned. "He fasted much," says Sewell, "and walked often in retired places, with no other companion than his Bible." "He visited the most retired and religious people in those parts," says Penn, "and some there were, short of few, if any, in this nation, who waited for the consolation of Israel night and day; as Zacharias, Anna, and Simeon, did of old time. To these he was sent, and these he sought out in the neighbouring counties, and among them he sojourned till his more ample ministry came upon him. At this time he taught, and was an example of silence, endeavouring to bring them from self-performances; testifying of, and turning them to the light of Christ within them, and encouraging them to wait in patience, and to feel the power of it to stir in their hearts, that their knowledge and worship of God might stand in the power of an endless life, which was to be found in the light, as it was obeyed in the manifestation of it in man: for in the word was life, and that life is the light of men. Life in the word, light in men; and life in men too, as the light is obeyed; the children of the light living by the life of the word, by which the word begets them again to God, which is the generation and new birth, without which there is no coming into the kingdom of God, and to which whoever comes is greater than John; that is, than John's dispensation, which was not that of the kingdom, but the consummation of the legal, and fore-running of the gospel-times, the time of the kingdom. Accordingly several meetings were gathering in those parts; and thus his time was employed for some years.

In the year 1652, "he had a visitation of the great work of God in the earth, and of the way that he was to go forth, in a public ministry, to begin it." He directed his course northward, "and in every place where he came, if not before he came to it, he had his particular exercise and service shewn to him; so that the Lord was his leader indeed." He made great numbers of converts to his opinions, and many pious and good men joined him in his ministry. These were drawn forth especially to visit the public assemblies to reprove, reform, and exhort them; sometimes in markets, fairs, streets, and by the highway-side, "calling people to repentance, and to return to the Lord, with their hearts as well as their mouth; directing them to the light of Christ within them, to see, examine, and to consider their ways by, and to eschew the evil, and to do the good and acceptable will of God."

They were not without opposition in the work they imagined themselves called to, being often set in the stocks, stoned, beaten, whipped, and imprisoned, though, as our author observes, honest men of good report, that had left wives, children, houses and lands, to visit them with a living call to repentance. But these coercive methods rather forwarded than abated their zeal, and in those parts they brought over many profelytes, and amongst them several magistrates, and others of the better sort. They apprehended the Lord had forbidden them to pull off their hats to any one, high or low, and required them to speak to the people, without distinction, in the language of thou and thee. They scrupled bidding people good-morrow, or good-night; nor might they bend the knee to any one, even in supreme authority. Both men and women went in a plain and simple dress, different from the fashion of the times. They neither gave nor accepted any titles of respect or honour, nor would they call any man master, on earth. Several texts of scripture they quoted in defence of these singularities; such as, Swear not at all. How can ye believe who receive honour of one another, and seek not the honour which comes from God only? &c. &c. They placed the basis of religion in an inward light, and an extraordinary impulse of the holy Spirit.

In 1654, their first separate meeting in London was held in the house of Robert Dring, in Watling-street, for by that time they had spread themselves into all parts of the kingdom, and had in many places set up meetings and assemblies, particularly in Lancashire and the adjacent parts; but they were still exposed to great persecutions and trials of every kind. One of them, in a letter to the protector, Oliver Cromwell, represents, that though there are no penal laws in force obliging men to comply with the established religion, yet the Quakers are exposed upon other accounts; they are fined and imprisoned for refusing to take an oath; for not paying their tithes; for disturbing the public assemblies, and meeting in the streets, and places of public resort; some of them have been whipped for vagabonds, and for their plain speeches to the magistrate.

Under favour of the then toleration, they opened their meetings at the Bull and Mouth, in Aldersgate-street, where women, as well as men, were moved to speak. Their zeal transported them to some extravagancies, which laid them still more open to the lash of their enemies, who exercised various severities upon them throughout the next reign. Upon the suppression of Venner's mad insurrection, the government having published a proclamation, forbidding the Anabaptists, Quakers, and Fifth monarchy men, to assemble or meet together under pretence of worshipping God, except it be in some parochial church, chapel, or in private houses, by consent of the persons there inhabiting, all meetings in other places, being declared to be unlawful and riotous, &c. &c. the Quakers thought it expedient to address the king thereon, which they did in the following words:

"Ob King Charles!

"OUR desire is, that thou mayest live for ever in the fear of God, and thy council. We beseech thee and thy council to read these following lines in tender bowels, and compassion for our souls, and for your good.

"And this consider, we are about four hundred imprisoned, in and about this city, of men and women from their families, besides, in the county gaols, about ten hundred; we desire that our meetings may not be broken up, but that all may come to a fair trial, that our innocency may be cleared up.

"London, 16th day, eleventh month, 1660."

On the 28th of the same month, they published the declaration referred to in their address, entitled, "A declaration from the harmless and innocent people of God, called Quakers, against all sedition, plotters, and fighters in the world, for removing the ground of jealousy and suspicion, from both magistrates and people, in the kingdom, concerning wars and fightings." It was presented to the king the 21st day of the eleventh month, 1660, and he promised them upon his royal word, that they should not suffer for their opinions, as long as they lived peaceably; but his promises were very little regarded afterwards.

In 1661, they assumed courage to petition the house of lords for a toleration of their religion, and for a dispensation from taking the oaths, which they held unlawful, not from any disaffection to the government, or a belief that they were less obliged by an affirmation, but from a persuasion that all oaths were unlawful, and that swearing upon the most solemn occasions was forbidden in the New Testament. Their petition was rejected, and instead of granting them relief, an act was passed against them, the preamble to which set forth, "That whereas several persons have taken up an opinion, that an oath, even before a magistrate, is unlawful, and contrary to the word of God; and whereas, under pretence of religious worship, the said persons do assemble in great numbers in several parts of the kingdom, separating themselves from the rest of his majesty's subjects, and the public congregations and usual places of divine worship: be it therefore enacted, that if any such persons, after the 24th of March, 1661-2, shall refuse to take an oath when lawfully tendered, or persuade others to do it, or maintain in writing, or otherwise, the unlawfulness of taking an oath; or if they shall assemble for religious worship, to the number of five or more, of the age of fifteen, they shall for the first offence forfeit five pounds; for the second, ten pounds; and for the third shall abjure the realm, or be transported to the plantations: and the justices of peace at their open sessions may hear and finally determine in the affair."

This act had a most dreadful effect upon the Quakers, though it was well known and notorious these conscientious persons were far from sedition or disaffection to the government. George Fox, in his address to the king, acquaints him, that three thousand and sixty-eight of their friends had been imprisoned since his majesty's restoration; that their meetings were daily broken up by men with clubs and arms, and their friends thrown into the water, and trampled under foot till the blood gushed out, which gave rise to their meeting in the open streets. A relation was printed, signed by twelve witnesses, which says, that more than four thousand two hundred Quakers were imprisoned; and of them five hundred were in and about London, and the suburbs; several of whom were dead in the gaols.

However, they even gloried in their sufferings, which increased every day; so that in 1665, and the intermediate years, they were harrassed without example. As they persisted resolutely to assemble, openly, at the Bull and Mouth before-mentioned, the soldiers, and other officers, dragged them from thence to prison, till Newgate was filled with them, and multitudes died of close confinement, in that and other gaols.

Six hundred of them, says an account published at this time, were in prison, merely for religion-sake, of whom several were banished to the plantations. In short, says Mr. Neale, the Quakers gave such full employment to the informers, that they had less leisure to attend the meetings of other Dissenters.

Yet, under all these calamities, they behaved with patience and modesty towards the government, and upon occasion of the Rye-house plot, in 1682, thought proper to declare their innocence of that sham plot, in an address to the king, wherein, appealing to the searcher of all hearts, they say, their principles do not allow them to take up defensive arms, much less to avenge themselves for the injuries they receive from others; that they continually pray for the king's safety and preservation; and therefore take this occasion humbly to beseech his majesty to compassionate their suffering friends, with whom the gaols are so filled, that they want air, to the apparent hazard of their lives, and to the endangering an infection in divers places. Besides, many houses, shops, barns, and fields are ransacked, and the goods, corn, and cattle swept away, to the discouraging trade and husbandry, and impoverishing great numbers of quiet and industrious people; and this, for no other cause, but for the exercise of a tender conscience in the worship of Almighty God, who is sovereign Lord and King of men's consciences.

On the accession of James II. they addressed that monarch honestly and plainly, telling him, "we are come to testify our sorrow for the death of our good friend Charles, and our joy for thy being made our governor. We are told thou art not of the persuasion of the church of England, no more than we; therefore we hope thou wilt grant us the same liberty which thou allowest thyself, which doing, we wish thee all manner of happiness."

When James, by his dispensing power, granted liberty to the Dissenters, they began to enjoy some rest from their troubles; and indeed it was high time, for they were swelled to an enormous amount. They, the year before this, to them glad release, in a petition to James for a cessation of their sufferings, set forth, "that of late above one thousand five hundred of their friends, both men and women, and that now there remain one thousand three hundred and eighty-three; of which two hundred are women, many under sentence of præmunire; and more than three hundred near it, for refusing the oath of allegiance, because they could not swear. Three hundred and fifty have died in prison since the year 1680; in London, the gaol of Newgate has been crowded, within these two years, sometimes with near 20 in a room, whereby several have been suffocated, and others, who have been taken out sick, have died of malignant fevers within a few days. Great violences, outrageous distresses, and woeful havock and spoil, have been made upon people's goods and estates, by a company of idle, extravagant, and merciless informers, by persecutions on the conventicle-act, and others; also on qui tam writs, and on other processes, for twenty pounds a month, and two thirds of their estates seized for the king. Some had not a bed left to rest on, others had no cattle to till the ground, nor corn for seed or bread, nor tools to work with; the said informers and bailiffs in some places breaking into houses, and making great waste and spoil, under pretence of serving the king and the church. Our religious assemblies have been charged at common law with being rioters and disturbers of the public peace, whereby great numbers have been confined in prison without regard to age, and many confined in holes and dungeons. The seizing for 20l. a month has amounted to many thousands, and several who have employed some hundreds of poor people in manufactures, are disabled to do any more, by reason of long imprisonment. They spare neither widow nor fatherless, nor have they so much as a bed to lie on. The informers are both witnesses and prosecutors, to the ruin of great numbers of sober families; and justices of the peace have been threatened with the forfeiture of one hundred pounds, if they do not issue out warrants upon their informations." With this petition they presented a list of their friends in prison, in the several counties, amounting to four hundred and sixty.

During the reign of king James II. these people were, through the intercession of their friend Mr. Penn, treated with greater indulgence than ever they had been before. They were now become extremely numerous in many parts of the country, and the settlement of Pennsylvania taking place soon after, many of them went over to America. There they enjoyed the blessings of a peaceful government, and cultivated the arts of honest industry.

As the whole colony was the property of Mr. Penn, so he invited people of all denominations to come and settle with him. An universal liberty of conscience took place; and in this new colony the natural rights of mankind were, for the first time, established.

These Friends are, in the present age, a very harmless inoffensive body of people; but of that we shall take more notice hereafter. By their wise regulations, they not only do honour to themselves, but they are of vast service to the community: and here we are led to consider their tenets, with respect to the grand articles of the Christian faith, and their discipline concerning church communion.

They profess faith in God, by his only-begotten Son Jesus Christ, as being their light and life, as well as their only way to the Father, and a mediator with the Father. That God created all things by his Son Jesus Christ; and that the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit are one Divine Being, inseparable, one true living and eternal God, blessed for ever. That the Word, or Son of Man, in the fulness of time, took our nature upon him, and became a perfect man, according to the flesh; was miraculously conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary; declared to be the Son of God, according to the spirit of sanctification, by the resurrection from the dead. That in this Word was life, and the same life was the light of men, the life and light within us; and that men are to believe in this light, Christ Jesus.

That as man he died for our sins, rose again, and was raised up into glory; he having, by that one great universal offering, become a sacrifice for peace, atonement, and reconciliation between God and man. That Jesus, who sitteth on the right-hand of the Majesty of Heaven, is our king, high-priest, and prophet, in his church, and by his spirit also maketh intercession in our hearts. That the gospel of this grace should be preached in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, being one in power, wisdom, and goodness, in the work of man's salvation, and that all our prayers are answered by the Father through the Son.

That Christ's body that was crucified was not the God-head; yet, by the power of God, it was raised from the dead, changed into a more glorious condition, and ascended into heaven.

Firm and living faith in Jesus Christ the Son of the living God respects his being and fulness, and also his making himself known in the soul in every degree of his light, life, spirit, grace, and truth, the immediate cause, author, object, and strength of our living faith; which light and life of the Son of God, when truly observed and followed, will bring us to the adoption of sons.

It is true, we are not to undervalue the holy scriptures, nor slight the preaching of the word, as being outward helps and instruments in the hand of God for the conversion of sinners; nor do we set them up in opposition to the light of the spirit of God or Christ within; for his faithful messengers are ministers thereof to turn people to the same spirit and light within them.

It is certain, that great is the mystery of godliness in itself, that God should be manifested in the flesh; and it is a great and precious mystery of godliness and christianity, that Christ should be spiritually and effectually manifested in men's hearts. Christ is revealed to all true believers, freeing them from the bondage of sin, in their wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.

tion. This mystery of godliness in it's own being and glory, hath been and must be testified, preached, and believed, where God is pleased to give commission, and prepare people's hearts for the same.

As touching the resurrection of the dead, we believe as the scripture testifies, "That if in this life we only have hope, we are of all men the most miserable." That the soul or spirit of every man or woman shall be resumed in it's own distinct and proper being, and every soul shall have it's proper body, as God is pleased to give it. A natural body is sown, a spiritual body is raised; and though this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality, the change shall be such as flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, so we expect our bodies to be spiritual in the resurrection, and that they shall far excel what our bodies are at present; but how the dead are raised, or with what body they come, we submit to the wisdom and pleasure of Almighty God; for we cannot presume to determine.

As to the doctrine of the final judgment, we believe, that God hath committed all judgment unto his Son Jesus Christ, and he is appointed to be both the judge of quick and dead, and of the states and end of all mankind. That Jesus Christ, who hath so deeply suffered, and endured so many indignities, shall in the last and great day manifestly appear in glory, attended with all his glorious and heavenly host and retinue, to the terror and amazement of all who have denied him; but to the glory and triumph of the righteous, the faithful followers and friends of Christ. It is a righteous thing with God, that they who suffer with him, shall appear with him in glory and dignity, when he shall appear at last to judge the world and the princes thereof. Whilst those who now evade and reject the inward convictions and judgment of the light, and shut up the records or books thereof in their own consciences; they shall be at last opened, and every thing judged of the things recorded therein, according to their works.

These articles are generally approved of by most of those christians whom we call orthodox; but as a charge was brought against the Quakers for having embraced the notion of Socinus, in vindication of themselves they added a few more articles to their creed. These are as follow:

I. That Jesus of Nazareth, who was born of the Virgin Mary, is the true Messiah, the Christ, the Son of God, to whom all the prophets are witnesses; and that we do highly value his death, sufferings, works, offices, and merits, for the redemption of mankind, with his laws, doctrines, and ministry.

II. That this very Christ of God, who is the Lamb of God that taketh away all the sins of the world, was slain, was dead, and is alive for ever in his eternal glory, dominion, and power, with the Father.

III. That the holy scriptures are of Divine authority, as being given by the inspiration of God.

IV. And that magistracy, or civil government, is God's ordinance, the good ends thereof being for the punishment of evil doers, and the praise of them that do well.

These articles were added by one George Whitehead, a noted man among them; and here it may be necessary to observe, that these people pay very great regard to the scriptures, and to many other doctrines of the gospel.

Baptism is not practised by these people. They say, that it is not outward washing with water that makes the heart clean, by which men are fitted for heaven. Mr. Barclay, in his Apology, endeavours to prove this proposition in the following manner, viz. "As there is one Lord, and one faith, so there is one baptism, which is not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience before God, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. And this baptism is a pure and spiritual thing; that is, the baptism of the spirit, and by which we are buried with him; that being washed and buried from our sins, we may walk in newness of life; of which the baptism of John was only a figure, which was commanded for a time, and not to continue for ever." Such are the sentiments of this learned man concerning infant baptism, or in general all water baptism whatever. He adds further, that infant baptism is a mere human invention; for which neither precept nor practice is to be found in scripture.

Concerning the sacrament of the Lord's supper, he advances, "That the communion of the body and blood of Christ is inward and spiritual, which is the participation of his flesh and blood, by which the infant man is daily nourished in the hearts of those in whom Christ dwells; of which things the breaking of bread by Christ with his disciples was a figure, which they even used in the church for a time, who had received the substance for the cause of the weak; even in abstaining from things strangled, and from blood; the washing of one another's feet, and the anointing of the sick with oil; all which are commanded with less authority and solemnity than the former; yet seeing they are only the shadows of better things, so they cease in such as have obtained the substance."

It is not our business to inquire whether Mr. Barclay's sentiments be true or not; his Apology, however, was soon after it's first publication translated into Latin, which even led foreigners to read it; and the author has seen translations of it into French, German, and Low Dutch.

Having thus far considered the principles of the Friends, commonly called Quakers, we shall proceed to give some account of the various parts of their discipline.

In 1667, George Fox recommended the setting up of monthly meetings throughout the nation, the friends having only had their quarterly meetings. "And the Lord appeared (says George) unto me, and bid me see what I must do, and how men and women's monthly and quarterly meetings should be ordered and established in England, and other nations, and that I should write to them where I came not, to do the same. Accordingly, having recommended the setting up of two monthly meetings in London to take care of God's glory, and to admonish and exhort such as walked disorderly, and not according to the truth; then I passed forth into the counties again, and advised that monthly meetings should be settled there also, for the same purpose, which was done according to the gospel order, in and by the power of God; and in the year 1668, I went over for the same purpose to Ireland. From thence I went to Scotland, to Holland, to Barbadoes; and to many parts of America, advising friends to settle monthly meetings in those countries; all which was accordingly done.

The good effects of these monthly meetings discovered themselves in the reformation that took place among our friends, and they were acknowledged even by those who did not join us." These monthly meetings were more or less in number, as the case required, in every respective county; and three monthly meetings make a quarterly one in each county. These meetings called quarterly, determined every thing too hard for the monthly ones, and prepared matters for the general yearly meetings. In all these meetings they are equal in power, they have no person to preside over them, because they acknowledge none but Christ for their head. They have no disputes concerning differences, but endeavour to convince each other in the spirit of love and meekness. In these meetings they inquire into all the wants of their brethren.

In their proceedings against offenders, they are as follow: He is visited by some of the friends, and the fact he is charged with is laid before him. They labour with much love and zeal to convince his conscience that he has been out of the way of his duty. They keep in view the glory of God, the good of his soul, and the honour of their profession. It commonly happens, that he is prevailed on to own his fault, and profess sincere repentance; and then the thing is never mentioned to him afterwards.

The monthly meeting chuse some of the gravest of their friends to visit such as are absent, to converse with them, them, to take care that the poor be provided for, to promote piety, charity, and friendship in families, to take care that the children of the poor be instructed, clothed, and in all things provided for.

Although they supply the wants of all their own poor, yet this does not prevent them from being charitable to the poor of other religious denominations.

The first questions asked by those whom we have already mentioned as visitors are the following.

I. How are ministering friends in love and unity with one another, and with faithful brethren in their own meetings?

II. Do none of them travel abroad in the works of the ministry, without a certificate from their own monthly meetings?

III. Do they give way to each other, and to strangers?

IV. Do none overcharge themselves with business to the hindrance of their service?

V. Are they sound in their ministry?

VI. Do any of them burden their hearers with words without life?

VII. Do they adorn their doctrine by a suitable conduct and conversation, as good example in all respects?

The sensible reader will acknowledge, that these are very important questions; but their discipline concerning marriage; merits the attention of Protestants of all denominations.

The man and woman present themselves to the men and women at the monthly meetings where they reside, and there deliver their intention of taking each other as husband and wife, if the said meeting have no material objections against it.

The principal conditions of their acceptance, are the following:

First, It is an established rule, that no man propose marriage to a woman, without the previous consent of his own and her parents, or guardians; and if the unbridled affections of any should have precipitated him into a breach of this rule, he is required to remove the offence, as is also the woman, and give satisfaction to such parents and guardians, and to the meeting to which they belong, by a due and open acknowledgment of the offence, and condemnation of themselves for it, and to get the consent of their guardians before they can proceed with the marriage.

Secondly, That the parties be of the same opinion and judgment in matters of religion, and professed members of this society.

Thirdly, That none shall marry within such degrees of consanguinity or affinity, as are forbidden by the law of God.

Fourthly, If either of the parties has given offence to their friends formerly, by some act of scandal, they are to acknowledge it, which is generally done in writing.

If no objections are then made, notice of the intended marriage is published in the meetings, where the man or woman resides, or did reside, which must be done before the marriage is solemnized, in order that convenient time may be granted for satisfaction concerning their clearances of all scandal of previous contract, and every thing else.

The parties are required to give their attendance a second time at the monthly meeting, which is usually the next ensuing, when the parties appointed to make the inquiry, return and give the answer, which if proved satisfactory, the parties are at liberty to proceed to the accomplishment of the marriage.

These marriages are solemnized in the common ordinary meetings, which hath had this good effect, to make public, and strongly recommend this decent and comely order to all sober friends.

Here the man and woman take each other as husband and wife, and promise, with God's assistance, to be loving and faithful in that relation, till death separates them. Of all these proceedings, a narrative is kept in the manner of a certificate, to which the husband and wife set their hands, thereby making it their own act and deed, and some of the persons present do the same. This certificate is afterwards written into the record of the meeting.

As for second marrying, they attend to the following things:

First, If the man be a widower, or the woman a widow, and have children by a former husband or wife, that provision be previously made for such children, where it can conveniently be done.

Secondly, Friends should not proceed to second marriages, till at least one year is elapsed from the death of the former wife, or husband, and the practice accordingly has been such; for to do otherwise would look indecent.

To their general meeting at London, which assembles at Whitsuntide, are admitted friends from all the churches they have in the world, to give an account of the state of every particular church, which from some parts is done only by writing, and then a general epistle is sent to all the churches.

These epistles, from their general meetings in London, have something in them of a very pious and moral tendency, of which we shall afterwards give a specimen. In the mean time, we cannot help observing, that of all religious denominations, these people suffer more than others. They are obliged to pay all sorts of taxes, and yet none of their poor become burthensome to the parishes.

The Papists have had greater indulgencies shewn them than the Friends, and there are numbers of papists in the workhouses in England. It is true, those of the Quakers or Friends, must be likewise admitted, on condition of their applying for it; but we cannot say but it is rather cruel, to make men pay for the support of the poor, seeing they support all their own, and that in so decent a manner.

The following epistle was written by that great ornament of the literary world, Dr. John Fothergill, at the yearly meeting at London, May 29, 1779. It will serve to shew what were the sentiments of those peaceable people under the unhappy circumstances of affairs at that time.

A LETTER,

From Dr. JOHN FOTHERGILL.

Dearly beloved friends and brethren,

IN the love of God, and the fellowship of the gospel, which we have, with deep thankfulness of heart, in a good degree experienced to attend us, both in our meetings for worship, and those for transacting the affairs of the church, we affectionately salute you; with fervent desires that brotherly love, peace, and concord; may continue and increase amongst us, and that a tender and christian concern may come upon all, in their respective stations, for the maintenance of good order, and the promotion of truth and righteousness upon earth.

By accounts received from the several quarterly meetings in England, and by epistles from Wales, North-Britain, Ireland, Holland, New-England, New-York, Pennsylvania, New-Jersey, Maryland, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, we are informed that love and unity are generally preserved in the churches, to many of which divers have been joined through conviction; and that a considerable number of well-disposed youth appears in various parts.

The sufferings of our brethren in America have been great in many places, especially in Pennsylvania, the Jerseys, Long-Island, Rhode-Island, and Nantucket. These sufferings have principally arisen from that confusion and distress which are inseparable from war, from the laws enacted for promoting military services, and from acts enforcing declarations of allegiance to those in power.

The friends who were banished from Philadelphia have been permitted to return to their habitations, excepting two, who died in exile; and some of those who were imprisoned have been set at liberty.

It is with satisfaction we understand, that their meetings for worship and discipline are duly kept up, and that notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers that surround them, friends attend them with diligence, and many from remote places; their minds are often tendered therein, and united in love one to another, and in deep sympathy with the sufferers amongst them. And it evidently appears, that the turning of the mighty hand of the Lord upon them hath not been in vain; but that, having learned by the things they have suffered, and from the apprehension of future probations, they are engaged to wait for that Divine help, protection, and support, which alone can enable them to endure with patience and holy resignation the trials that are permitted to attend them.

Our brethren in those parts gratefully acknowledge the kindness and regard of friends in England and Ireland, in so early and liberally contributing to the relief of their distresses. Many, from easy circumstances, have been reduced to great hardships and necessities, but have been measurably kept in a state of contentment: these have shared the benevolence of those who have been preserved from the like sufferings. It appears, that their afflictions, though grievous in divers places, have tended to awaken many to a proper sense of their condition, and to increase a watchfulness and care, that they may walk answerable to the mercies received, and faithful in the testimonies committed to their charge, against wars and other anti-christian practices.

May a deep sympathy with our afflicted brethren affect every mind; and may we all watch unto prayer, that it may please the Divine Majesty to shorten the day of their distress.

The sufferings of friends brought in this year from England and Wales, being chiefly for tithes, and those called church-rates, amount to 3763l. and those from Ireland to 1254l.

Inasmuch as we have sufficient ground to believe that the true gospel ministry is freely received from the Holy Head and unchangeable High-Priest of the christian church, and by him commanded to be freely given; we cannot esteem the laws of men, made in the apostatized state of the professing churches, as of any force to supersede his divine law, or to warrant us to act in violation thereof; we therefore exhort you, brethren, to be true and stedfast in the faith once delivered to the saints, and deeply suffered for by divers of the protestant martyrs, as well as by our own faithful predecessors. However any amongst us, to whom blindness in part hath happened, may swerve from the law, and from the testimony, suffer it not to fall as in the streets, through your weakness, or the want of your example; lest for your denial of Christ before men, he deny you before his Father, and the holy angels.

Let us also remind such as may be remiss in attention to the teachings of the grace of God in their own hearts, that the kingdom of Christ is a peaceable kingdom; and though his servants walk in the flesh, they do not war after the flesh. He commands them to love their enemies; and many who have followed him in the regeneration, and abode under his government, have found themselves restrained from all wars and fightings; which are not of the spirit of the Saviour, but that of the destroyer of mankind. Believing this, we cannot consistently take any part therein; nor be concerned as owners of armed vessels, in letters of marque, or as purchasers of prize goods; neither can we assist in the sale of them: for whoever amongst us so confederate with the captors, afford evident tokens that they either prefer the gain of a corrupt interest to the convictions of divine light in their own consciences, or that they are become insensible of them; both which must tend to their condemnation.

Now, dear friends, seeing our time is ever silently upon the wing, and the opportunity afforded us for the important work of preparation daily shortening; knowing also, that the solemn period advances, wherein every individual, however occupied in this transient mode of being, must soon be called hence, and may, in a moment unexpected, be broken off from every temporal connection, by that awful command, "Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward;" let us be vigilant, and in earnest so to improve the precious time allotted us, that when his awakening call approaches, our consciences may not accuse us; but our faith may be firm, and an admittance granted us into that city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God!

"See that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil. Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. Grace be to all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

Eph. v. 15.—vi. 23.

Before we conclude the account of these people, it may be necessary to observe, that as the Friends, commonly called Quakers, will not take an oath in a court of justice, so their affirmation is permitted in all civil affairs; but they cannot prosecute a criminal, because in our courts of justice all evidence must be upon oath.

C H A P. II.

Containing an ACCOUNT of the WESTERN MARTYROLOGY, or BLOODY ASSIZES; together with the LIVES, TRIALS, and DYING SPEECHES, of those EMINENT PROTESTANTS, that SUFFERED in the WEST of ENGLAND, and elsewhere, from the YEAR 1678, to 1685. To which is added, the LIFE and DEATH of GEORGE LORD JEFFREYS.

The MARTYRDOM of SIR EDMUND-BURY GODFREY.

THE clearest method for the description of the martyrdom of this good man, will be first to inquire into the occasion of it; and then the manner, circumstances, and authors; and lastly, the several endeavours that have been used to clear the papists of that indelible guilt, which sticks upon them from so horrid a villainy.

For the occasion of his martyrdom, what was said in the summing up the evidence concerning him, but modestly and on supposition only, we may yet venture to affirm positively, This protestant magistrate was certainly murdered, because he was a protestant.

But the particular and special reasons were the following:

1. He had taken examinations about the popish plot, and those not only (as the attorney-general said in the trial of the assassins) perhaps, but undoubtedly more than are now extant. Mr. Oates addressed himself to him with his depositions: he had taken them, and inquired something closely into the design, as his manner was in any thing which belonged to his office. This the papists very well knew, and therefore found it convenient to be rid of a troublesome busy man, who, now he was engaged in the business, was likely to pierce to the bottom of it; and he being once out of the way, the evidence might very easily have been disposed of to their satisfaction.

But here those, whose interest it is to get clear of such a charge, object very pertly; What need, or what advantage, in taking off a justice, when the same things were deposed in other places?

2. The second reason or occasion for this murder will easily easily answer that objection. They not only bore him malice for what he had already done in Oates's case, and might probably be ignorant of those secret passages transacted before king and council, in relation to Oates's depositions, but were sensible of a deeper reason than all this, and which brought them into more danger than the other.

Mr. Dugdale had received a letter the very night on which this gentleman was martyred (of which more anon) with these words in it, [This night sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey is dispatched.] This came from the papists to Ewers, a popish priest at my lord Aston's, who, after he had read it, communicated the good news to Mr. Dugdale, telling him, One of their enemies was taken out of the way. He being desirous to know how things went, asked, What was the reason they took away his life? Ewers told him, There was a message sent to Mr. Coleman, when in Newgate, to desire him that he would not reveal any thing of the plot; which message came from the duke of York. To which Coleman replied, What was he the nearer, for he had been so foolish as to reveal all to sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey already? But upon the examination of Oates before sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey, he was afraid he would come in as evidence against him, having shewn himself eager in the business. To which the duke of York sent word again, If he would take care not to reveal, but conceal it, sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey should not come in against him. And the next news was, that he was dispatched.

Now this effectually takes off the former cavil; and this sir Roger could not but be sensible of; and concluding so unanswerably against what he built so much upon, even lets it fairly drop, and mentions not a syllable of it in all his book. Which evidence of Mr. Dugdale's; is beyond contradiction confirmed by several hints unluckily given in sir Roger's own depositions, where Mr. Wynnel deposes what sir Edmund told him, Coleman must die, and mentioned consults about a toleration; adding further, That he was master of a dangerous secret that would be fatal to him. Hence nothing can be more plain to any reasonable man, than that sir Edmund was acquainted with Mr. Coleman as well as Dr. Oates, and knew even the minute circumstances in those letters which afterwards were brought against him, and stood in fear of his life for that very reason, as for the same he afterwards lost it.

For the manner of his death, those who were accomplices therein should best know it; and the objections against their evidence the reader may find cleared, if he will take the pains to look a little lower. After the poor gentleman had several days been dogged by the papists, as Dr. Oates, Mr. Prance, and Mr. Bedlow, unanimously swear, and which he as good as acknowledged to Mr. Robinson, as appears on the trial of his murderers, they at last accomplished their wicked design, on Saturday, October 12, 1678, and under pretence of a quarrel, which they knew his care for the public peace would oblige him to prevent, about nine o'clock at night, as he was going home, got him into the Water-Gate at Somerset-House. When he was thus trepanned in, and got out of hearing from the street, toward the lower end of the yard, Green, one of the assassins, threw a twisted handkerchief round his neck, and drew him behind the rails, which, notwithstanding his age and weakness, are objected against it's probability; taking him thus at a surprise, and in the dark, it was easy for him to do, especially three or four more of them immediately falling in to assist him, there they throttled him; and lest that should not be enough, punched and kicked him on the breast, as sufficiently appeared when his body was found, by the marks upon it; and lest he should not be yet dead enough, another of them, Gerald, or, as I find him called in other places, Fitzgerald, would have run him through, but was hindered by the rest, lest the blood should have discovered them. But Green, to make sure work, wrung his neck round, as it was found afterwards on the inspection of the surgeons.

For the disposal of the body, they all carried it up into a little chamber of Hill's, another of the murderers, who had been, or was Dr. Godwin's man, where it lay till Monday night, when they removed it into another room, and thence back again till Wednesday, when they carried him out in a sedan about twelve o'clock, and afterwards upon a horse, with Hill behind him, to support him, till they got to Primrose-Hill, or, as some say it is called, Green-Bury-Hill, near a public house, called the White House, and there threw him into a ditch, with his gloves and cane on a bank near him, and his own sword run through him, on purpose to persuade the world he had killed himself. Very politically making choice of a place to lay him where they might both think he would be some time concealed, and near where he had been seen walking the same day, if the affidavits to this purpose in sir Roger's book may be relied upon.

All this Mr. Prance swears upon the trial of his murderers, with whom he acknowledges he had several consultations before at the Plow alehouse, and other places, concerning it; whose evidence is confirmed, not only by innumerable other circumstances, but Mr. Bedlow's confession, who was to have been present at the action, had not remorse of conscience hindered him, having been engaged by the conspirators for a great reward, and was afterwards to have a considerable part of it for carrying off the body, which he swears he saw in the very room where Prance says it was removed on the Monday night. But even here too he failed them, so it was done without his assistance in the manner before described.

And very sure, no doubt, the great plotters thought they had now made their business: for we are not to fancy these little villains attempted such an action of their own impulse; the great spring we had before in Dugdale's story of Coleman, from whence those large sums must proceed which Bedlow mentions. Now, I say, they thought the business was as sure as the Jews had made the sepulchre, having sealed all the mouths of the parties concerned, with oaths and sacraments, solemnities commonly abused by their party to the foulest villainies. But neither that, nor the darkness of the night, nor the distance of places, could hinder the Divine Justice from looking through and discovering the villains concerned, and bringing them to punishments worthy their wickedness. It was accomplished in the following manner: His body being found by some who accidentally walked that way, and generally suspected from his former discourses, and many probabilities, that he was murdered by the papists, the king issued a proclamation with a promise of indemnity and 500l. reward to any who would discover it. On this Mr. Bedlow wrote a letter to the secretary from the country, concerning his knowledge of something considerable in that matter; and being sent for up to town, revealed whatever he knew of the business. And a little after, Prance being accidentally seized by a constable, then in the house of lords lobby, was known by Mr. Bedlow, having seen his face on that Monday night, when at the same time they saw the body; and who on examination discovered also what his share was in the murder: and though he afterwards denied it, for fear of losing his trade, and such other motives, as he himself confessed, yet in a quarter of an hour he returned again to his first evidence.

But the most difficult task will be what yet remains, the clearing those objections, and some of them plausible ones, and which have led away too many well-meaning men, against the truth of this recited evidence; as well as some insinuations spread abroad, and made the most of to persuade the world this worthy gentleman was guilty of his own death.

But here it cannot be expected that a private person, who has not the advantages of sir Roger, to have warrants for that purpose, and all persons and papers before him relating to that business, and who had great wit, and honesty little enough to pick out, and leave in, what was for his turn; that such a one should be able to go through so many hundred pages as his book consists of, and answer every particular therein. It will be satisfaction enough to any rational man to touch some of the plots and fetches made use of from one time to another, to wash the Blackamoor white, and clear the papists from this villainy: to answer the main objections against against the evidence, and bring some corroborating circumstances for the truth of it. And lastly, To shew sir Edmund could not murder himself in that place and manner as is pretended.

The first of the methods they used to sham off this murder, was by early reports they spread about, even before his body was found, That he had killed himself. Now this, sir Roger himself can scarce have face enough to affirm was done by the brothers to get the estate; since it was a very odd way, certainly, to do that, by letting the world openly know he was a self-murderer. That such reports were spread, we shall by and by prove, and that from sir Roger's own book, without the trouble of consulting the paper-office; and who got by it, who should do it, whose interest was it to do it, but the papists, although the particular authors may be unknown?

Among the many evidences of his death, being known at so many distant places before it was made public here, there are two come up exactly to the matter in hand. The first, which was recited by the reverend dean of Bangor, since bishop of St. Asaph, in his funeral sermon, and which, it seems, he had of one Mr. Angus, who, the same day sir Edmund was found about five o'clock on Primrose-Hill, being in Mr. Chiswell's shop, in St. Paul's Church-yard, about one or two, there was a person unknown to him passed by, and clapping him upon the shoulder, asked him, If he heard the news that sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey was found dead, with his own sword run through him.

The second is of Mr. Goldsborough, clerk of the house of commons, who being in a barber's shop on Tuesday morning, while he was missing, a person came in open-mouthed, That sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey was found; and being asked where, replied, He had killed himself upon Primrose-Hill; where upon the Thursday following in the evening, the body was indeed discovered.

The second considerable attempt made the same way, was by one Magrath, an Irishman, the famous Celiers, who told the same story to the prince of Wales, and to a great many more besides him; the Jesuits in Newgate, and others, who pretended to prove that sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey hanged himself, and his clerk, Moor, cut him down. But being examined at the council-board, it proved only a malicious and false contrivance.

It will be well to remark, that Mrs. Mary Gibbons was one of the persons deeply engaged in this design, among so much other good company: and that Mrs. Mary Gibbons is one of the principal evidences sir Roger makes use of in his book. Though this sham was then so thin laid, and this person so well known, that even Farewell and Pain were ashamed to make use of either in their letters to Prance on this subject, but protest very solemnly, That none of those, neither Celiers, the Newgate priests, nor Mrs. Mary Gibbons, or other papists, or popishly affected, knew any thing of the matter, but were all strangers to it.

When this contrivance was found out by all the world to be nothing but a sham as to Celiers's being with child in Newgate, or somebody else in another place, yet was not the indefatigable zeal of that party discouraged; but Mr. Farewell, a person intrusted in managing the estates and lands of the Jesuits; and Pain, brother to the famous Pain, who wrote St. Coleman's elegy, set a new project on foot to the same purpose in some letters sent to Prance, and printed by N. Thomson; which indeed, if we look close into them, will appear to be sir Roger in little, there being the self-same expressions in one as the other, and his mystery seeming to be hardly more than their letters spread a little thinner. The blood gushing out of the wound—Bedlow's and Prance's east and west contradictions—The wax dropped on his cloaths after he was found, and several other things, the self-same in both of them. And I remember, at that very time, it was shrewdly suspected and rumoured about town, that the same person lay behind the curtain, and thrust their cats-feet into the fire, who has since appeared publicly in prosecution of the same cause.

Before their trial, they reckoned their witnesses by the hundred, pretending to make his self-murder as clear as the sun. When they came to it, and had all the fair play imaginable, Pain's heart failed him, and he pleaded guilty. Farewell made so poor a defence, and the matter was so clearly proved against them, that Farewell and Thomson were both fined by the court, and sentenced to stand in the pillory, with the following inscription over them: For libelling the justice of the nation, by making the world believe that sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey murdered himself. Where how abundantly they were honoured by the spectators, all who know any thing of the story cannot but remember.

Thus it lay for some time, and no person was so hardy to make any farther attempts that way, while there was any possibility of having justice against them: but when the sheriffs, juries, nay, king and all were changed; when that past, which poor Oates and all the world have cause to remember; when, if Prance would not unconfess, he knew he must tread the same dolorous way that Oates had done before him, and had now done all that could be desired; then sir Roger took up the cudgels, and published his book, called, The Mystery of sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey's death unfolded; or, which would have been a fitter title, The second edition, with additions, of Farewell's and Pain's letters. The main of what he advances there, will be answered in clearing, as was proposed, the objections against the evidence relating to that matter.

If the ill character of the persons who gave it be urged to invalidate their testimony, as this does not reach all of them, so it has been often answered, Who but such were fit for such villainies? If their seeming disagreement in some part of their evidence, what greater argument that it was no combination? If Prance retracted, we are told by sir Roger himself, That he was a white-livered man, and so might be frightened out of truth as well as into it. And indeed on that very reason it was long before suspected, that if ever he should be bore hard upon, he would not be able to stand it.

But the papists would never kill him, because he had obliged them. As if gratitude was a popish virtue, or charity, any more than faith, were to be kept with heretics: those that think so, let them look back, and see if the last reign be enough to convince them.

It may be urged on, here are several testimonies in the trial of the murderers, and since, that invalidate the evidence there given, Warner and his wife and maid about Green, That he was at home all that evening when he was accused for committing it. It would be enough to oppose to this, their confession to captain Richardson, that they could do him no good. But besides this, Mr. justice Dolbin's observation on the trial clears it effectually. They swore to the Saturday fortnight after Michaelmas-day, which was, says the justice, the 19th of October, not the 12th, on which the murder was committed.

If Broadstreet and others testify they were in the room where the body was laid, and Hill's wife so rubs up her memory, that after so many years she remembers what she could not upon his trial, That she, and he, and their child lay in the room all that very time when the body was said to be there; it would not be a shift, but an answer, That they were papists that swore it, who can swear any thing. But besides, Broadstreet acknowledged before the duke of Monmouth, That Hill was gone from his lodgings before this time, as was proved on the trial. Mrs. Tilden says, There was but one key to their door. Mrs. Broadstreet at the same time, with what she owned about Hill, That there were six or seven: contradictions in others, we see, as well as the king's evidence; and these being much homer, and more irreconcilable than their's, must of necessity destroy the belief of what else they testify.

But the home-thrust is—The centinels saw no sedan carried out. This the printed trial easily sets right. The centinels were Trollop and Wright. Trollop staid till ten, and saw a sedan go in, but none out again. Wright staid till one, but saw none go out. It must be in Trollop's time, being, as Prance says, about twelve the centinels being then at Bury's lodge smoking and drinking. Trollop says on the trial, he was never the lodge, but so does not Wright, as any one may see by consulting it, he being never asked the question.

It will give a great light into this deed of darkness in the next place, to consider several circumstantial evidences, which would, of themselves, go very far to prove that sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey was murdered by the papists, and that in the very place and manner which has been already described.

The first of these from sir Edmund's own mouth, which has been already hinted, but shall here be farther cleared.

It was indeed so notorious, that sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey had boding thoughts, and a sort of a prophetic intimation of his death, and that by the papists; and discoursed of it so publicly and generally, that sir Roger could not deny all the matter of fact, but endeavours to avoid the force of it; when he says, as is witnessed by several, On my conscience I shall be the first martyr. This he interprets, I doubt I shall not live long. Sure, though he says in one place, The man was no fool, yet he must be supposed to be no better, any more than all the readers, if neither he nor they made any difference between being hanged and martyred. But the very reason of this interpretation was for what sir Roger dearly loved, that he might have opportunity for a reflection on the parliament. He feared, says he, that the parliament would call him to account, and that nothing would satisfy them but his life, for not discovering it sooner. In opposition to this, any impartial man need but consider what follows. Squire Robinson, on the trial of the murderers, witnesses that he had a discourse with sir Edmund a little while before his death about the plot then newly talked on. Says Robinson, I wish the depth of the matter be found out. Sir Edmund answers, I am afraid it is not. Upon my conscience I believe I shall be the first martyr. He acknowledged he had taken several examinations about it, but thought he should have little thanks for his pains. Robinson asked him, Are you afraid? No, said he, I do not fear them, if they come fairly; and I shall not part with my life tamely. Well, sir Roger, is all this the parliament? Was he afraid the parliament would send a party to dog him, and set upon him? And that he did not fear the parliament, but if they came fairly, would not part with his life tamely? No; any man that has but half an eye, unless that too blinded with prejudice, may see the meaning of it; and that he apprehended danger only from the papists, against whom he had taken several examinations.

The next is, of John Wilson, the sadler, who swears, sir Edmund talking with one Mr. Harris, then told this informant, That he was in danger for what he acted for the discovering the late plot against his majesty. See how ingeniously this is answered; His apprehension was from the parliament, not the papists; and for concealing, not discovering the plot. These very words sir Roger has in his book. Now whether this is not a direct Statuimus, i. e. Abrogamus, what sir Edmund calls Discovering, for sir Roger, who knows his mind better, now he is dead, than he himself did while alive, to tell us he means Concealing, which is quite contrary; and how fair a way of answer it is, let any of his best friends be judges.

It would be tedious to bring any more, when this does effectually, as to his own judgment. Only it is remarkable, that these very things are sworn upon the trial by Mr. Oates, That sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey had told him, he had received affronts from great persons, for being so zealous in the business; that he had been threatened; that he went in fear of his life from the popish party; and that he had been dogged several days, but feared them not if they came fairly to work.

For other evidences of his murder by the papists, that which indeed made the greatest noise, was his death being heard of so far off, and in so many different places, before it was known in London. This, sir Roger tells us, was spread on purpose by the brothers to throw it on the papists. But here is this in opposition: Dugdale, against whom he makes no objection, but allows his evidence, makes oath in my lord Stafford's trial, and other places, That this news was brought to one Ewers, a priest, in a letter which he shewed him, dated the very night it was done, which had these words in it: This very night, sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey is dispatched. Now I would fain ask, Had these brothers correspondence with the priest? Would they use such a word as that, [dispatched?] Did they write to Ewers too, and bid him tell Dugdale, That this sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey was a busy man, and proper to be taken out of the way? As Dugdale swears he did. Could Dugdale conspire with Oates so long before they knew one another, and while he was himself a prisoner in Staffordshire? And were all these perjured, who witness that Mr. Dugdale did report this before it could be known by any but the very conspirators?

That it was done in that very place, at Somerset-House, Providence has left strange confirmation.

The first is, Bury the porter's refusing to admit any persons into the gates about that time, the 12th, 13th, 14th of October. Nay, that he had denied the prince (prince Rupert, I suppose, it must be) himself admittance, and pretended he had orders for so doing. But these orders he never produced. And more, like a true papist, denied matter of fact when charged with it; and though he had acknowledged to the council he had never such orders before, when sir Thomas Stringer came to witness it, positively denied it.

Two more very remarkable affidavits there are, which give mighty strength to all the former; one of Spence (captain Spence he is called in some copies), and the other of John Okeley. Spence was a tall, black man, much like sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey, as was witnessed by those who knew him; to all which sir Roger only answers, He has been told otherwise. This Spence passing by the same water-gate at Somerset-House, two days before sir Edmund's murder, was dragged in thither, being seized by five or six men; but one of them, when they had him in, cried out, This is not he, on which they immediately let him go. Here is a plain evidence of their intentions, and a confirmation of what Bedlow, Oates, and Prance swore of sir Edmund's being dogged so long before. All that is answered to it, is, That there was a suit of law depending between this Spence and Mr. Broadstreet, and therefore forsooth, he must forswear himself, and wilfully damn his soul only for a circumstantial evidence and reflection on Hill himself, three or four years after he was hanged, and so on his master, Dr. Godden, and thence again on Mrs. Broadstreet; and all this when it had no influence at all on the suit of law, or them who sued him. But enough of this. Let us now take notice of the next. It was one John Okeley, who that very night, October 12, going by Somerset-House, at the water-gate, about nine o'clock saw there sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey, whom he knew very well, living in the same lane with him; he past close by him, pulled off his hat to him, as sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey did to him again; when past him, he turned about, and looked on him. And this he told to several persons, which witness the same. To this, the main of what sir Roger objects is, It was dark, and how should he know him? Certainly, any one that knows London, cannot be ignorant that we have lights in the streets at nine at night: and it was morally impossible, that one who knew him so well, who looked upon him, who put off his hat to him, and he to him again, and who after all this looked back upon him, that such a one should be mistaken in the person.

The last thing to be proved is, That sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey did not, nor could he murder himself in that place, as is pretended by his enemies. He was first missing on Saturday, and therefore according to their account, his body must have been in the place where it was found till that Thursday night. But had it been there on Tuesday or Wednesday, the pack of hounds which hunted there, both of those days, must have found him. Sir Roger tells us, They might have been on the other side of the ditch, or beat the place carelessly without finding it. But Mr. Faucet's deposition is, That he beat that very place, which surely he was capable of knowing, having been himself there to see it after the body was found. He repeats it, and says twice, It was in that very place, and Harwood says as much, who hunted the day after. One circumstance there is, which makes this evidence yet more conclusive. It was deposed in the trial of Farewell, and several other places, that the body stunk extremely when it was found; which was but the next day after. Now I will ask any unprejudiced man, Whether it was so much as possible, that this very place should be beat two days one after another, and the hounds not scent the body, even though the hunters might perhaps overlook it?

But besides this, there was yet a narrower search made on another occasion in that same field. The story is given in a paper, called, An account of the murder, published by Thompson himself, who, with G. Larkin, another printer, was present, and vouched the matter of fact on their own knowledge. It is this, That while the body lay at the White-house, and the jury were about it, one of the jury-men themselves declared, That a servant of his mother, a butcher, and two boys, made a very strict and narrow search in all parts of the ground for a calf that was lost there, and this both on Monday and Tuesday, and at that time there lay no dead body, belt, gloves, or any thing else there. But were all these too on the wrong side of the hedge? Or where did they look for this calf, in the middle of the field, or in the ditches and hedges, where it was impossible they could have missed of the body, had it been there?

There is one great objection, which sir Roger makes very much of in this matter, though not quite so strong now, as it was some years since; and that is, There was no popish plot at all, therefore no popish murder, which he expresses in his own peculiar way. They hang both upon the same string, and whoever overthrows the one, trips up the heels of the other. Nor indeed is he singular in his opinion, as to a great part of it. For my lord chief justice Pemberton says, on the trial of Farewell, I think it was, If they could have made it out that he had killed himself, all of them would have cried out, the popish plot was a sham raised by the protestants against the papists, and all the plot must have gone for nothing. But now to retort the objection. If there was a popish plot, it is a terrible argument that there was too a popish murder. But that there was one, we must be forced to believe, till we find these things among many others answered.

1. Coleman's letters, and that expression, The extirpation of the northern heresy.
2. The letter produced in Harcourt's trial, wherein the very consult of April 24 is mentioned, and a design then on foot among them, which they were to manage with all imaginable secrecy.
3. The positive oaths of so many men. Some of them of a fair character, and blameless conversation: others no more able to invent such a plot, than their enemies to disprove it.
4. The endeavours of the papists to assassinate, disgrace, buy off, or any way divert the evidence against them; which they were not such fools as to do for nothing.
5. The behaviour of the witnesses ever since. One of them testifying at his death, after the sacrament, another by his life, their malice reaching to his barbarous murder. A third with his blood; and so much as would have perhaps cost any two or three other men their lives, to the truth of their depositions.

And lastly, What transactions we have felt and seen since king James came to the throne, till his departure, are no great evidence that all that plot was a forgery.

From these things it is plain there was a popish plot: from these, and what went before, that this was a popish murder.

An Account of Mr. ARNOLD.

MR. ARNOLD had been a vigorous prosecutor of the priests and jesuits which sculked about in his own country of Wales. This was a crime not to be forgiven, nor any ways atoned for, by less than his destruction. In order to which he was assaulted by several villains, fit for such business, in a little dark lane near the Temple, as he was passing through it pretty late in the evening; and had no doubt dispatched him; and either found some way to make the world believe he had done it himself, as they would have done in the former instance, or started some other sham to have removed the odium from their own party: but the gentleman, having had apprehension of some such accident, made better use of it than sir Edmund did before him; and having luckily a suit of private armour on, received several stabs, which the villains gave him, upon that, and so saved his life. But they finding their attempts that way unsuccessful, were resolved to take another course with him, and having got him down, with some desperate weapon fit for the purpose, made several attempts to cut his throat, and gave him some dangerous wounds about that part; which while he was struggling with to prevent, a boy providentially goes by with a light, which their deeds of darkness not being able to endure, they all ran away, and left Mr. Arnold weltering in his blood, who yet, by God's providence, recovered again, and lived to see justice done to one of the villains that used him in that barbarous manner: his name was Giles, and was discovered by a wound in his leg, which one of his accomplices ran through in the scuffle, as he was making a stab at Mr. Arnold. He was tried for the action, found guilty of it, and sentenced to stand in the pillory for the same, which was accordingly executed, with a liberal contribution over and above from the enraged rabble, who sufficiently made up for the gentleness of his sentence, though as severe a one as our mild laws could inflict upon such offenders.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. COLLEDGE.

MR. COLLEDGE being a man of courage, industry, and sharpness, he made it much of his business to serve his country, as far as possible; in searching after priests and jesuits, and hunting these vermin out of their lurking holes, in which he was very serviceable and successful; and for which, no doubt, they did not fail to remember him. The first time we meet with him in public, is, I think, in Stafford's trial, where he is brought in for Mr. Dugdale, as a collateral evidence. By that time the wind was upon the turn, and the tide of popular aversion not quite so strong against popery, being by the cunning of our common enemy diverted into little streams, and private factions; and arbitrary power driving on, as the best way to prosecute the designs of Rome; to which the city of London in particular made a vigorous resistance; which displeasing the grand agitators, no wonder they endeavoured, as much as possible, to do it a mischief; their kindness to it having been sufficiently experienced in 1666, and ever since. In order to which the king was pleased, by the advice of his spiritual brother, to alter the common and almost constant course of parliaments, and call one at Oxford instead of London. Many of the members whereof, and especially those of London, were apprehensive of some design upon them there, having formerly in the gun-powder treason, and ever since, sufficiently found the love of the papists to protestant parliaments, and knowing well what they were to expect from their kindness, if they should be attacked by them and found defenceless. And more ground of suspicion they had, because, as Colledge protests in his speech, there had been affidavits judiciously made of a formed design against them, being besides removed away from the city of London, which had always so much of the English blood in it, as heartily to love parliaments, and for that reason would have ventured all for their defence. From these and such like reasons, it was, that several of the parliament men went accompanied with some of their friends, well armed and accoutred, to Oxford, of which number this Mr. Colledge ledge was one, he waiting on my lord Clare, Paget, and Huntingdon to Oxford; where the parliament, foreseeing what has since happened, would have gone on where they left off in the former sessions, which causing great heats, every body knows how abruptly they were dissolved, not long after their meeting. It was now grown the entertainment of every coffee-house, and the subject of every buffoon's pamphlets, to expose and vilify parliaments as much as possible, and the very name of it was grown as odious to some men, as that of protestant. Mr. Colledge had, besides all his other before-mentioned crimes, been, as he declares in his speech, a great supporter of that august assembly, and had been in former sessions engaged by some of the honourable members to search the places adjoining the parliament-house, lest there should be another gun-powder treason hatching for them; from whence, as he says himself, he believes he got that popular name of Protestant Joiner.

All these reasons together were more than enough to get him taken out of the way; and for the performance thereof, Heins, and Macnamarra, and one or two of the apostate evidence of the popish plot, informed against him. Nor is it a wonder that after so many attempts, some of these men should be prevailed with to prove false; but rather, that under so many temptations any of them resisted, or were not sooner villains. These persons swore such mad things against him, of taking Whitehall, and pulling the king out of it, and such other odd wild stories, that partly from the ill-character of the persons who witnessed, the jury here in London refused to find the bill, but returned it Ignoramus. On which, contrary to all justice and precedent, law, and common reason, which forbids a man should be twice in danger of his life for the same offence; the business was removed to Oxford, where the little civility or common justice he met with in his trial, was then notorious to all the world: a person being checked, for giving him but assistance and notes in the way of his calling, to make his defence when his life was engaged: yet though even those notes were denied him, none that heard the trial, or so much as read it, but must grant, that he made a very extraordinary defence, and much more than could have been expected from a man of more learning. But he might have spared all his labour; the business was, no doubt, resolved upon before, and he was found guilty, sentenced, and executed according to order. To look back once more, and inquire a little deeper into the original of the matter: that there was a design laid to bring in most of the worthy patriots of England into a sham plot, under the odious, scare-crow name of presbyterians, not only the meal-tub attempt, and several others of the same batch, makes sufficiently appear, but the late essay of Fitz-Harris above all the rest, was enough to satisfy the most prejudiced persons. He had conspired with some others to write a scandalous libel against the king, which was to be laid on such as they called presbyterians, and this to be sent to their houses, or conveyed into their pockets, and there to be seized, and the persons prosecuted thereupon. This business the Oxford parliament had before them, and began to smell out who set it on foot; and being resolved to find the bottom of it, and lest he should be hanged up on the sudden to prevent his confession, (he now beginning to melt a little) as Hubert, who fired London formerly, was, they impeached him, to keep the examination of that matter to themselves. It is too long to run over the proceedings against him, and the court party's subtle contrivance, to hang, draw, and quarter him, and so to hinder effectually his telling any more tales. It is sufficient to observe, that this design was prosecuted for several years after, and poor Colledge was to bear the brunt, as has been already declared.

If we reflect yet further on the manner of his trial, and not look on any others, one would be apt to think it was impossible a man could be destroyed with more injustice and barbarity than he was; or that twelve men, who look like christians, could be found out, who would hang a man upon such evidence as was given against him.

When a criminal shall be kept close prisoner in the Tower, without having sufficient means to make his defence, till he come to his trial: when, as has been said, he shall be rifled of his notes, by which only he could save his life, on which he depended, and that just before he came to his trial; though assisted therein by that very council assigned by the court for him: when he shall in vain demand them again, and call heaven and earth to witness, that he is merely cheated of his life for want of them: when all his redress is such a frivolous excuse, as not only a judge, but any honest man, would be ashamed to make use of; nay, such a sort of a one as is commonly made before the judges, but seldom by them, that it was somebody else did it, that the court, the chief justice had them not, nor did take them from him: when the very person stood by who robbed him of them; and yet he could have no reparation: when the king's council must whisper the chief justice on the bench, and the court must be adjourned, on purpose to examine those minutes which the poor man had got together to save his life, and even from them get an opportunity to take it away, altering the manner of their prosecution, strengthening and bolstering their evidence against him, were not only such as an honest London jury would not believe, though a country one directed by the king's council, could make a shift to do it; but were every one of them, who witnessed any thing material, confounded by such home evidence, as, if any thing in the world could do it, did certainly invalidate and annul their testimonies: when one of them swears horridly, He cared not what he swore, nor whom he swore against, for it was his trade to get money by swearing; that the parliament was a company of rogues for not giving the king money, but he would help him to money out of the fanatics' estates, which is explained by what Smith says, That if the parliament would not give the king money, but stood on the bill of exclusion, it was pretence enough to swear a design to seize the king at Oxford: when this same Heins very pleasantly says, It was a judgment upon the king and the people, and the Irishmen's swearing against them was justly fallen on them, for ousting the Irish of their estates: when others of them swear, That since the citizens deserted them, they would not starve; that they would have Colledge's blood; that though they had gone against their consciences, it was because they had been persuaded to it, and could get no money else: and when they had said before, they believed Colledge had no more hand in any conspiracy against his majesty, than the child unborn: when they would have hired others to swear more into the same plot: when the bench was such just and kind council for the prisoner, as to tell the jury, the king's witnesses were on their oaths, the prisoner's not, and so one to be credited before the other; in which case it is impossible for any man living to make a defence against a perjured villain: lastly, when the prisoner himself very weightily objected, That there was no proof of any person being concerned with him in the design of seizing the king; and it was wisely answered, That he might be so vain to design it alone; a thousand times a more romantic improbability, than an army's lying concealed at Knight's-bridge, and of the same stamp with Drawcantirs killing all on both sides: taking all these things together, hardly ever was a man at this rate bantered out of his life, before any judicature in the world, in any place or age that history has left us.

Nor ought the great service he did to the nation in general to be ever forgotten; since notwithstanding all the disadvantages he was under, the public stream running so violently against him and his witnesses, and the surprise which such strange treatment, when he was on his life, might cast him into, he yet made so strong a defence, by shewing what sort of witnesses were brought against him, hindering them ever after from being believed, and thereby certainly saved many others' lives, though he could not his own.

Nor can the undaunted courage, and firm honesty of the man be hardly ever enough admired. Since, besides what he shewed in his defence, after he was condemned, as he himself said, as good as without a trial, he boldly asked, When he was to be executed? without any the least least seeming concern. And though he had considerable time before his execution to consider of it, refused to save his life so meanly, as to make other innocent men's the price of his own; without which design they had hardly been so kind as to have given him so long a reprieve.

As for his behaviour at his execution, it was such as convinced more than a few of his greatest enemies, and made them entertain a much better opinion of him than before. From his last speech we shall remark several passages, as another argument of his innocence. But before we proceed any further in them, it will be needful to fix one assertion, which we may presume few modest unprejudiced persons will deny, and which we shall have occasion to make further use of. It is, That a protestant, who believes an heaven and hell, and is not a man of no principles, or debauched and atheistical, would not go out of the world, into the presence of that God who must judge him, with a lie in his mouth. This none will deny, but those who have a very great kindness for the papists; and yet of all men in the world such as these must not offer to do it, since it was the very argument they made use of for the innocence of the jesuits, and other traitors. Though on that side we know there are unanswerable arguments not to believe them; their religion recommending perjury, and all sorts of villainies to them as meritorious, when holy church is concerned. Their church besides allowing them dispensations before, and absolution after, and purgatory at the worst, whence a few masses would fetch them out again. Things being thus, what can any man of modesty say to Mr. Colledge's protestations over and over, both in prison, and at his death, That he was perfectly innocent of what he died for? I did deny it then, says he, that is, before the council, and do deny it upon my death: I never was in any kind of plot in my days; and if I had any such design as these have sworn against me, I take God to witness, as I am a dying man, and on the terms of my salvation, I know not one man upon the face of the earth which would have stood by me. And lower, I knew not of any part of what they swore against me, till I heard it sworn at the bar. Again, All the arms we had were for our defence, in case the papists should have made any attempt by way of massacre, &c. God is my witness, this is all I know. And in this solemn prayer, and some of his almost very last words: It is thee, O God, I trust in. I disown all dispensations, and will not go out of the world with a lie in my mouth. And just after to the people, he said, From the sincerity of my heart, I declare again, that these are the very sentiments of my soul, as God shall have mercy upon me.

Now upon the whole, I would ask any sober man, what he would answer to this, and how he can forbear, without the greatest violation to all principles of good nature and ingenuity, to pronounce this person innocent?

Thus died Mr. Colledge, whose blood, as he himself desired it might, sufficiently spoke the justice of his cause, who seemed in his speech to have some prophetic intimations, that his blood would not be the last, as indeed it was not, but rather a prelude to that which followed, the edge of the laws being now turned against all those who dared defend them.

The MARTYRDOM of ARTHUR, EARL of ESSEX.

THAT party, and those persons who were engaged to manage the designs before mentioned, were now entered on the most compendious way of introducing what they desired, as well as avoiding what their own consciences, and all the world knew they deserved. Having those in their own hands, who had the executive part of the government in their's; and finding, no doubt, a sort of malicious pleasure, as well as advantage, in destroying people by those laws which were made to preserve them; a villainy to be compared with nothing but the treason of that monster of a priest, who gave the emperor poison in the blessed sacrament: having wrought up the nation, and all parties therein to a high ferment, making one side mad for slavery, as if they had all been at Constantinople as well as their sheriff, and learnt the doctrine of the bow-string; some of them treated, others cajoled, others frightened, and some few reasoned into the belief of absolute authority in kings, and active obedience as well as what is called passive, to be paid to all their commands. Some honest, several learned, more witty men joining in with all their power, to advance the transactions at that time on the wheel. And on the other side, exasperating that party who were more tenacious of their liberties, as much as possible against the constitution which they saw so horribly abused both in church and state, persuading them all that the clergy were for making them slaves, and themselves and the court great to ride upon them; whereas really it was only a party, though too large, who made more noise, though they had neither more sense nor number than those who differed from them; and by this means rendering many of the trading part of the nation especially, so dissatisfied with them, and eager against them, that they had reason to fear as bad effects thereof, as they had experienced in the last age, and so sided more closely with that party whence they expected protection. When things were in this posture, and a great many persons either taken off from their natural love to a lawful liberty, which is so much of the nature of an Englishman; the managers of the great intrigue which was to accomplish our ruin, resolved, after they had begun with Colledge, to rise higher, and fly at a nobler game, and take off all those whom they could not win over, or against whom interest or revenge had more keenly engaged them, and who were most likely to make the most vigorous opposition against their attempts. But finding the London juries immoveably honest, and no way to accomplish their designs on these persons, while their witnesses would not be believed, and no way to get juries fit for their purpose, but by having sheriffs of the same stamp; and finding the party they had gotten, after all their tricks, which many of those who then knew, are now ashamed of, visibly and fairly out-numbered by those who were not yet ripe for slavery, they bethought themselves of one way to rid themselves of that inconveniency, which was by a quo warranto against the city of London, that they might more effectually, and with less noise, have what sheriffs they pleased; or in effect, hang whomsoever they thought their enemies, and not be forced almost to blush at those visible and sensible illegalities with which they had forced those officers upon the city.

This they had accomplished in the year 1683, when judgment was given against the charter of London, whose liberties had been confirmed to them by William the Conqueror, and delivered down before from immemorial ages, and this by two judges only in Westminster-Hall, though the greatest cause, one may venture to say, that ever was legally tried therein.

Now by this time they had, after so many fruitless endeavours, brought something of a plot to bear; and with this advantage above all their former, that there was really something in it, although as Bays says in another case, That truth, which was notoriously blended with lies and perjuries. The occasion of it we may best meet with in Holloway's most ingenious acknowledgment; "By arbitrary and illegal ways, and force of arms, they had got sheriffs to their mind; witnesses they had before, but wanted jurors to believe them. Now they have got sheriffs, who will find jurors to believe any evidence against a protestant, and so hang up all the king's friends by degrees. None being suffered to come near the king, but those who have been declared enemies to the king and kingdom, who, to save themselves, do endeavour to keep all things from the king's knowledge, and persuade him against parliaments," &c.

Thus much for the occasion. The design seems to be the same with what was intended at first, by many of those great and eminent persons, both clergy and laity, in their late appearance in arms; though by the providence of God, for the security of the nation, and reason of

of state, it has since been carried farther than their's was ever to have been. Seeing fair means, says Holloway, would not do, but all things on the protestants side misrepresented to the king by such great criminals, and none more in favour than those; to take the king from his evil council, and that (as the late wonderful turn was transacted, and as it is impossible to be otherwise in business of so large a concern) by a general insurrection in several parts of England at once. All those who have had any share in the present transactions, which are upon the matter, all the nation have shewn themselves plainly of the same mind with those who were engaged in this, on which the dispute runs, as to the reason of the thing, and the principles on which they proceeded; and their only difference is about matter of fact, whether things were then at that height as to need desperate remedies. If it be objected, That such attempts are only glossy pretences, veiled under the specious name of the public good; the answer is as ready as the objection, Is there any difference between reason and no reason, truth and falsehood? There is a right, and a wrong, and if ever liberties were invaded, and the ends of government vacated and annulled, never were the foundations of such a design plainer than on this occasion: so that it was indeed, what was of it, a counter-plot, rather than a plot against the government and laws of England, and that when no other remedy could without a miracle be expected.

That this was the height and utmost of the then design, and that no brave good man need to be ashamed of it, I think all, or most men are by this time pretty well satisfied. But alas! this would not serve the turn of the managers; even this might not, nor perhaps could be, as certainly it was not, fairly proved against several, who suffered for it; this was a thing so necessary and defensible, that there was occasion of laying fouler colours upon it, to fright and amuse the world, and let them stand by patiently, and see their best and bravest patriots sink, with much such prudence and wisdom as the sheep in the fable suffered those bloody mastiffs to be destroyed, who so often broke the peace between them and the harmless wolves; and were afterwards in their turns handsomely worried, and justly eaten up for their reward. It was convenient to make somewhat more of it; there must be an assassination grafted on this insurrection, or else all would not be worth an halter; it was the business and interest of the popish party, to render their enemies as odious as possible to the people, of whom for their steady zeal and love to their religion and liberties, they had long been the darlings. To accomplish this, it was very necessary to get some persons to insinuate into their counsels, to inflame things higher, to make odious proposals of all assassinations, and murders, and such bloody villainies as alarm the good nature of an Englishman with the very mention of them; which yet some of the honestest and wiser looking upon as mad hot words only, or if any more intended, having it in their power to prevent such wickedness another way, would not yet turn informers, nor ruin those persons, who in all probability were only trepanners to ruin them. In all the papers relating to this matter, we shall find all discourses of this nature centered in West and Rumsey. West was very much for lopping business, for killing them in their calling, and was full and eager for it. Though Walcot, Holloway, and all whoever heard it proposed, received it still with the greatest detestation imaginable, as a most base and bloody action, which they never would have their own hands imbrued in, nor their posterity stained with. That all the great persons of birth and honour, were absolutely against so foul an action, and abhorred it from their souls, we may find, even without the forced confession of their worst enemies, by the lord Russell's concern when such a thing was muttered, and the duke of Monmouth's answer, God so—kill the king! I will never suffer it. The account we have of it, is from him who should best know, and that is West, who in his discourse with Holloway on this occasion, tells him of the Newmarket and Rye-house design, that the king and duke were to be killed as they came by, for which they had provided arms for fifty men, and were promised Rumbald's house, which lay in the road. When asked,

Who was to act it, who were to fire these arms for these men, pistols, carbines, and blunderbusses? He could name but two men, Rumbald and his brother; who certainly must have been very dexterous to have discharged all those dreadful weapons themselves without assistance, and is much such a likely story as Colledge's being so vain to attempt seizing the king by himself, without any assistance.

But if even these two brothers, who very likely were picked out by the evidence for the king-killers, merely for their hard names, the very sound of which would be as shrewd an argument of their guilt to women and children, and with as much justice, as some of the odd names of the poor people in the west were made, at least a strong presumption against them, and almost as mortal as an innuendo. If even these two were innocent of this horrid business, who were the only persons engaged therein, pray, what then becomes of the assassination? And will not Rumbald's blunderbuss bear laughing at full as well as Pickering's carbine or screw-gun, and chewed bullets? But if there be any thing solid in that observation in Colledge's case, That a christian, and a protestant, will not forswear himself when he is just going out of the world; if this fair supposition may but be granted me, as I see not how it can be avoided, the matter will be clear enough; Rumbald himself in his speech at his execution in Scotland, absolutely disclaiming and denying any hand in any such design. See his speech and answer to his indictment: He desired all present to believe the words of a dying man; as for having designed the king's death, he never directly, nor indirectly, intended such a villainy; that he abhorred the very thoughts of it; and that he blessed God he had that reputation in the world, that he knew none had the impudence to ask him the question; and he detested the thoughts of the action, and hoped all good people would believe him; which was the only way he had to clear himself; and he was sure that this truth should one day be manifested to all men. So at his execution: I think it necessary to clear myself of some aspersions laid on my name; and first, that I should have had so horrid an intention of destroying the king and his brother. Where he repeated what he had said to the jury on the same subject.

The sum is, If any assassination, it must have been from the Rumbalds: if not by them, as has been proved, then not at all. If no assassination in this plot, then nothing is left of malignity in it, but a lawful and laudable opposition to the breach and ruin of our good laws and government; and even that, as will be proved, not proved against most of those that by the iniquity of the times suffered for the same.

We have been forced to give this fair and impartial scheme or idea of that design, which was at that time represented so formidable and dreadful, before we could handsomely proceed to the death of this noble lord, or those others that followed him; and that as well from the order of the history, as for his vindication. And as has been remarked, it was necessary for that party who managed our ruin, that the fore-mentioned business of the assassination should be believed, and nothing like a real one actually performed, to gain credit to a feigned one only pretended: for what could be a greater argument that there was some black wickedness at the bottom, some sin of an extraordinary stain, like the murder of princes, bearing too hard on his conscience, that could possibly induce so great a man to so unchristian an attempt on his own person? Hence they might, and no doubt did argue; hence the very rabble may easily reason; certainly there was more in it than only just consultations, and necessary measures taken for the public safety by the peers of the realm, by the king and kingdom's best friends, to deliver his majesty from those familiars that haunted him. There was more than this, and this lord was conscious of it, or else certainly he had never acted what he has. Now this would effectually excite that aversion which must necessarily follow from all honest men, to a party who could be guilty of such horrid designs. This must of necessity, as in effect it did, sway much with those juries who were to sit upon the lives of any accused or concerned in the same business, had there not been more weighty reasons to be produced below, towards the finding them guilty. Although, it is certain by their own confession, the best excuse they could make for innocent blood, particularly in Ruffel's case, was that confirmation they had to the evidence sworn against them by Essex's murder. Besides, there might be a barbarous kind of pleasure, in opening this plot with a scene so like that which began the popish one; and that in all probability, by the same actors whose hands were deep in the others.

There was a gentleman killed, which contributed very much towards the credit of that plot, though in another way. Here must be one to undergo the same fate for the same reason. And both of them too pretendedly to kill themselves, just one as much as another.

These preliminaries being cleared, it will be now time to come to the person of this noble lord, his family, and former manner of life.

Every one knows he was of the illustrious family of the Capels, whose father died for a family, whence he deserved better treatment for his sake, and had received it, had he not fell into the hands of popish gratitude and mercy; which his enemies knowing too well, and doubting the sweetness of temper, which all the world ever acknowledged in king Charles the Second, would not give him over to their public revenge: in all probability, resolved to take a shorter course with him. He had been some years before in the highest place under the king in Ireland, and there behaved himself with that wisdom and candour, inseparable from all the actions of his life, and lived above blame, though not above envy: being recalled thence unexpectedly, and dealt with not very handsomely; which yet he bore with a spirit like a brave man, and a christian.

My lord of Essex was a person, whom it was no doubt the highest interest of the popish faction to have gotten out of the way, even though there had been no such extraordinary reason as has been mentioned. He had a large interest, a plentiful estate, a great deal of courage, understood the world, and the principles and practices of the papists, as well as any man, having been of several secret committees in the examination of the plot, for which very reason there was as much necessity for his dying as sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey. He was, besides all this, they very well knew, of inflexible honesty, and so true a greatness of mind, they could no more expect to gain him, than heaven itself, to be on their side.

As for the immediate subject of his death, the manner and circumstances thereof; it must first be granted, and a very reasonable demand it is, that for the present only supposing he was murdered only by the papists, they would, we may be sure, make it their business to render the manner of it as dark as the hell in which it was contrived. Murders, especially of that magnitude, are not used to be committed in the face of all the world, and at noon-day. When power is engaged in any villainy; when the same power is still continued or increased, and can be easily exercised in taking out of the way the traitors, though it loves the treason; and when so many years have intervened since the fact; it is no wonder at all if things are more in the dark, than they would have been, had, at that very instant, liberty been given to have enquired into it, which was so loudly and passionately demanded. But this we are yet certain of, though no more is yet publicly known in this matter, than what has formerly been printed; and there may be several reasons both of state and decency, which may perhaps make it convenient that things should always be as they are; yet there are already such violent probabilities, both that he was murdered, and murdered by papists; and of the other side, such at least next to impossibilities, in his acting it himself, that as long as the world stands, no modest man will be able either to get by them, or over them; nor the most impudent or cunning, to out-face, or give them an answer.

For the probability that he was murdered by popish contrivement, besides those already named, why they should do it? here are these following arguments, that they did it: Their principles too openly known to be denied: their practices in all ages, and this present; sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey, the very prototype of Essex, Arnold, all the pretended legal murders, and all that has since happened. But if it is said, some papists are better and braver than others; let us come nearer. Would those that formerly burned London; those who have since broke all the obligations of gratitude and good-nature, nay, public faith, and the most solemn oaths which it is possible for a man to take; who if the testimonies of such as have confirmed it with their dying breaths, and last drop of blood, may be credited, who have encouraged, hired, paid men for attempts to be made on the lives of their nearest, and too tender relations; would such as these stick at a single murder, a small venial villainy, to advance their cause, and merit heaven into the bargain? When pretence of justice, necessity of affairs, reason of state, and so many more such weights might be thrown into the scales. More than all this—When such persons as these were actually in the place where this murder was committed, at the very instant it was done? All these together, with what is yet to follow, amount to as strong arguments and pregnant circumstances as the nature of the thing will bear, and mark out the murderers as plainly and visibly, as if they had come out of his chamber with white sleeves, and a long knife in their hands, bloody all over.

And indeed there seems need of little more than relating bare, simple, indubitable matter of fact, and such as hardly any body will deny, to satisfy any cool rational man in the business.

The earl of Essex's throat was cut in the Tower the 13th of July, about eight or nine in the morning, at which time the duke of York, a bigotted papist, his known and bitter enemy, was there present. This was reported at Andover, 60 miles from London, the 11th of July, the first day of his imprisonment, and as common town-talk in every body's mouth, as sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey's at the time of his murder, and told a person travelling on the road near the same place, which was witnessed before even a Jeffreys, in a public court of judicature. A deputy coroner present at the inquest, instead of a legal one; none of the relations to attend the inquest. The body removed from the place where it was first laid, stripped, the clothes taken away, the body and rooms washed from the blood, the clothes denied the view of the jury. The principal witnesses examined only Bomeny his man, and Ruffel his warder, who might be so justly suspected of being privy to, if not actors in it. That the jury hastened and hurried the verdict, when so great a man, a peer of the realm, and such a peer was concerned, who was the king's prisoner. When sir Thomas Overbury had been before murdered in the Tower, and his jury brought in an unrighteous verdict; when even sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey's jury, so much cried out against for their ill-management, adjourned their verdict, and staid considerably before they brought it in. This at a time when the lord Ruffel was to be tried for a share in the plot, in which the earl was also accused of being concerned. One branch of which conspiracy, and which it was so much the papists interest to have the belief fixed on it, was a barbarous murder of the duke and king; when nothing could so immediately and critically tend to that noble gentleman's ruin; when the news was instantly, with so much diligence, conveyed from the Tower to the Sessions-House, Bench, Bar, and Jury, and harped upon by the lord Howard just then, and by others in after-trials, as more than a thousand witnesses, and the very finger of God. After this, the very centinel, who that day stood near the place, was found dead in the Tower-ditch, and captain Hawley barbarously murdered down at Rochester; and ill methods used to prevent the truth of all from coming to light. Mr. Braddon was harassed, prosecuted, imprisoned, and fined for stirring in it. On the fair and impartial consideration of these things, hardly one of which is but notorious matter of fact, granted by all sides; what can a man conclude from the whole, but whether he will or no—That this noble lord was certainly murdered by the popish party?

But there is yet more evidence: If he could not murder himself in that manner, who then should do it but those on whom the guilt of it has been justly charged? And this from the manner of it. His throat was cut from one jugular to the other, and by the Aspera Arteria and wind-pipe to the Vertebrae of the neck, both the jugulars being thoroughly divided. How often has it been asked, and how impossible it should ever receive an answer: How could any living man, after the prodigious flux of blood which must necessarily follow on the dividing one jugular, as well as all those strong muscles which lie in the way, how could he ever have strength to go through, all round, and come to the other, without fainting: One could as soon believe the story of the pirate, who after his head was cut off, ran the whole length of his ship; or that of St. Dennis, which was, no doubt, grafted on the other.

Nor is it rendered less impossible from the instrument with which those who did it would persuade the world it was performed by himself. A little French razor. Had Bomeny held to the penknife, it had been much more likely. But here was nothing to bear or rest upon in the cutting, it having no tongue to hold it up in the haft. And as it is observed in the prints on that subject, he must therefore, supposing he had done it himself, have held his hand pretty far, upon the very blade, and so with about two inches and a half of it, whittle out a wound of four inches deep, and all round his neck, as if he had intended to have been his own headsmen, as well as executioner, out of remorse of conscience for his treason.

Lastly, His character makes it morally impossible he should be guilty of so mean and little an action. It is for women, and eunuchs, and lovers, and romantic heroes, to kill themselves; not men of known virtue, temper, wisdom, piety, and gravity; who had formerly digested as great affronts as could be put upon a man, with a candour and calmness so worthy a man and a christian, who had been so far from defending so barbarous and unmanly a thing as self-murder, as is suggested, that he had rather expressed himself with detestation concerning it.

And as he ought not, and could not be hurried into so fatal an action by a false mistaken greatness of mind; as no such thing, or so much as the least footsteps of it appeared in the whole course of his life; so from all his actions in the Tower before his death, we may fairly deduce the quite contrary to what his enemies have asserted; and by observing his conduct there, discover plainly that no such black intention ever entered into his mind. This appears from ordering his people to have his own plate sent for out of the country to dress his meat, as well as a considerable parcel of wines bought and brought in to the Tower for his drinking, that he might not stand to the courtesy of his enemies, and this sufficient to last him till he could be delivered by due course of law.

I can foresee but one thing that can with the least plausibility be objected to this considerable passage; and it is, That this was when he was first committed, before he fell melancholy, which he more eminently did, when he heard my lord Russel was to be tried, as being grieved and desperate for having brought so brave a gentleman into such unhappy circumstances, as Bomeny somewhere or other pretends to, on discoursing with him on that particular.

But there are two answers which cut all the sinews of this objection: First, That this was the very day before he was murdered, that he sent both for his wine and silver vessels. Now, Bomeny lays the foundation of his melancholy, and the intention to be his own destroyer, on the very first day he came into the Tower. For he says in his deposition in Braddon's trial, That he had ordered his servant two days before to provide a penknife for him, on pretence of cutting his nails, but with an intent of committing that fatal and tragical act. The 13th of July was the day of his martyrdom, two days before then must be the 11th, the day of his commitment: but it was the intervening day, the 12th of that month, on which he took such care to eat and drink safely: whereas, had there been any such design in his head, he would never have taken such measures; and if he had had an intention to amuse his people, that no such thing might have been suspected, he might have taken other ways, less troublesome and chargeable.

But what yet clears all the remaining scruple, is his ordering his gentleman to take notes at my lord Russel's trial, appointing him how to manage himself for the effecting it, so calmly and orderly, that he cannot be supposed either disturbed, or desperate on account of his own guilt, or Russel's unhappiness; or to have taken this course with himself, as Jeffreys says in Braddon's trial, to prevent justice, though others did it with him, to prevent mercy.

One great argument more; that, which indeed, when it happened, did much alarm all thinking men, and make them shrewdly suspect foul play had been offered, was the ill-treatment those met with who dared but pry into those Arcana Imperii, and desire but in a legal way that the business might be reviewed, and searched to the bottom. This was granted in the case of poor sir Edmund, many years after his death, and commission given to inquire into it, to L'Estrange. But it is confessed there was a great deal of difference. One, as it was managed, tending to root up all belief of a popish plot. The other, if it had been honestly examined, might have done as much in reality to a protestant one. The great tenderness of some persons in this case, and their huge aversion and unwillingness to be touched thereabouts, made people more than suspect, that there was some sore or other in the case which would not endure it. Mr. Braddon had heard of a boy, who being playing before Essex's window that morning, saw a bloody razor thrown out of the window; he thought he should do the king service to make a discovery if any injury had been offered to one of his subjects, especially so great and good a person. He brings the boy with him to my lord Sunderland, and for his reward is himself brought before the council, severely reprimanded, and forced to give 2000l. bail to answer an information for suborning the boy to say what he did. Upon which, after a great many worse vexations, which besides the charge and trouble, hindered also his prosecution of the business while it was yet fresh and warm; he was at last tried: the very words in the indictment running thus, For his procuring and suborning false witnesses to prove that the earl of Essex was not a felon of himself, &c. Of which, according to Jeffreys's law, and the conscience of the then juries, he was found guilty, and fined for the same; though not the least syllable of practice or subornation proved against him; though the boy did himself acknowledge he had said those things, as well as several witnesses proved it; though it was terribly suspicious that some art had been afterwards used with the boy to make him deny it; though Jeffreys stormed and raved after his usual manner, when Mr. Wallop did put such a question, and would by no means have it be answered.

But whatever this courageous honest gentleman suffered from their spite and malice, he bore all with handsome, and truly English resolution. As he before his imprisonment, and since, was indefatigably diligent in getting at the bottom of this foul business; all Englishmen must own, he has deserved the love and honour of his country, who was not discouraged from acting even in the worst of times, against a whole enraged faction, where he had such firm and pregnant circumstances on which to ground his attempt; though he could not but be sensible he must undergo all censures of his friends, as forward and imprudent; as well as all the hate and malice of his own and his country's enemies. He deserves a much fairer commendation than here can be given him; but however, this was a just debt due to his courage and honesty, when he alone durst undertake what all the world else was afraid of; durst still continue firm to honour and conscience, and his first resolution, in spite of fines and imprisonments, and has outlived them all, to carry on his first undertakings; whose design therein is, no doubt, just and generous, whatever the event proves; and although so much dust may have, since it happened, been purposely thrown on the action, that that it may be now more difficult, and perhaps unsuccessful to trace it, than it was before.

The MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM LORD RUSSEL.

THE next who fell under their cruelty, and to whose death Essex's was but a prologue, was lord Russel; without all dispute one of the finest gentlemen, that ever England bred; and whose pious life and virtue is as much treason against the court, by affronting them with what was so much hated there, as any thing else that was sworn against him. His family was ancient, though not raised to the honours it at present enjoys, till king Edward's time, when John Russel, a Dorsetshire gentleman, who had done many services, and received many favours from the crown, both in Henry the Seventh, and Henry the Eighth's time, being by the latter made lord high admiral, and at his death lord high steward of England, for the solemnity of the coronation; obtained such a victory for his young master against the rebels, as was rewarded with the title of the earl of Bedford. The occasion of it was thus: Idolatry and superstition being now rooting out by the public authority, and images every where pulling down, the loyal papists mutinied, and one of their priests stabbed a commander of the king's, who was obeying his orders, and 10,000 of the deluded rabble rose in the defence of that barbarous action, and their old mass and holy water. Against whom this fortunate lord was sent with an army, who routed them all, relieved Exeter, which they had besieged, and took their gods, banners, crucifixes, and all the rest of their trumpery, wherein the deluded creatures trusted for victory. Thus the family of the Russels were early enemies to the Romish superstition, though this brave gentleman only paid the scores of all his ancestors. The son and heir of this John, was Francis, second earl of Bedford, who was as faithful to his crown as his father, an enemy and terror to the French, and a friend to the protestant religion, as may appear by the learned books of Wickliff, which he collected, and at his death bequeathed to a great man, who he knew would make good use of them. His eldest son, William lord Russel, the late duke of Bedford, is sufficiently known to every true Englishman, and his person and memory will be honoured by them as long as the world lasts. But it is necessary good men should not be immortal; if they were, we should almost lose their examples, it looking so like flattery. But to do them justice while they are living, with more safety and less censure, we may discourse of that noble gentleman, his son and name-fake William lord Russel, who made so great a figure in our courts and parliaments, before he was sacrificed to the cruelty and revenge of his popish enemies. If we could find his first offence, which lay behind the scene, and was indeed the cause of his death, though other colours were necessary to amuse the public, we must look some years backwards, as he himself does in his last speech, wherein he tells the world, He cannot but think his earnestness in the matter of the exclusion, had no small influence on his present sufferings; being chosen knight of the shire for Bedfordshire, where the evenness and sweetness of his behaviour, and his virtuous life, made him so well beloved, that he will never be forgotten. He began sooner than most others to see into that danger we were in from popery, and all those fatal consequences which have since happened; and described them as plainly as if he had more than the ordinary inspection of a prudent man into futurities.

Being marked out, and, among others, appointed for the slaughter, he was taken up and imprisoned for that end and purpose in the Tower, and brought to his trial above all the days in the year, on Essex's day, the 13th of July, 1683. He was brought to the Old Bailey, and the same morning tried for high treason. He earnestly desired he might have respite, and might not be tried that day, since he had some witnesses that could not be in town till the night; nay, they were in such post haste, and so hot a scent for his blood, that on his earnest desire, they would not stay so much as till the afternoon, pretending it was against precedent, and they could not do it without the attorney general's consent; though it is notorious, that both Plunket, the titular Irish primate, and Fitz-Harris, before spoken of, were both of them tried the term after they were arraigned; though in both cases the attorney opposed it; and even here in the case of treason, at the Old Bailey too, Whitebread's trial was put off to another sessions. If it is pleaded, the case is different, and that there was reason for the one, but not for the other; it will be readily granted, though my lord's evidence were not ready, their's was; they had concerted business better, and just at that time news was brought hot into the house, that my lord of Essex had this morning prevented justice, as has been before remarked in the story of Essex; as also, that several of the jury had said, They had never found Russel guilty, had it not been for that accident. And indeed, were that all in the case, there would be still room for a great deal of charity: for though there was no proper evidence against the prisoner, yet very few persons in the world, perhaps, could have been found, whose minds would have been so firm, and reason so clear, as not to be, whether they would or no, hinged and biased by such a sudden report as this brought in among them, when they had no time to consider calmly of the matter; and this, no doubt, was very well known by those who ordered things in the manner before noted. But I say, it were to be wished, for the honour of the English nation, that this had been all the foul play in the case, and that there had not been so many thousand guineas employed in this and other trials, as the great agitators thereof have lately confessed to have been. The names of his jury, as I find them, are as follows:

John Martayn,	William Butler,
William Rouse,	James Pickering,
Jervas Seaton,	Thomas Jevé,
William Fashion,	Hugh Noden,
Thomas Short,	Robert Brough,
George Toriano,	Thomas Omeby.

When he found he must expect neither favour nor justice, as to the delaying of his trial, he excepted against the foreman of the jury, because not a freeholder; which for divers and sundry reasons, almost, if not all the judges, having the happiness to light on different ones, and scarce any two of the same, was overruled, and given against him; though that same practice since declared and acknowledged one of the great grievances of the nation. His indictment ran in these words, He did conspire and compass our lord the king, his supreme lord, not only of his kingly state, title, power, and government of this his kingdom of England, to deprive and throw down; but also our said sovereign lord the king to kill, and to death to bring and put, and the ancient government of this kingdom of England to change, alter, and wholly subvert, and a miserable slaughter among the subjects of our said lord the king through his whole kingdom of England to cause and procure, an insurrection and rebellion against our said lord the king to move, procure, and stir up within this kingdom of England. And lower, He and divers others did consult, agree, and conclude insurrection and rebellion against our sovereign lord the king to move and stir up, and the guards for the preservation of the person of our said sovereign lord the king to seize and destroy.

Now that all this was not intended as a matter of form only, we may see by the king's council's opening the evidence. The first says, He was indicted for no less than conspiring the death of the king's majesty; and that in order to the same, he and others did meet and conspire together, to bring our sovereign lord the king to death, to raise war and rebellion against him, and to massacre his subjects; and in order to compass these wicked designs, being assembled, did conspire to seize the king's guards, and his majesty's person: and this (he tells the jury) is the charge against him.

The attorney general melts it a little lower, and tells them them the meaning of all these tragical words, were a consult about a rising, about seizing the guards, and receiving messages from the earl of Shaftsbury concerning an insurrection.

Yet the proof against him does not come up so high even as this, though all care was used for that purpose, and kind questions put very frequently to lead and drive the evidence; only one of them witnessing to any one point in particular.

Colonel Rumsey, the first of these, swears, That he was sent with a letter from Shaftsbury, who lay concealed at Wapping, to meet lord Russel, Ferguson, &c. at Shepherd's, to know of them what resolution they were come to concerning the rising designed at Taunton. That when he came thither, the answer made was, Mr. Trenchard had failed them, and no more would be done in that business at that time. That Mr. Ferguson spoke the most part of that answer; but my lord Russel was present, and that he did speak about the rising of Taunton, and consented to it. That the company was discoursing also of viewing the guards, in order to surprise them, if the rising had gone on; and that some undertook to view them; and that the lord Russel was by, when this was undertaken. But this being the main hinge of the business, and this witness not yet coming up to the purpose, they thought it convenient to give him a jog, to refresh his memory, asking him, Whether he found my lord Russel averse, or agreeing to it? Who, no doubt, answered, Agreeing. But being afterwards on the trial asked, Whether he could swear positively, that my lord Russel heard the message, and gave any answer to it? All that he says is this, That when he came in, they were at the fire-side, but that they all came from the fire-side to hearken to his words.

The chief that Shepherd witnesses, is, That my lord Russel, &c. being at his house, there was a discourse of surprising the king's guards; and sir Thomas Armstrong having viewed them when he came thither another time, said, They were remiss, and the thing was seizable, if there were strength to do it, and that upon being questioned too, as Rumsey before him, Whether my lord Russel was there? He says, he was, at the time they discoursed of seizing the guards.

The florid lord Howard was the next witness, who very artificially begins low, being, forsooth, so terribly surprised with my lord of Essex's death, that his voice failed him, till the lord chief justice told him, the jury could not hear him; in which very moment his voice returned again, and he told the reason why he spoke no louder. After a long harangue of tropes and fine words, and dismal general stories, by which, as my lord complains, the jury were prepossessed against him; he at last makes his evidence bear directly upon the point for which he came thither, and swears, That after my lord Shaftsbury went away, their party resolved still to carry on the design of the insurrection without him; for the better management whereof they created a little cabal among themselves, which did consist of six persons, whereof my lord Russel and himself were two: that they met for that purpose at Mr. Hambden's house, and there adjusted the place and manner of the intended insurrection: that about ten days after they had another meeting on the same business at my lord Russel's, where they resolved to send some persons to engage Argyle and the Scots in the design, and (being asked too) that he was sure my lord Russel was there. Being asked whether he said any thing, he answered, That every one knew him to be a person of great judgment, and not very lavish of discourse. Being again goaded on by Jeffreys, with a—But did he consent? We did, says he, put it to the vote, it went without contradiction, and I took it that all there gave their consent accordingly.

The next witness West swears, That Ferguson and colonel Rumsey told him, That my lord Russel intended to go down and take his post in the West, when Mr. Trenchard had failed them. Whose hear-say evidence being not encouraged, Jeffreys ends very prettily, telling the court, they would not use any thing of garniture, but leave it entirely as it was.

Now as to colonel Rumsey the first witness: my lord Cavendish proved on the trial, that my lord Russel had a very ill opinion of him, and therefore it was not likely he would intrust him with a secret of such importance.

Then as to his evidence, squeezed out of him, as it was, in both branches of the design, seizing the guards, and the rising of Taunton, he says in gross and general, That he was agreeing to one, and spoke about, and consented to the other. For his agreeing to the seizing the guards, he might think, as the lord Howard does after, that silence gives consent; for it appears not, nor does he swear, that my lord spoke one word about it. But he himself, in his last speech, which was not a Jesuit's, and which we have all the reason in the world to believe exactly true, since, as he himself says in it, He always detested lying, though ever so much for his advantage; and hoped none would be so unjust, or uncharitable, to think he would venture on it in these his last words, for which he was soon going to give an account to the great God, the searcher of hearts, and judge of all things. In this last speech he protests, that at this time of which Rumsey swears, there was no undertaking of securing and seizing the guards, nor none appointed to view or examine them, only some discourse there was of the practicability of it; he heard it mentioned as a thing which might easily be done, but never consented to it as a thing fit to be done. Now I would ask any man of sense and honour, who did but know my lord Russel, let them be ever so much his enemy (if there were any such) which of these two they really judge more worthy to be believed? There is but one against one. Rumsey, who either swore upon liking, for saving his life, or was a trepan, that he was consenting to the seizing the guards, or my lord Russel on his death and salvation solemnly affirming, That he was so far from consenting to any such thing, that there was not so much as any such undertaking mentioned in the company while he was with them. Especially when it is observable, that Rumsey never instances in the terms in which he gave his consent; the same is to be said of the other branch of his evidence, as to the message of the insurrection, which, he says, he brought into the room, found my lord Russel and the rest by the fire; whence they all came to him, and heard his message, and the lord Russel discoursed on the subject of it, and consented to it. To all which let us again oppose not only what he answered on his trial, wherein he says, That he would swear he never heard, or knew of that message, which Rumsey says he brought to them; but also what he says in confirmation thereof in his speech, I shall aver, that what I said of my not hearing colonel Rumsey deliver any message from my lord Shaftsbury, was true. And a little before, when I came into the room, I saw Mr. Rumsey by the chimney, though he swears he came in after that.

There is one thing more observable, That when West came to give in his garniture evidence, he runs in a length further than Rumsey, and remembers Rumsey had told him, what it seems he himself had forgot, That on Mr. Trenchard's failing them, my lord Russel was to go in his place, and take up his posts along in the West. And indeed had not West missed his cue, and by imitating my lord Howard's example, begun first with hear-say, he had made as stabbing an evidence as ever did any one of the others; or had they but let him run to the end of his story, and taken things methodically, as his lordship had done before him.

As to Shepherd, all must grant he says not a syllable to the purpose, or any thing which affects my lord. He can hardly tell whether he was there when there was the discourse of seizing the guards, but speaks not a word of my lord's hearing, or in the least wise consenting to the same.

Now as for my lord Howard's evidence, we may, without scandalum magnatum, affirm, that every lord is not fit to make a privy counsellor; no, nor every witty lord neither, especially in a business of such a concern. He does very well to say, the council of six all chose themselves; for had not he given his own vote for himself, hardly any body else would have done it, since his character is so notoriously different from that which he himself gives of my lord Ruffel, whom, he says, every one knew to be a person of great judgment and not very lavish of discourse. For his evidence, he too is so happy to have a better memory than Rumsey, as well as West had; and says, that the duke of Monmouth told him, Rumsey had conveyed my lord Ruffel to Shaftsbury, on whose persuasion the insurrection was put off a fortnight longer. Of this Rumsey himself says not a single word.

His lordship says further, that when they had inquired how matters stood in the country, and the duke of Monmouth had found Trenchard and the west country failed them, on this it was put off again, and this about the 17th or 18th of October. Now this same action Rumsey speaks of, but takes a larger scope as to the time, the end of October, or the beginning of November, far enough from the 17th or 18th of the month before. Rumsey says, on this disappointment of the Taunton men and Trenchard, Shaftsbury resolved to be gone. Lord Howard, that he was so far from it, that he and his party resolved to do it without the lords, and had set one time and the other, and at last the 17th of November, which also not taking effect, then Shaftsbury went off. As to his evidence, which was closer; the story of the council of six, besides the former improbability, that he among all the men in England should be chosen one of them; it is remarkable, that in their former greater consultations at Shepherd's, which he and Rumsey mention, the lord Howard was never present, nor so much as touches on it in his evidence; though here, if any where, the grand affair of seizing the guards, and the answer to Shaftsbury about Taunton was concerted. All that appears of truth in the matter, seems to be what my lord Ruffel acknowledges, That those persons named, met very often; that there was no formed design, but only loose talk about those concerns. That there was no debate of any such thing as was sworn, nor putting any thing in a method; but my lord Howard being a man of a voluble tongue, and one who talks very well, they were all delighted to hear his oratory.

Indeed my lord Howard does not positively swear, even supposing this formed consult to be true, that my lord Ruffel actually consented to it. Only, that he was there, and that he took it, and that he did give his approbation.

Doubtless it is a very ill cause that needs either a lie or a cheat to defend it. My lord Ruffel himself being so ingenuous to acknowledge whatever of truth, any that knew him will believe to be in his part of the design, it would be an injury to his memory to do otherwise. It appears then from his own acknowledgment, that Howard, Armstrong, and such others, had sometimes discoursed of ill designs and matters in his company: and as he says in his speech, What the heats, wickedness, passions, and vanities of other men had occasioned, he ought not to be answerable for, nor could he repress them. Nay more, he did sufficiently disapprove those things which he heard discoursed of with more heat than judgment. But for himself, he declares solemnly again and again, That he was never in any design against the king's life, or any man's whatever; nor ever in any contrivance of altering the government. If so, what then becomes of all the story of the council of six? And is it not to be thrown among the same lumber with the old famous Nag's-Head-Tavern business? It will be still said he was an ill man, by being guilty by this very confession of misprision of treason. Supposing this true; that was not death, and he died, as he says, innocent of the crime he stood condemned for. And besides, every lord has not brow hard enough, nor tongue long enough, nor soul little enough, to make an informer against others to save his own life? I hope, says he, nobody will imagine that so mean a thought could enter into me, as to go about to save my life by accusing others. The part that some have acted lately of that kind has not been such as to invite me to love life at a rate so dear!

However, all this does not depend on his naked word, since the evidence who swore against him being such as were neither credible, nor indeed so much as legal witnesses, the accusation of itself must fall to the ground. If legal they were not credible, because as my lord Delamere observes in this case, they had no pardons, but hunted, as the cormorant does, with strings about their necks, which West, in his answer to Walcot's letter, ingenuously acknowledges, and says, It is through God and the king's mercy, he was not at the apparent point of death. That is, in a fair construction, was not just turning over, but was upon trial, to see whether he would do business, and deserve to escape hanging. Much such an honourable way of getting pardon, as the fellow who saved his own neck by turning hangman, and doing his own father the good office.

No more indeed was the great witness, the honourable lord who cast this noble person, a legal, as well as a credible witness. No man alive has any way to clear himself from the most perjured villain's malice, if he swears against him point blank, but either by circumstance of time; or invalidating his very evidence. Let any think of another way if they can. The first of these was precluded; it was that which had before been made use of to sham off a truer plot, and much more valid evidence. But here Rumsey and the rest came to no determinate time, but only about such a time; about the end of October, or beginning of November: and others cloud the precise time in so many words, that it is impossible to find it. All then that could be done, was as to the person. Now what thing can be invented, which can more invalidate the evidence any person gives, than his solemn, repeated, voluntary oath, indubitably proved against him, that such a person is innocent of that very crime of which he afterwards accuses him? If this be the case or no here, let any one read the following depositions, and make an indifferent judgment. My lord Anglesey witnesses, He was at the earl of Bedford's, after his son was imprisoned, where came in my lord Howard, and began to comfort him, saying, He was happy in so wise a son, and worthy a person; and who could never be in such a plot as that. That he knew nothing against him, or any body else, of such a barbarous design. But this was not upon oath, and only related to the assassination, as he says for himself in his paring distinction. Look then a little lower to Dr. Burnet, whom the lord Howard was with the night after the plot broke out, and then, as well as once before, with hands and eyes lifted up to heaven, did say, He knew nothing of any plot, nor believed any. Here is the most solemn oath, as he himself confesses voluntarily, nay, unnecessarily; though perhaps in my lord Bedford's case, good nature might work upon him. Here is the paring of his apple broke all to pieces. No shadow, no room left for his distinction between the insurrection and assassination; but without any guard or mitigation at all, he solemnly swears, he knew not of any plot, nor believed any existed.

However, it was no great matter, for the jury were resolved to know and believe it, whether he did or no. There is but little subterfuge more, and the case is clear. All this perjury, all these solemn asseverations he tells us were only to brazen out the plot, and to outface the thing for himself and party. This he fairly acknowledges; and let all the world be the jury, whether they would destroy one of the bravest men in it, on the evidence of such a person? But there is yet further answer. His cousin, Mr. Howard, who was my lord's intimate friend, who secured him in his house, to whom he might open his soul, and to whom it seems he did, he having made application to the ministers of state in his name, that he was willing to serve the king, and give him satisfaction; to him, I say, with whom he had secret negotiations, and that of such a nature; will any believe that he would outface the thing here too? That he would perjure himself for nothing, where no danger, no good came on it? No certainly, his lordship had more wit, and conscience, and honour; he ought to be vindicated from such an imputation, even for the credit of his main evidence; for my lord Grey, he tells us, was left out of their councils for his immoralities; and had he himself been such a sort of a man, those piercing heads in the council would have certainly found him out before, before, and never admitted him among them. As for the very thing, Mr. Howard tells it as generously, and with as much honest indignation as possible, in spite of the checks the court gave him. He took it, says he, upon his honour, his faith, and as much as if he had taken an oath before a magistrate, that he knew nothing of any man concerned in this business, and particularly of the lord Russell; of whom, he added, that he thought he did unjustly suffer. So that if he had the same soul on Monday, that he had on Sunday (the very day before) this could not be true that he swore against the lord Russell. My lord Russell's suffering was imprisonment, and that for the same matter on which he was tried, the insurrection, not the assassination. If my lord Howard knew him guilty of that for which he was committed, though not the other, how could he then say, he suffered unjustly?

It would after all this, be almost superfluous to go any further, or insert the evidence given by Dr. Tillotson, Burnet, Cox, and others, not only of his virtuous and honourable behaviour, but especially of his judgment about any stir, or popular insurrections, that he was absolutely against them; that it was folly and madness till things came to be regulated in a parliamentary way, and thought it would ruin the best cause in the world to take any such ways towards its preservation.

But all this and more would not do, die he must, the duke ordered it, the witnesses swore it, the judges directed it, the jury found it; and when the sentence came to be passed, the judge asked, as is usual, What he had to say why it should not be pronounced? He answered, That whereas he had been charged in the indictment which was then read to him, with conspiring the death of the king, which he had not taken notice of before, he appealed to the judge and court, whether he were guilty within the statute on which he was tried, the witnesses having sworn an intention of levying war, but not of killing the king, of which there was no proof by any one witness. The recorder told him, That was an exception proper, and as he thought, his lordship did make it before the verdict. Whether the evidence did amount to prove the charge, was to be observed by the jury; for if the evidence came short of the indictment, they could not find it to be a true charge; but when once they had found it, their verdict did pass for truth, and the court was bound by it, as well as his lordship, and they were to go according to what the jury had found, not their evidence. Now I would fain know, what is the reason of the prisoner's being asked that question, What he has to say for himself? Is it only formality, or banter? He makes an exception, which the judge himself confesses proper. But who was counsel for the prisoner! Is not the bench? Or, does it not pretend to be so? And why is not this observed by them in their direction to the jury! The recorder seems to grant it fairly, that the evidence did not prove the charge, and says, The court was to go, not according to the evidence. Well, evidence, or none, the truth is, was not the question: for being found guilty, sentence past upon him; whence he was removed to Newgate. While he was there, the importunity of his friends, as he handsomely says in his speech, lest they should think him sullen or stubborn, prevailed with him to sign petitions, and make an address for his life, though it was not without difficulty that he did any thing that was begging to save it. But with how much success, it may easily be guessed by any who knew the duke's temper; nor is it forgotten how barbarously his lady and children were repelled, and the king's good nature not suffered to save one of the best men in his kingdom. Dr. Burnet and Dr. Tillotson were with him much of the time between his sentence and death; where to the last, he owned that doctrine, which other good men, who were then of another judgment, have since been forced into, namely, The lawfulness of resistance against unlawful violence, from whomsoever it proceeds.

Now, after fruitless applications for his pardon; after a farewell and adieu in this world, to one of the best of women, who stood by him, and assisted him in his trial, and did not leave his presence, till at last on Saturday the 21st of July, he went into his own coach about nine o'clock with Dr. Tillotson and Dr. Burnet; whence he was carried to Great-Lincoln's-Inn-Field to the scaffold prepared for him, where, among all the numerous spectators, he was one of the most unconcerned persons there: and very few rejoiced at so doleful a spectacle, but the Papists, who indeed had sufficient reason; my lord Powis's people expressing, as it is said, a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction. There, after he had again solemnly protested his innocency, and that he was far from any design against the king's person, or of altering the government; nay, that he did upon the words of a dying man profess, that he knew of no plot against the king's life or government; and delivering one of the finest speeches in the world to the sheriff, he prayed by himself, and with Dr. Tillotson's assistance; and embracing him and Dr. Burnet, he submitted to the fatal strokes, for the executioner took no less than three before he could sever his head, which when it was held up, as usual, there was so far from being any shout, that a considerable groan was heard round the scaffold. His body was given to his friends, and conveyed to Cheneys in Buckinghamshire, where it was buried among his ancestors. During the day of his martyrdom there was a great storm, and many loud claps of thunder.

The MARTYRDOM of Captain WALCOT, HONE, and ROUSE, with a full Account of their Behaviour and Execution.

CAPTAIN WALCOT and his fellow-sufferers, in order of time, should have gone first, he being convicted before my lord Russell, and executed the Friday, as he was on Saturday. But my lord Russell's fate having so immediate a dependence on the earl of Essex's, and all the plot hanging on him; especially they two making the greatest figure of any who suffered on this occasion; it looked more proper and natural to begin with them, and reserve the other to this place.

Captain Walcot was a gentleman of a considerable estate in Ireland, but more remarkable for the rare happiness of having eight children all at once living, and most of all, for his love to his country, which cost him his life, as our readers will perceive.

The supposed crime for which Walcot suffered, and which West and others witness against him, was consulting the death of the king, and charging the guards, at his return from Newmarket, while the dreadful blunderbuss was to be fired into the coach by Rumbald, or some others. His privacy to discourses about the king's death was but misprision. For his acting in it, they could not have pitched on a more unlikely man to command a party in so desperate an attempt as charging the guards, than one that was sick and bed-ridden of the gout, as about this time, and often besides, the captain was. Nor seems West's pretence more likely, that he refused to be actual in the assassination, because of the baseness of it, but offered to charge the guards, while others did it; much as wisely and tenderly, as if he had denied to cut a man's throat, but consented to hold his hands while others did it. This he denies with indignation in his speech, and appeals to all that knew him, whether they thought him such an idiot, that he should not understand it was the same thing to engage the king's guards, whilst others killed him; or to kill him with his own hands? Here then, it is plain, lies the pinch of the matter; West, Rumsey, &c. had been frequently discoursing at that bloody, villanous rate; West was most impatiently eager of having it done; he proposed the lopping them at a play, which would be in their own calling he said.

Colonel Rumsey and West were the main pillars, and almost the only witnesses on which the credit of that action depended, who appear all through the great and almost sole managers thereof, and who accuse others for being concerned in it. What and how much their credit weighs, we have already hinted, but shall yet confront it with further testimonies relating to this matter, and that of dying men, who could expect no pardon in this this world, nor the other, for a falsehood. Besides Rumbald's solemn protestation; see Walcot's speech and paper, wherein he as deeply affirms, as a man can do, that West bought arms for this villanous design (which cannot be expressed with detestation enough) without any direction of his; nay, without any direction, knowledge, or privity of his. West says in his answer to this, as well as in his evidence, that Walcot joined in the direction about the nature and size of those arms; that he was very intimate and familiar with this Rumbald; who was to be the principal actor in the assassination. But Rumbald's death before recited, clears himself and Walcot, and shews us what West is. In another place he affirms, that Walcot told him Ferguson had the chief management of the intended assassination. Rumbald's hard name, as has been said already, Ferguson's ill name, and the absence of them both, brought them in all probability into the business; and Walcot's being past answering for himself or them, made it very advisable to charge so much on him. So in the same nature Ferguson was the author of that expression Walcot had from West; Ferguson undertook for the duke of Monmouth; Ferguson proposed to see for an opportunity between Windsor and Hampton-Court. The men to commit the assassination were all provided by Ferguson, Rumbald, &c. And I remember another of them, or he himself, talks of fifty men engaged for the very action. Now as mere good nature, and the love I have to my countrymen, will never suffer me to believe there could be so many Englishmen found, and Protestants too, who would consent to kill their king; never any one having acknowledged such a design besides poor Hone, who was so stupid, he could not give one sensible answer to what Cartwright asked him at his death: so plain a testimony, and dint of fact and reason, forces me to conclude these persons here charged were not guilty. See what Rouse says of it; he was told, they did not intend to spill so much as one drop of blood. But most particularly Holloway; he could not perceive Ferguson knew any thing of the Newmarket design, but Rumsey and West were deep in it. Again, Holloway asked West who was to act the assassination? To which he could give but a slender answer, and could, or would name but two men, Rumbald and his brother. Just such probable stuff as Colledge's seizing the king by himself at Oxford, so that (he goes on) we found they had but few men, if more than two, and no horses, only a parcel of arms he shewed at a gunsmith's. And lower, at another time, West only named Rumsey and Richard Goodenough as concerned in the assassination: West again proposed the assassination, but none seconded him: Rumsey was for the old strain of killing the king, to which not one consented: he could never find above five concerned in it. He heard Walcot speak against it; I knew Ferguson to be against any such intention.

To sum up the whole, the world is left to it's liberty to believe, at least three dying men's asseverations, against those who so plainly swore others necks into the halter, to get their own out, that West himself is not ashamed to own in his forementioned answer, that he was still in danger of death, though not so eminent as it had been; nor at the apparent point of death. And at the close of this paper, if it shall please the king to spare my life for my confession, it is a great happiness, &c. which part of his evidence every body will easily credit.

All this duly considered, a fair supposition lies of the innocency of this captain, and others, of what they were accused, found guilty, sentenced, and died for; it being on West's evidence, and such as his, that he and others were arraigned and condemned; the captain's defence being much the same with what he says in his speech. It is well known, that the witnesses against captain Walcot swore for their own lives with halters about their necks; and it is as true that most of the witnesses had talked at a mad rate, in the hearing of some of those whom they destroyed; but mark what captain Walcot in a most solemn manner with his last breath declared.

First of all he denied any design of killing the king, or of engaging the guards, whilst others killed him; and said, that the witnesses invited him to meetings, where some things were discoursed of, in order to the asserting our liberties and properties; which we looked upon to be violated and invaded: That they importuned and perpetually solicited him, and then delivered him up to be hanged: That they combined together to swear him out of his life, to save their own; and that they might do it effectually, they contrived an untruth. That he forgave them, though guilty of his blood; but withal, earnestly begged, that they might be observed, that remarks might be set upon them, whether their end be peace; and he concluded (with what made sir Roger L'Estrange a great deal of sport, but yet heaven has made it good) That when God hath a work to do, he will not want instruments.

Rouse, who was tried with the captain, was charged with such a parcel of mad romance, as was scarce ever heard of; and one would wonder how perjury and malice, which use to be sober sins, could ever be so extravagant as to think of it. He was to seize the Tower, pay the rabble, uncase the aldermen, to be pay-master and flea-master-general, and a great deal more to the same tune. In his defence he says no great matter, but yet what looks a thousand times more like truth than his accusation; that the Tower business was only discourse of the feasibility of the thing (as Ruffel's about the guards) but without the least intent of bringing it to action; that all he was concerned in any real design, he had from Lee, and was getting more out of him, with an intention to make a discovery. But it seems Lee got the whip-hand of him; they were both at a kind of halter combat; Rouse's foot slipped, and Lee turned him over, and saved his own neck by so doing.

One Hone was likewise accused, and owns himself guilty of a design to kill the king and the duke of York, or one, or neither, for it is impossible to make any sense of him. When they came to suffer, Walcot read a paper, in which was a good rational confession of his faith; then comes to the occasion of his death; for which, he says, he neither blames the judges, jury, nor council, but only some men, that in reality were deeper concerned than he, who combined together to swear him out of his life to save their own, and that they might do it effectually, contrived an untruth, &c. He forgives the world and the witnesses; gives his friends advice to be more prudent than he had been; prays that his may be the last blood spilled on that account; wishes the king would be merciful to others; says he knew nothing of Ireland; and concludes, with praying God to have mercy on him. He had then some discourse with Cartwright, wherein he tells him, that he was not for contriving the death of the king, nor to have had a hand in it; and being urged with some matters of controversy, tells him, he did not come thither to dispute about religion, but religiously to suffer.

Now though dying be a serious business, yet it is almost impossible to read Hone's discourse with the dean, without as violent temptations to laughter as compassion. Never was so exact an imitation of the scene of the Fisherman and Kings in the Rehearsal, when he tells them prince Prettyman killed prince Prettyman. One would think him very near in the same case with Bateman, who came after him. His replies are so incongruous, that there is hardly either sense or English to be made out of them. But the poor fellow talks of snares and circumstances, and nobody knows what, and says in one line, he was to meet the king and duke of York, but he did not know when, where, nor for what. In the next, he was for killing the king, and saving the duke; and when asked the reason, answers, the only sensible thing he said all through, that he knew no reason, that he did not know what to say to it. And when the dean charges him with the murderous design, that he knew as little of it, as any poor silly man ever did.

Next Rouse comes, gives an account of his faith, professing to die of the church of England, tells his former employment and manner of life, acknowledges he heard of clubs and designs, but was never at them, and a perfect stranger to any thing of that nature. Gives a relation of what passed between him and his majesty on his apprehension.

apprehension. Talks somewhat of fir Thomas Player, the earl of Shaftsbury, and accommodating the king's son, as he calls it, though not while the king reigned. Then falls upon Lee, and the discourse they had together, who, as he says, swore against him on the trial those very words he himself had used in pressing him to undertake the design. Speaks of a silver ball which he proposed to be thrown up on Black-Heath, and after some discourse with the ordinary, gives the spectators some good counsel. Then they all three singly prayed; and underwent their execution at Tower-Hill.

The Martyrdom of Colonel ALGERNON SIDNEY.

COLONEL Algernon Sidney, was the next victim to popish cruelty and malice; he was of the ancient and noble name and family of the Sidneys, deservedly famous to the utmost bounds of Europe; who, as the ingenious Mr. Hawles observes, was merely talked to death, under the notion of a commonwealth's man, and found guilty by a jury who were not much more proper judges of the case, than they would have been had he wrote in Greek or Arabic. He was arraigned for a branch of this plot at Westminster, the 17th of November 1683; where, though it cannot be said the grand jury knew not what they did, when they found the bill against him, since, no doubt, they were well instructed what to do; yet it appears, that they found it almost before they knew what it was, being so well resolved on the case, and agreed on their verdict, that had he been indicted for breaking open an house, or robbing on the highway, it was doomed to have been billa vera, as much as it was now. For though the indictment was never presented to them before they came into the hall, yet they immediately found it: the substance whereof was, for a conspiracy to depose the king, and stirring up rebellion, and writing a libel for that purpose. The most part of the evidence brought against him, was only hear-say, as against my lord Ruffel; nay, West, whose evidence was then refused, now was admitted to tell a long story of what he had from one and the other. Rumsey's was much of the same nature. In the rear came that never-failing evidence, the lord Howard, who witnesses he was one of the council of six, and engaged one of the deepest in their consults. And more than this, exercises his own faculty very handsomely, in an account of two speeches Mr. Hambden made on the occasion, which indeed were such fine things, that some might think it worth the while to swear against a man, only to have the reputation of reciting them; and let any man judge whom they are most like, Mr. Hambden, or my lord's own witty self.

A paper was the next evidence said to be of the prisoner's writing, which was found in his study. The substance of which was an inquiry into the forms of government, and reasons of their decays: the rights of the people, and the bounds of sovereignty, and original of power. In which were those heinous, treasonable expressions, the king is subject to the law of God as a man, to the people who made him such, as a king, &c. And examples of evil kings and tyrants, whom sometimes a popular fury had destroyed; at others, the Ordines Regni either reduced, or set them aside, when their government was a curse instead of a blessing to their people. Well, what treason in all this, and a great deal more? Nothing but a Jesuit's enchanted telescope could have found any in it. If there were any mistakes, as he says in his speech, they ought to have been confuted by law, reason, and scripture, not scaffolds and axes. First, It was not proved to be his writing, nor did he confess it; treason and life are critical things: one ought to be as fairly proved, as the other to be cautiously proceeded against. Though he might write it, he had the liberty of an Englishman, not to accuse himself: the very same thing which was afterwards put in practice by those reverend persons, who, later than he, and cheaper too, defended their country's liberty with only the loss of their own. But owning he wrote it, how very few, if any things therein, are not now generally and almost universally believed, and are the foundation of the practice, and satisfaction of the conscience of every man, though then confuted with the single brand of commonwealth principles, being indeed such as all the world must, whether they will or no, be forced into the belief of, as soon as oppression and tyranny bears hard upon them, and becomes really unsupportable? But supposing they were now as wicked principles as they were called then; yet what was that to the then present governors? He answered Filmer for his own satisfaction, or rather began to do it, many years before the makers of this plot dreamed of that, or bringing him into it; kept it private in his own study, where it might have lain till doom's-day, had not they fetched it out to make somewhat of it. It was suggested, and innuendocd, that this book was written to scatter among the people, in order to dispose them to rebel, as it is in the indictment. But how ridiculous that is, any one will see who considers the bulk of it, which was such, that, as he says in his speech, the fiftieth part of the book was not produced, nor the tenth of that read, though he desired it, and it was usual; and yet after all, as it had never been shewn to any man, so it was not finished, nor could be in many years. Now is this a business likely to be calculated for a rebellion; when it could neither be finished till several years after it was over; and besides, if it had, the bulk made it so improper to be dispersed for that purpose for which it was pretendedly designed? No, those who are to poison a nation in that manner, know better things, and more likely ways. It is to be done in little pamphlets, and papers easily read over, understood, and remembered, as the declaration gentlemen the other day very well knew. But still here being not a syllable in these papers of king Charles, any more than of the king of Bantam, or the great mogul, against whom they might as well have made it treason; it was all supplied by a fine knack, called the innuendo, that is in English, such interpretation as they would please to affix on his words. Thus when he writes Tarquin, or Pepin, or Nero, they say, he meant king Charles; and so, scandalously of him, as well as wickedly of the gentleman, make a monster and a ravisher of their king, and then take away another's life for doing it. There was a minister I have somewhere read of, who was accused for writing a libel against queen Elizabeth, and her government; and the fact there, it is true, lay, as this does upon innuendoes, though much more plain and pregnant. But all the punishment inflicted on him, though thought severe enough, reached not his head, the loss of his hand being deemed sufficient, while with that which was left, he pulled off his hat, and prayed God to bless the queen. But this was under a truly protestant government and a mild reign.

Such was my lord Howard's evidence, that had the jury been any but such as they were, and Sidney describes them, they would not have hanged a Jesuit upon the credit of it; he having, one would think, that read the trials, taken a pride in damning himself deeper and deeper against every new appearance in public, on purpose to try the skill and face of the counsel in bringing him off again. To the evidence brought against him in my lord Ruffel's case, he had taken care to add the following:

First, the earl of Clare witnesses, that he said, after Sidney's imprisonment, if questioned again, he would never plead (had it not been a pleasant thing for my lord Howard to have been pressed to death for not speaking?) and that he thought colonel Sidney as innocent as any man breathing: Mr. Ducas says the same, so does my lord Paget, Mr. Edward, Philip Howard, Tracy, Penwick, and Mr. Blake; that he said he had not his pardon, and could not ascribe it to any reason, but that he must not have it till the drudgery of swearing was completed.

Now, though there was no reasonable answer could be given to all this; though Sidney pleaded the obligations my lord Howard had to him, and the great conveniency he might think there might be in his being hanged, since he was some hundreds of pounds in his debt, which would be the readiest way of paying him; and had besides, as it appeared, a great mind to have the colonel's plate secured at his own house; though never man in the world certainly ever talked stronger sense, or better reason, or more evidently battered the judges, and left them nothing but railing; yet it was all a case with him, as well as the others; and the petty jury could as easily have found him guilty, without hearing his trial, as the grand jury did, as soon as ever they saw the bill. Never was any thing more base and barbarous, than the summing up the evidence and directions to the jury, who yet stood in no great need of them: nor more uncivil and saucy a reflection on the noble family and name of the Sidneys, than the judge's saying that he was born a traitor. Never any thing braver, or more manly, than his remonstrance to the king for justice, and another trial: nor, lastly, more Roman, and yet truly Christian than his end. The brave old man came upon a scaffold, as unconcerned as if he had been going to fight, and as lively as if he had been a Ruffel. In his last speech he gives almost all the substance of all those books which were lately written in the defence of the late transactions, and no disgrace to them neither; since truth and reason are eternal, and one and the same from all pens and parties, and at all times; however there may be some times so bad, that they will not bear some reason, any more than some doctrine. He there says as much in a little as ever man did: That magistrates were set up for the good of nations, not to the contrary. If that be treason, King Charles I. is guilty of it against himself, who says the same thing, That the power of magistrates is what the laws of the country make it: that those laws and oaths have the force of a contract, and if one part is broken, the other ceases. And other maxims of the same necessity and usefulness. He, besides this, gave a full account of the design of his book, of his trial, and the injustice done him therein; of the juries being picked, and important points of law over-ruled; and ends with a most compendious prayer, in which he desires God would forgive his enemies, but keep them from doing any more mischief; and then he laid down his head in eternal repose.

The Petition of Col. ALGERNON SIDNEY to the King.

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty: the humble Petition of ALGERNON SIDNEY, Esq.

SHEWETH,

THAT your petitioner, after a long and close imprisonment, was on the seventh day of this month, with a guard of soldiers brought into the Palace-Yard, upon a Habeas Corpus directed to the lieutenant of the Tower, before any indictment had been exhibited against him: but while he was there detained, a bill was exhibited and found; whereupon he was immediately carried to the King's-Bench, and there arraigned. In this surprise he desired a copy of the indictment, and leave to make his exceptions, or to put in a special plea, and counsel to frame it; but all was denied him. He then offered a special plea ready engrossed, which also was rejected without reading: and being threatened, that if he did not immediately plead guilty or not guilty, judgment of high treason should be entered, he was forced, contrary to law (as he supposes) to come to a general issue in pleading not guilty.

November 21, he was brought to his trial, and the indictment being perplexed and confused, so that neither he nor any of his friends that heard it, could fully comprehend the scope of it, he was wholly unprovided of all the helps that the law allows to every man for his defence. Whereupon he did again desire a copy, and produced an authentic copy of the statute of 46 Ed. III. whereby it is enacted, That every man shall have a copy of any record that touches him in any manner, as well that which is for or against the king, as any other person; but could neither obtain a copy of his indictment, nor that the statute should be read.

The jury by which he was tried, was not (as he is informed) summoned by the bailiffs of the several hundreds, in the usual and legal manner; but names were agreed upon by Mr. Graham, and the under sheriff, and directions given to the bailiff to summon them: and being all so chosen, a copy of the panel was of no use to him. When they came to be called, he excepted against some for being your majesty's servants, which he hoped should not be returned, when he was prosecuted, at your majesty's suit; many more for not being freeholders, which exceptions, he thinks, were good in law; and others were lewd and infamous persons, not fit to be on any jury; but all was over-ruled by the lord chief justice, and your petitioner forced to challenge them peremptorily, whom he found to be picked out as most suitable to the intentions of those who sought his ruin; whereby he lost the benefit allowed him by law of making his exceptions, and was forced to admit of mechanic persons, utterly unable to judge of such a matter as was to be brought before them. This jury being sworn, no witness was produced who fixed any thing beyond hearsay upon your petitioner, except the lord Howard, and them that swore to some papers said to be found in his house, and offered as a second witness, and written in an hand like to that of your petitioner.

Your petitioner produced ten witnesses, most of them of eminent quality, the others of unblemished fame, to shew that lord Howard's testimony was inconsistent with what he had declared before (at the trial of the lord Ruffel) under the same religious obligation of an oath, as if it had been legally administered.

Your petitioner did further endeavour to shew, That besides the absurdity and incongruity of his testimony, he being guilty of many crimes which he did not pretend your petitioner had any knowledge of, and having no other hope of pardon, than by the drudgery of swearing against him, he deserved not to be believed. And similitude of hands could be no evidence, as was declared by the lord chief justice Keiling, and the whole court, in the lady Carr's case; so that no evidence at all remained against him.

That whosoever wrote those papers, they were but a small part of a polemical discourse in answer to a book written about thirty years ago, upon general propositions, applied to no time, nor any particular case; that it was impossible to judge of any part of it, unless the whole did appear, which did not; that the sense of such parts of it as were produced, could not be comprehended, unless the whole had been read, which was denied; that the ink and paper sheweth them to be written many years ago; that the lord Howard not knowing of them, they could have no concurrence with what your petitioner is said to have designed with him and others; that the confusion and errors in the writing shewed they had never been so much as reviewed, and being written in a hand that no man could well read, they were not fit for the press, nor could be in some years, though the writer had intended it, which did not appear. But they being only the present crude and private thoughts of a man, for the exercise of his own understanding in his studies, and never shewed to any, or applied to any particular case, could not fall under the statute of 25 Edw. III. which takes cognizance of no such matter, and could not by construction be brought under it; such matters being thereby reserved to the parliament, as is declared in the proviso, which he desired might be read, but was refused.

Several important points of law did hereupon emerge, upon which your petitioner, knowing his own weakness, did desire that counsel might be heard, or they might be referred to be found specially. But all was over-ruled by the violence of the lord chief justice, and your petitioner so frequently interrupted, that the whole method of his defence was broken, and he not suffered to say the tenth part of what he could have alleged in his defence. So the jury was hurried into a verdict they did not understand.

Now, forasmuch as no man that is oppressed in England, can have relief, unless it be from your majesty, your petitioner humbly prays, that the premises considered, dered, your majesty would be pleased to admit him into your presence; and if he doth not shew, that it is for your majesty's interest and honour to preserve him from the said oppression, he will not complain though he be left to be destroyed.

HAVING first excused his not speaking, as well because it was an age that made truth pals for treason, for the truth of which, he instances his trial and condemnation, and that the ears of some present were too tender to hear it, as because of the rigour of the season, and his infirmities, &c. then after a short reflection upon the little said against him by other witnesses, and the little value that was to be put on the lord Howard's testimony, whom he charges with an infamous life, and many palpable perjuries, and to be biased only by the promise of pardon, &c. and makes, even though he had been liable to no exceptions, to have been but a single witness; he proceeds to answer the charge against him from the writings found in his closet by the king's officers, which were pretended, but not lawfully evidenced to be his; and pretends to prove, that had they been his, they contained no condemnable matter, but principles, more safe both to princes and people too, than the pretended high-flown plea for absolute monarchy, composed by Filmer, against which they seemed to be levelled; and which, he says, all intelligent men thought, were founded on wicked principles, and such as were destructive, both to magistrates, and people too. Which he attempts to make out after this manner.

First, says he, if Filmer might publish to the world, that men were born under a necessary indispensable subjection to an absolute king, who could be restrained by no oath, &c. whether he came to it by creation, inheritance, &c. nay, or even by usurpation; why might he not publish his opinion to the contrary, without the breach of any known law? Which opinion, he professes, consisted in the following particulars.

1. That God hath left nations at the liberty of modelling their own governments.
2. That magistrates were instituted for nations, and not à contra.
3. That the right and power of magistrates was fixed by the standing laws of each country.
4. That those laws sworn to on both sides, were the matter of a contract between the magistrates and people, and could not be broken without the danger of dissolving the whole government.
5. That usurpation could give no right; and that kings had no greater enemies than those who asserted that, or were for stretching their power beyond its limits.
6. That such usurpations commonly effecting the slaughter of the reigning person, &c. the worst of crimes was thereby most gloriously rewarded.
7. That such doctrines are more proper to stir up men to destroy princes, than all the passions that ever yet swayed the worst of them, and that no prince could be safe, if his murderers may hope such rewards; and that few men would be so gentle as to spare the best kings, if by their destruction a wild usurper could become God's anointed, which he says was the scope of that whole treatise, and asserts to be the doctrine of the best authors of all nations, times, and religions, and of the scripture, and so owned by the best and wisest princes, and particularly by Louis XIV. of France, in his declaration against Spain, anno 1667, and by King James, of England, in his speech to the parliament, 1603; and adds, that if the writer had been mistaken, he should have been fairly refuted, but that no man was ever otherwise punished for such matters, or any such things referred to a jury, &c. That the book was never finished, &c. nor ever seen by them whom he was charged to have endeavoured by it to draw into a conspiracy: that nothing in it was particularly or maliciously applied to time, place, or person, but distorted to such a sense by innuendoes, as the discourses of the expulsion of Tarquin, &c. and particularly of the translation made of the crown of France from one race to another, had been then applied by the then lawyers' innuendoes, to the then king of England; never considering, adds he, that if such acts of state be not allowed good, no prince in the world has any title to his crown, and having by a short reflection shewn the ridiculousness of deriving absolute monarchy, from patriarchal power, he appeals to all the world, whether it would not be more advantageous to all kings, to own the derivation of their power to the consent of willing nations, than to have no better title than force, &c. which may be over-powered.

Notwithstanding the innocence and loyalty of that doctrine, he says, He was told he must die, or the plot must die; and complains, that in order to the destroying the best Protestants of England, the bench was filled with such as had been blemishes to the bar; and instances how, against law, they had advised with the king's counsel about bringing him to death, suffered a jury to be picked by the king's solicitors, and the under sheriff admitted non-freeholders jurymen, received evidence not valid; refused him a copy of his indictment, or to suffer the act of the 46th of Edw. III. to be read, that allows it hath over-ruled the most important points of law, without hearing, and assumed to themselves a power to make constructions of treason, though against law, sense, and reason, which by the statute of the 25th of Edw. III. by which they pretended to try him, was reserved only to the parliament; and so praying God, to forgive them, and to avert the evils that threatened the nation, to sanctify those sufferings to him, and though he fell a sacrifice to idols, not to suffer idolatry to be established in this land, &c. He concludes with a thanksgiving, That God had singled him out to be a witness of his truth, and for that good old cause, in which from his youth he had been engaged, &c. &c. &c.

THIS gentleman was by trade a merchant; but his greatest dealing lay in linen manufacture, which, as appears from his papers, he had brought to such a height here in England, as, had it met with suitable encouragement, would, as he made it appear, have employed 80,000 poor people, and 40,000 acres of land, and be 200,000l. a year advantage to the public revenues of the kingdom. The return of the Habeas Corpus writ calls him, late of London, merchant, though he lived mostly at Bristol. He seems to be a person of sense, courage, and vivacity of spirit, and a man of business. All we can have of him is from that public print, called his Narrative, concerning which it must be remembered, as before, that we have no very firm authority to assure us all therein contained was his own writing; and perhaps it might be thought convenient he should die, for fear he might contradict some things published in his name. But on the other side, where he contradicts the other witnesses, his evidence is strong, since surely that was not the interest of the managers to invent of their own accord; though some truth they might utter, though displeasing, to gain credit to the rest. Taking things however as we find them, it will be convenient for method's sake, to take notice first of the proceedings against him, then of some pretty plain footsteps of practice upon him, and shuffling dealing in his case; and lastly, of several things considerable in his history.

Mr. Holloway was accused for the plot, as one who was acquainted with West, Rumsey, and the rest; and having been really present at their meetings and discourses on that subject, absconded when the public news concerning the discovery came into the country; though this, as he tells the king, more for fear, that if he was taken up, his creditors would never let him come out of gaol, than any thing else. After some time he got to sea in a little vessel, vessel, went over to France, and so to the West-Indies, among the Caribbee-Islands, where much of his concern lay : but writing to his factor at Nevis, he was by him treacherously betrayed, and seized by the order of sir William Stapleton, and thence brought prisoner to England, where after examination, and a confession of at least all that he knew, having been outlawed in his absence on an indictment of treason, he was on the 21st of April 1684, brought to the King's-Bench, to shew cause why execution should not be awarded against him, as is usual in that case ; he opposed nothing against it, only saying, if an ingenuous confession of truth could merit the king's pardon, he hoped he had done it. The attorney being called for, ordered the indictment to be read, and gave him the offer of a trial, waving the outlawry, which he refused, and threw himself on the king's mercy ; on which execution was awarded, though the attorney, who had not so much law even as Jeffreys, was for having judgment first pass against him, which is never done in such cases, according to which he was executed at Tyburn April the 30th.

Strange it seemed to all men, that a man of so much spirit, as Mr. Holloway appeared to be, should so tamely die without making any manner of defence, when that liberty was granted him : it seemed as strange, or yet stranger, that any Protestant should have any thing that looked like mercy or favour from the persons then at the helm. That they should be so gracious to him as it is there called, to admit him to a trial, which looked so generously, and was so cried up ; the attorney calling it, A mercy and a grace ; and the lord chief justice saying, He could assure him it was a great mercy, and that it was exceeding well. Now all this blind or mystery will be easily unriddled, by two or three lines which Holloway speaks just after : My lord, says he, I cannot undertake to defend myself, for I have confessed before his majesty, that I am guilty of many things in that indictment. Which was immediately made use of as was designed ; good Mr. Justice Withens crying out full-mouthed, I hope every body here will take notice of his open confession, when he might try it if he would ; surely none but will believe this conspracy now, after what this man has owned. So there was an end of all the mercy. A man who had before confessed in order to be hanged, had gracious liberty given him to confess it again in public, because they knew he had precluded all manner of defence before, and this public action would both get them the repute of clemency, and confirm the belief of the plot. Now that there had been practice used with him, and promises of pardon, if he had taken this method, and own himself guilty without pleading, is more than probable, both from other practices of the same nature used towards greater men, and from some expressions of his which look exceeding fair that way. Thus in his paper left behind him, I had, says he, some other reasons why I did not plead, which at present I conceal, as also why I did not speak what I intended. Other reasons, besides his confession to his majesty, and reasons to be concealed. Now what should those be but threatenings and promises, to induce him to silence, and public acknowledgment of all ? Which appears yet plainer from another passage : I am satisfied that all means which could be thought on, have been used to get as much out of me as possible. If all means, then without straining, those observed before.

If though he made so fair and large an acknowledgment, here is more mystery still ; why was not his life spared ? Let any one read his confession and speech, or these passages observed out of them, and he will no longer wonder at it. He was a little squeasy-conscienced, and would not strain so far as others in accusing men of those black crimes whereof they were innocent ; nay, as was before said, vindicating them from those aspersions cast upon them, and for which some of them, particularly my lord Russel, suffered death. He says, The assassination was carried on but by three or four, and could never hear so much as the names of above five for it ; that he and others had declared their abhorrence of any such thing ; that Ferguson was not in it. And besides, speaks some things with the liberty of an Englishman ; shews the very root of all those heats which had been raised ; says what was true enough, That the protestant gentry had a notion of a devilish design of the Papists to cut off the king's friends, and stirring men in both the last parliaments ; that they long had witnesses to swear them out of their lives, but no juries to believe them ; that now the point about the sheriffs was gained, that difficulty was over ; that the king had bad council about him, who kept all things from his knowledge ; that if things continued thus, the protestant gentry resolved to get the king from his evil council, and then he would immediately be of their side, and suffer all popish offenders to be brought to justice. Hence it was plain, no assassination, no plot against the king and government intended ; only treason against the duke of York and the Papists, who were themselves traitors by law. But yet one bolder stroke than all this : he prays the king's eyes may be opened, to see his enemies from his friends, whom he had cause to look for nearer home. Was a man to expect pardon after this ? No certainly, which he soon grew sensible of, and prepared for death, the council, as he says, taking it very heinously that he should presume to write about such matters.

In respect to what sheriff Daniel urges, That what he said about the king were but glossy pretences ; he answers him very well, that it was far otherwise. Here was plain matter of fact : the kingdom in imminent danger, the fit just coming on, which hath since so nearly shaken to pieces the whole frame of church and state ; which has so many years been rising to this completeness : ordinary ways and usual remedies could not prevail ; these Protestants were forced to betake themselves to extraordinary efforts, in defence of the government and laws, and not against them, any more than it would have been to have taken arms, and rescued the king from a troop of banditti, who had got possession of his person ; the Papists who had him, being as visibly and notoriously obnoxious to the government, and as dead men in law, most of them, as public thieves and robbers. Thus much of Mr. Holloway, the popish tender mercy towards him, his confession, execution, &c.

Mr. Holloway declared, that Mr. West proposed the assassination, but none seconded him ; that he could not perceive that Mr. Ferguson knew any thing of it ; and Holloway said, It was our design to shed no blood ; he being interrogated, by Mr. Ferguson's friend, Mr. Sheriff Daniel, Whether he knew Ferguson ? He answered, That he did know him, but knew him to be against any design of killing his Majesty.

The MARTYRDOM of Sir THOMAS ARMSTRONG.

THE next object however had not so fair play, because they knew he would make better use of it. They had this lion in the toils, and did not intend to let him loose again to make sport, least the hunters themselves should come off ill by it. He had been all his life a firm servant and friend to the royal family, in their exile and afterwards : he had been in prison for them under Cromwell, and in danger both of execution and starving ; for all which they now rewarded him. He had a particular honour and devotion for the duke of Monmouth, and pushed on his interest on all occasions, being a man of as undaunted English courage, as ever our country produced. He was with the duke formerly in his actions in Flanders, and shared there in his danger and honour. His accusation was, his being concerned in the general plot, and that too of killing the king ; but he was indeed hanged for running away, and troubling them to send so far after him. The particulars pretended against him, were what the lord Howard witnessed in Russel's trial, of his going to kill the king when their first design failed. But this was there only a supposal, though advanced into a formed accusation, and aggravated by the attorney, as the reason why he had a trial denied him, when Holloway had one offered, both of them being alike outlawed. On which outlawry sir Thomas was kidnapped in Holland, and brought over hither in chains, and robbed robbed by the way into the bargain. Being brought up, and asked what he had to say, that sentence should not pass upon him, he pleaded the 6th of Ed. VI. wherein it is provided, That if a person outlawed render himself in a year after the outlawry pronounced, and traverse his indictment, and shall be acquitted on his trial, he shall be discharged of the outlawry. On which he accordingly then and there made a formal surrender of himself to the lord chief justice, and asked the benefit of the statute, and a fair trial for his life, the year not being yet expired. If ever any thing could appear plain to common sense, it was his case. The statute allows a twelve-month, the year was not out, he surrendered himself, demands the benefit of it; and all the answer he could get, was the positive lord chief justice's, We don't think so, and we are of another opinion. He could not have so much justice as to have counsel allowed to plead it, though the point sufficiently deserved it, and here was the life of an old servant of the king's concerned in it. When he still pleaded, That a little while before, one, meaning Holloway, had the benefit of a trial offered him, if he would accept it, and that was all he now wished for.

But the lord chief justice answered, That was only the grace and mercy of the king. The attorney added, The king did indulge Holloway so far as to offer him a trial, and his majesty perhaps might have had some reason for it: the very self-same reason, no doubt of it, which Holloway said he had for not pleading. But sir Thomas (the attorney went on) deserved no favour, because he was one of the persons that actually engaged to go, on the king's hasty coming from Newmarket, and destroy him by the way as he came to town; and that this appeared upon as full and clear an evidence, and as positively testified, as any thing could be, and this in the evidence given in of the late horrid conspiracy. Now I would fain know who gave this clear and full evidence in the discovery of the conspiracy? Howard's was mere supposition, and he was all who so much as mentioned a syllable of it, that ever could be found on search of all the papers and trials relating to that affair. To this sir Thomas answered in his speech, that had he come to his trial, he could have proved my lord Howard's base reflections on him to be notorious falsehood, there being at least ten gentlemen, besides all the servants in the house, would have testified where that very day he dined.

Sir Thomas still demanded the benefit of the law, and no more: to which Jeffreys answered, with one of his usual barbarous insults over the miserable, that he should have it by the grace of God; ordering, that execution be done on Friday next according to law. And added, that he should have the full benefit of the law: repeating the jest, lest it should be lost, as good as three times in one sentence. Though had not his lordship slipped out of the world so sily, he had had as much benefit the same way, and much more justly than sir Thomas.

The chief justice then proceeds, and tells him, we are satisfied that according to law we must award execution upon this outlawry: thereupon Mrs. Matthews, sir Thomas's daughter, said, My lord, I hope you will not murder my father: for which being brow beaten and checked, she added, God Almighty's judgments light upon you.

He was brought to the place of execution the Friday after. Dr. Tennison being with him, and on his desire, after he had given what he had to leave, in a paper, to the sheriff, prayed a little while with him. He then prayed by himself; and after having thanked the doctor for his great care and pains with him, submitted to the sentence, and died more composedly; and full as resolutely as he had lived. It is observable, that more cruelty was exercised on him than any who went before him, not only in the manner of his death, but the exposing his limbs and body; a fair warning what particular gratitude a Protestant is to expect for having obliged a true Roman-Catholic.

There is another thing worth remembering, in all other cases as well as this, though occasion is here taken to do it, is, that whereas in Holloway's case, Jeffreys observed, that not one of all concerned in this conspiracy had dared to deny it; and lower, to deny the truth of the fact absolutely: it is so far from being true, that every one who suffered, did it as absolutely as possible. They were tried or sentenced for conspiring against the king and government; that was their plot; but this they all deny, and absolutely too; and safely might do it: for they consulted for it, not conspired against it, resolving not to touch the king's person; nay, if possible, not to shed one drop of blood of any other, as Holloway and others say. For the king's life, sir Thomas says as the lord Russell, Never had any man the impudence to propose so base and barbarous a thing to him. Russell, and almost all besides, say, they had never any design against the government. Sir Thomas here says the same, as he never had any design against the king's life, nor the life of any man, so he never had any design to alter the government.

According as he lived, he says, he died a sincere Protestant, and in the communion of the church of England, though he heartily wished he had more strictly lived up to the religion he believed. And though he had but a short time, he found himself prepared for death; and indeed, as all his life shewed him a man of courage, so his death, and all the rest of his behaviour, did, a penitent man, a man of good sense, and a good Christian.

Sir Thomas Armstrong at the place of execution departed himself with courage becoming a great man, and with the seriousness and piety suitable to a very good Christian. Sheriff Daniel told him, he had leave to say what he pleased, and should not be interrupted, unless he upbraided the government; sir Thomas thereupon told him that he should not say any thing by way of speech; but delivered him a paper, which he said contained his mind; he then called for Dr. Tennison, who prayed with him, and then he prayed alone.

He thus expressed himself in his paper, that he thanked Almighty God he found himself prepared for death, his thoughts set upon another world, and weaned from this; yet he could not but give so much of his little time, as to answer some calumnies, and particularly what Mr. Attorney accused him of at the bar. Also that he prayed to be allowed a trial for his life according to the laws of the land, and urged the statute of Edward the Sixth, which was expressly for it; but it signified nothing, and he was with an extraordinary roughness condemned, and made a precedent; though Holloway had it offered him, and he could not but think all the world would conclude his case very different, else why refused to him. He added that Mr. Attorney charged him for being one of those that were to kill the king; he took God to witness, that he never had a thought to take away the king's life, and that no man ever had the impudence to propose so base and barbarous a thing to him; and that he never was in any design to alter the government. He then concluded with observing that if he had been tried, he could have proved the lord Howard's base reflections upon him, to be notoriously false; he concluded, that he had lived, and now died of the reformed religion, a Protestant in the communion of the church of England, and heartily wished he had lived more strictly up to the religion he believed: that he had found the great comfort of the love and mercy of God, in and through his blessed Redeemer, in whom he only trusted, and verily hoped that he was going to partake of that fulness of joy which is in his presence, the hopes whereof infinitely pleased him. He thanked God he had no repining, but cheerfully submitted to the punishment of his sins; he freely forgave all the world, even those concerned in taking away his life, though he could not but think his sentence very hard, he being denied the laws of his country.

The MARTYRDOM of ALDERMAN CORNISH before his own Door near Guildhall.

IN order to make an end of this plot altogether, it will be necessary once more to invert the order in which things happened, and though Mr. Cornish suffered not till

till after the judges returned from the West, as well as Bateman after him, yet we shall here treat of them both, and so conclude this business.

The alderman was seized in October 1685; and the Monday after his commitment, which was on Tuesday or Friday, arraigned for high treason, having no notice given him till Saturday noon. His charge was for conspiring to kill the king, and promising to assist the duke of Monmouth, &c. in their treasonable enterprises. He desired his trial might be deferred, because of his short time for preparation; and that he had a considerable witness an hundred and forty miles off, and that the king had left it to the judges, whether it should be put off or no. But it was denied him; the attorney telling him, He had not deserved so well of the government as to have his trial delayed. That was in plain English, because he had been a Protestant sheriff, he should not have justice done him.

Rumsey and Goodenough were the evidences against him. Rumsey swears, That when he was at the famous meeting at Mr. Shepherd's, Mr. Shepherd being called down, brought up Mr. Cornish; and when he was come in, Ferguson opened his bosom, and from under his stomacher pulled out a paper in the nature of a declaration of grievances, which Ferguson read, and Shepherd held the candle while it was reading; that Mr. Cornish liked it, and said, What interest he had, he would join with it; and that out of compassion he had not before accused Mr. Cornish.

Next Goodenough swears, That he talked with Cornish of the design of seizing the Tower. Mr. Cornish said, He would do what good he could, or to that purpose.

Mr. Gospright's evidence was opposed to Goodenough's, who testified Mr. Cornish opposed his being under-sheriff, saying, That he was an ill man, obnoxious to the government, and he would not trust an hair of his head with him. And is it then probable that he would have such discourses with him as would endanger head and all? Mr. Love, Jekil, and sir William Turner, witnesses to the same effect.

Now as to Rumsey's evidence, the perjury lies so full and staring, that it is impossible to look into the trial with half an eye without meeting it. Compare what he says on Russel's trial, and here, and this will be as visible as the sun. Being asked there, whether there was any discourse about a declaration, and how long he staid; he says, He was there about a quarter of an hour, and that he was not certain whether he had heard something about a declaration there, or whether he had heard Ferguson report afterwards, that they had then debated it. Now turn to Cornish's trial, he is there strangely recovered in his memory, and having had the advantage, either of recollection, or better instruction, remembers that distinctly in October 1685, which he could not in July 1683, he had been there a quarter of an hour; the time he states in the lord Russel's trial, but lengthens it out, and improves it now, to so long time as Mr. Shepherd's going down, bringing Cornish up, Ferguson's pulling out the declaration, and reading it, and that, as Shepherd says in Russel's trial, a long one too, as certainly it must be, if, as it was sworn, it contained all the grievances of the nation, and yet all this still in a quarter of an hour; thus contradicting himself both to time and subject.

He is of such villanous credit, that his evidence is scarce fit to be taken even against himself. Let us see then how Shepherd does point-blank contradict, and absolutely overthrow it in every particular, as expressly as it is possible to ruin any evidence. He says, at one meeting only Mr. Cornish was at his house to speak to one of the persons there; that then he himself came up stairs, and went out again with Mr. Cornish. That there was not one word read, nor any paper seen while Mr. Cornish was there, and this he was positive of, for Mr. Cornish was not one of the party.

Pray who should know best, Rumsey what Shepherd did, or he what he did himself? Could a man hold the candle while a declaration was read, as Rumsey swears Shepherd did, and yet know nothing of it, nay, protest the quite contrary? What sizes the consciences of his jury were, let any Christian, Turk, or Jew, be judge; and Providence has already visibly done it on the foreman of it, who came to an untimely end, being beaten to pieces by the fall of some timber at a fire in Thames-Street.

The chief thing pretended to support Rumsey's evidence, and hinder Shepherd's from saving the prisoner, was, that Shepherd strengthened Rumsey, and proved Cornish guilty of a lie. But if we inquire into the matter, we shall find one and the other equally true.

On his trial, Cornish is said to have denied his being at the meeting, and discoursing with the duke of Monmouth: which they would have us believe Shepherd swears he was, though not a syllable of it appears. He had been there several times, Shepherd says, but was not of their consult, knew nothing of their business, nor can he be positive whether it was the duke of Monmouth he came to speak to that evening. But supposing in two or three years time, and on so little recollection, Cornish's memory had slipped in that circumstance, what is that to Shepherd's evidence against the very root of Rumsey's, which hanged the prisoner?

He was found guilty in spite of all, and condemned, and even that Christian serenity of mind and countenance, wherewith it was visible he bore his sentence, the bench turned to his reproach.

Mr. Cornish continued in the same excellent temper whilst in Newgate, and gave the world a glaring instance of the happiness of such persons as live a pious life, when they come to make an end of it, let the way thereof be ever so violent. His carriage and behaviour at his leaving Newgate were as follow.

Approaching the press-yard, and seeing the halter in the officer's hand, he said, Is this for me? The officer answered, Yes; he replied, Blessed be God, and kissed it; and after said, O blessed be God for Newgate, I have enjoyed God ever since I came within these walls, and blessed be God who hath made me fit to die. I am now going to that God that will not be mocked, to that God that will not be imposed upon, to that God that knows the innocency of his poor creature. And a little after he said, Never did any poor creature come unto God with greater confidence in his mercy, and assurance of acceptance with him, through Jesus Christ; for there is no other way of coming to God but by him, to find acceptance with him: there is no other name given under heaven whereby we can be saved, but the name of Jesus. Then speaking to the officers, he said, Labour every one of you to be fit to die, for I tell you, you are not fit to die: I was not fit to die myself before I came hither; but oh! blessed be God, he hath made me fit to die, and hath made me willing to die! In a few moments I shall have the fruition of the blessed Jesus, and that not for a day, but for ever. I am going to the kingdom of God, where I shall enjoy the presence of God the Father, and of God the Son, and of God the Holy Spirit, and of all the holy angels: I am going to the general assembly of the first-born, and of the spirits of just men made perfect: O that God should ever do so much for me! O that God should concern himself so much for poor creatures, for their salvation, blessed be his name! for this was the design of God from all eternity, to give his only Son to die for poor miserable sinners. Then the officers going to tie his hands, he said, What, must I be tied then? Well, a brown thread might have served the turn; you need not tie me at all, I shall not stir from you, for thank God I am not afraid to die. As he was going out, he said, Farewell, Newgate: farewell all my fellow prisoners here; the Lord comfort you, the Lord be with you all.

So much for his behaviour in the way to his martyrdom. The place of it was most spitefully and ignominiously ordered, almost before his own door, and near Guildhall, to scare any good citizen from appearing vigorously in the discharge of his duty for his country's service, by his example. If any thing was wanting in his trial, from the haste of it, for the clearing his innocence, he sufficiently made it up in solemn affirmations thereof on the scaffold: God is my witness, said he, the crimes laid to my charge were falsely and maliciously sworn against me by the witnesses; for I never was at any consult or meeting where matters against the government were discoursed of. He adds, I never heard or read any declaration tending that way. Again, as for the crimes for which I suffer, upon the words of a dying man, I am altogether innocent. Lower he adds, he died as he had lived, in the communion of the church of England, in whose ordinances he had been often a partaker, and now felt the blessed effects thereof in these his last sufferings.

Mr. Cornish was observed by those who stood near the sledge, to have solemnly, several times, averred his absolute innocence of any design against the government, and particularly that for which he died.

There were some persons, sufficiently known, who were present at, and expressed a great deal of barbarous joy at his death: though some of them then were so confounded with his constancy and cheerful bravery, as wickedly to report, that he was drunk or mad when he died.

His quarters were set up on Guildhall, in terrorem, and for the same reason, no doubt, before mentioned, for which he was executed so near it.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. CHARLES BATEMAN.

MR. Bateman, the surgeon, a man of good sense, good courage, and good company, and a very large and generous temper, of considerable repute and practice in his calling, was the next and last. He was a great lover and vindicator of the liberties of the city and kingdom, and of more interest than most of his station.

He was sworn against by Rouse, Lee, and Richard Goodenough, upon the old stories of seizing the Tower, city, and Savoy. We had had a much better defence, had he himself been able to have made it: but being kept close prisoner in Newgate, the windows and rooms all dark, and little or no company, he being a free jolly man, and used formerly to conversation and diversion, soon grew deeply melancholy; and when he came on his trial, appeared little less than perfectly distracted; on which the court very kindly gave his son liberty to make his defence; the first instance to be sure of that nature; since he himself might probably, had he been in his senses, have remembered and pleaded many things more, which would have invalidated their evidence against him. But had not the mistaken piety of his son undertook his defence, certainly they could never have been such cannibals to have tried one in his condition. Yet could but what he brought for him, been allowed its weight and justice, he had escaped well enough. For as for Lee, one Baker witnessed, He had been practised upon by him in the year 1683, and would have had him insinuate into Bateman's company, and discourse about state affairs to trepan him, by which means he should be made a great man. It was urged besides, that there were three years between the fact pretended, and Lee's prosecution of him, which, though they had but one witness, could not have brought him to punishment, which would have been judged sufficient by any, but those who would be content with nothing but blood. For Goodenough, he was but one witness, and pardoned only so far, as to qualify him to do mischief. However he was found guilty; and just before his execution very much recovered himself, dying as much like a Christian, and with as great a presence of mind as most of the others.

A FULL ACCOUNT of the SUFFERINGS and MISERIES of Dr. OATES.

IT is now necessary for the thread of our history, to resume a subject, which, it is not doubted, will be ungrateful enough to some persons; and that is, the popish-plot; the belief of which, by the indefatigable industry of that party, and the weekly pains of their observator, and especially this last pretended plot against the government, was now almost entirely obliterated out of the minds of the less thinking part of the nation. To accomplish which more fully, it was thought necessary by the managers, either quite to take off, or expose to miseries and disgraces worse than death, all those few persons who remained honest and firm to their first evidence: the generality of the world judging by outward appearance, and thinking it impossible but that one who stood in the pillory, and was whipped at the cart's tail, must be a perjured rogue without more ado. Mr. Bedloe was dead, and his testimony therefore would be easier forgotten; though at his last breath after the sacrament, he solemnly and juridically confirmed every word of it before one of the judges, who was happily in Bristol at the time of his death. Most of the under-evidences in the plot were threatened, or promised, or brought off from what they had witnessed, or forced to leave the land for the securing their persons. None remains now besides Oates and Dangerfield, with whom all means possible, fair and foul, had been used, to make them turn villains, and deny their evidence; but to their eternal praise, they still continued firm to their first testimony, to the rage and confusion of their enemies. They therefore went first to work with the doctor; and it will be worth while to consider the reason of his first prosecution, by which men that are not very much prejudiced, may see the reason and justice of those which follow, and it was for scandalizing the duke of York with that notorious truth, that he was reconciled to the church of Rome, adding, what every man knows, that it was high treason so to be. Would but the doctor's greatest and most passionate enemies reflect on this beginning of his sorrows, as well as calmly examine all that is to come, they must form a juster judgment of his person and actions, than what seems too deeply fixed in them, ever to be rooted out; for which he was adjudged to pay that reasonable little fine of 100,000l. which, till he paid, he was committed to the King's Bench, though there was no great haste for his doing it.

Thus having him in prison, they resolved to strike at the root with him, and therefore after new fruitless attempts to make him quit and revoke his evidence, they made the last effort on his constancy and honesty; and indeed life itself, indicting him on the 8th and 9th of May 1685, for perjury in some branches of his evidence, given in some of it, almost seven years before. His first accusation was, for swearing in Ireland's trial, he himself was here in London, whereas it was pretended he was at that very time at St. Omer's. The second, that Ireland was at that time in town, when they would have it believed he was in Staffordshire.

All the evidence for the first were lads of St. Omer's, who, though they blundered ill-favouredly in former attempts the same way, and were accordingly told so by the court on other trials, were now grown expert in the business, being all of a religion that makes perjury meritorious; all youths and boys, and under such a discipline as obliges them to obey their superiors, without any reserve, or questioning the reason or justice of the thing; all, or most of them afterwards, rewarded with places of trust and profit under king James, as, no doubt, promised them before for their good service. They all swore point-blank, that Oates was at St. Omer's, when he swears he was here at the consult. Not one of these witnesses who had not been bred at St. Omer's, and but one who pretended to be a Protestant. For the second indictment, of Ireland's not being in town in August, as Oates had sworn him; they brought several witnesses to prove it, and that he was at that time in Staffordshire; most, if not all of which were stout Roman-Catholics.

Now in answer to these, let us first be persuaded fairly to consider what may be said in his defence, and most part of his vindication is over: and first, these were most, or all of them, the self-same witnesses, who in the successive trials, Whitebread's, Harcourt's, &c. and Mr. Langhorn's, could not find credit; and who had several witnesses who swore point-blank contrary to what they affirmed, some of whom were dead before this last trial. Let us then consider what defence Oates made for himself, self, which in spite of his own and Jeffreys's passions, seems strenuous and incontrovertible.

The doctor had in the former trials produced no less than eight persons who swore positively to his being in town at that very time, when the Jesuits and their youngsters would so fain have had him been out of it, whose names were Mr. Walker, an ancient minister of the church of England, Sarah Ives, Mrs. Mayo, sir Richard Barker, Mr. Page, Mr. Butler, William Smith, and Mr. Clay, a Romish priest, four of which, Mayo, Butler, Page, and Walker, he now produced again at his trial; the two first of whom positively swore the same they did before: the minister was too old to remember, and the last too fearful positively to affirm what they had done before.

Now as to the second indictment, a crowd of witnesses, such as they were, came to testify Ireland was in Staffordshire when Oates swore he was in London.

He had formerly answered to this same objection, and proved by the oaths of Mr. Bedloe, and Sarah Pain, and afterwards of Mr. Jennison, that Ireland was in town, when others witness he was in the country. But now at his trial, Bedloe and Pain being dead, and Jennison fled into Holland, he was absolutely incapacitated of making any defence that way; and so was found guilty of both indictments.

Truly the judgment against him was just as merciful as could be expected from Papists, acting by a Jeffreys, part of which was, to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate on Wednesday, and on the Friday following from Newgate to Tyburn, and stand in the pillory five times a year, and be prisoner during life. Which he bore with a great deal of strength and courage; though had not Providence provided him a body and soul, made, one would think on purpose for it, it would have killed him, if he had had the strength of twenty men. He had in all above 2000 lashes, as some that were by reckoned them up; such a thing as was never inflicted by any Jew, Turk, or Heathen, but Jeffreys; nay, the merciful Jews thought one less than God Almighty had appointed sufficient, and never gave but 39 at a time; all St. Paul's three times not coming near the third part of the doctor's. Had they hanged him, they had been merciful; had they lead him alive, it is a question whether it had been so much torture. How good and merciful those persons, who will vindicate this worse than barbarous and inhuman action, are, let the world and future ages be judges; in the mean while we will safely defy all history to shew one parallel of it either on man or dog, from the creation of the world to this time.

Indeed there needs no more aggravation of it, or urging what is plain enough, that the thus dealing with him, even supposing his crime as great as they would have it, was yet the highest affront and indignity even to humanity itself. It will, besides this, be an unanswerable observation; that it had been impossible for a man to have held out the second whipping, after the first was over, while the wounds were fresh about him, and every new stroke more than a double torment, either to have undergone this without confession, or dropping down dead with extremity of pain, had he not both had truth on his side, and also a more than common support and assistance from him who saw his innocence. This whipping of his being the greatest confirmation to his evidence that was possible.

Now after his return to prison, after all this usage, yet if possible, more barbarous, tearing off the plasters from his wounds, crushing him with irons, thrusting him into holes and dungeons, and endeavouring to render him as infamous to the nation, and all the world, as Cain or Judas; he bore up against all this, and more, with so strange and almost miraculous a patience, that during his four years imprisonment, he was never once heard to sigh, or manifest any impatience under his condition. He refused all the offers of the Jesuits, who even after this had the impudence to propose to him his recanting his evidence. He had still a strong belief that he should see better times, and get his freedom again, which he had in that general gaol delivery, granted all England, by the then prince of Orange's heroic undertaking. Since that, he has presented his case and petition to the parliament; to the House of Commons, as well as the House of Lords; and though the honourable House of Lords were offended at what they judged a slight of their jurisdiction, in his addressing to the House of Commons, while his cause lay before them, and expressed their resentment thereof accordingly; the commons have since that taken his case into consideration, and, as well as four succeeding parliaments before them, owned his cause, and censured severely the proceedings of Jeffreys against him.

The SUFFERINGS of Mr. JOHNSON about the same Time.

ABOUT the same time, the pious, reverend, and learned Mr. Johnson met with much the same usage. His great crimes were, being my lord Ruffel's chaplain, writing the famous Julian the apostate, and endeavouring to persuade the nation, not to let themselves be made slaves and Papists, when so many others were doing their part to bring them to it. And it is a question whether any man in the world, besides his friend the reverend Dr. Burnet, did more service with his pen, or more conduced to our great and happy revolution, both among the army, and in other places. For some of these good services, he was accused, imprisoned, tried, and condemned to be divested of his canonical habit, and be whipped as far as Oates was before him; which was performed, and which he underwent, as he did, with courage and constancy above a man, and like a Christian and a martyr. He remained ever after in the King's Bench, till delivered by the prince's arrival.

The SUFFERINGS and MARTYRDOM of Mr. DANGERFIELD, who was cruelly assassinated.

MR. Dangerfield's father was a gentleman, who lived in good fashion at Waltham-Abbey, or thereabouts; had been a great sufferer for king Charles I. and charged this his son on his death-bed, after his discovery of the plot, never to have any hand in any thing against the government; which he promised, and faithfully observed. He was a man of business and courage, and therefore employed by the Papists, while among them, in their desperate and most dangerous concerns. He was then of a religion that excused and encouraged the worst things he or any other man could be guilty of. The great thing which brought him on the stage, was Mrs. Celier's business, called the Meal-Tub plot. The Papists had designed to kill two birds with one stone, divert the laws and people from themselves, and ruin their enemies; for which end they had amongst them made a plot to bring in the best men, and patriots of the kingdom into a pretended design against the king and government, by a kind of an association, like that which afterwards took better effect. And for this transaction Mr. Dangerfield was made choice of, a list of their names, with the design, being by him, according to order, conveyed into one colonel Mansel's chamber. But he was discovered, and seized in the design, and acknowledged all the intrigue, giving so clear an account of it, that they had never to this very day the impudence to pretend any contradiction, or trip in his evidence, nor any other way but flat denial. But there was somewhat yet deeper in the case, which he afterwards revealed in his depositions before the parliament, that he was employed by the same party to kill the king, and encouraged and promised impunity and reward, and part of it given him by a great person for that purpose.

While the stream ran violently for Popery, he went over, for security, into Flanders, but continued not long there; and returning back, he was some time after seized, and carried before the council, where, before the king himself, persisting to a tittle, in all his former evidence, he was committed to Newgate; and after having lain there for some time, petitioned for a trial, which they could not do upon any account but Scandalum Magnatum, and that in a matter which lay only before the parliament to whom he had revealed it. Yet for that he was tried, and found guilty, as William Williams the speaker afterwards for licensing his narrative, by order of parliament. He was to undergo the same whipping Oates and Johnson did. Before he went out, he had strong bodings of his death, and chose the following text for his funeral sermon, "There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary are at rest;" saying, he was confident they had such a particular malice against him, he should never return alive: confirmed the truth of all his former evidence, and took a last farewell of his friends. After the sentence was executed on him, in his return home, one Francis stabbed him in the eye with a sort of a tuck in the end of his cane, which touching his brain, he was hardly ever sensible after, but died of the wound in a few hours, not without great suspicion of poison, his body being swelled and black, and full of great blains all over. The murderer fled, but was pursued by the rabble, who had torn him to pieces, had not the officers rescued him. He defended and justified the fact whilst in Newgate, saying, he had the greatest men in the kingdom to stand by him; to whom, after his trial, and being found guilty upon clear evidence, great applications were made, which had been successful for his pardon, had not Jeffreys himself gone to Whitehall, and told the king, he must die, for the rabble were now thoroughly heated. Attempts were made to bribe Mr. Dangerfield's wife, that she might consent to the pardon of her husband's murderer; but she too well deserved to be related to him, to sell his blood; and had an appeal ready against him, had he been pardoned. So the poor state martyr was hanged, as Coleman was before him. Mr. Dangerfield's body was conveyed to Waltham-Abbey, with several coaches attending him, and there handsomely interred.

The SUFFERINGS of Mr. NOISE.

OF the several gentlemen who suffered innocently for Lee's plot, Mr. Noise was one, though omitted in due place, who though he lost not his life immediately by it, was yet put to such extremities, as both injured his reason, and ruined his fortune. He was born of a good family not far from Reading in Berkshire; and being a younger son, was bound apprentice to a linen draper in London. In which capacity he was a great promoter of the apprentices' address, intended to be presented to the king for redress of grievances, and further prosecution of the popish plot. A crime, which those concerned could never pardon, and which was now looked on, both by himself, and all his friends, as the cause of these calamities.

The witness Lee swore against him that he was concerned in this plot, which he absolutely denying, though no other witness came in against him, and he was never brought to a trial, he underwent a tedious and severe imprisonment, loaded with irons, and kept from his friends, so long till his trade was ruined before he was set free, and he himself then rendered so unfit for business, that he was forced entirely to leave it off, and betake himself to travel: where, never quite recovering himself, he in a little time after fell sick and departed this life.

The MARTYRDOM of Messrs. BENJAMIN and WILLIAM HEWLING, at Taunton and Lyme.

WHOEVER wish to see true pure popish mercy, let them look on these two gentlemen, the only sons of their virtuous and sorrowful parents; the comforts, props, and hopes of their name and family, carefully educated, virtuously disposed both of them; after all repeated applications, if but for one of their lives, barbarously executed. A particular care was taken by their father in their education, forming their minds by his own example, and constant instructions and prayers, as well as other pains of ingenious masters, to the strictest rules of piety and virtue. Nor was their pious and very tender mother less careful in that instance.

Mr. Benjamin Hewling the elder had tutors in the mathematics, and other parts of philosophy; a course of which he went through successfully enough, and so as to render him as complete in his mind, as nature had formed his body: after which he went to Holland, as did his brother, Mr. William Hewling, from whence this last returned with the duke: both of them had commands in the army; the elder had a troop of horse, the younger was a lieutenant of foot; they discharged their places with much more conduct and bravery than could be expected from such young soldiers, being entirely satisfied in the cause they fought for, since it was no less than the interest of all that was dear to them in this world or the other. The eldest had particularly signalized himself in several skirmishes, and was sent with a detachment of his own troops, and two more, to Minehead in Somersetshire, to bring cannon to the army, at the very instant the duke engaged the king's forces at fatal Sedgemoor, and came not up till after the field was entirely lost; to whose absence, with so considerable a party of the duke's horse, and the most resolved men of all he had, the loss of the day was principally owing. Finding all things in disorder, and the rout beyond recovering, he was forced to disperse his troops, every one shifting as they could for themselves. He and his brother kept together, where, what befell them after, their friends have given an exact account, and which is here accordingly inserted.

A particular Account of the Behaviour of Messrs. WILLIAM and BENJAMIN HEWLING, before and at their Execution, as communicated by their Friends.

THE gracious dealings of God, manifested to some in dying hours, have been of great advantage to those living that heard the same, giving them an occasion thereby to reflect on their own state, and to look after the things of their peace, before they be hid from their eyes; as also a great encouragement to strengthen the faith of those that have experienced the grace of God to them.

"To that end, it is thought necessary, by parents especially, to preserve to their children that remain, those blessed experiences that such have had, which God hath taken to himself.

"Here therefore is presented a true account of the admirable appearances of God towards two young men; Mr. Benjamin Hewling, who died when he was about 22 years of age, and Mr. William Hewling, who died before he arrived to 20 years: they engaged with the duke of Monmouth, as their own words were, for the English liberties, and the Protestant religion, and for which Mr. William Hewling was executed at Lyme the 12th of September 1685; and Mr. Benjamin Hewling at Taunton, the 30th of the same month; and however severe men were to them, yet the blessed dispensation of God towards them was such, as hath made good his word, that out of the mouths of babes he hath ordained strength, that he may still the enemy and the avenger. Then, reader, would you see earthly angels, (men that are a little too low for heaven, and much too high for earth) would you see poor frail creatures trampling this world under their feet, and with an holy, serene countenance smiling at the threats of tyrants, who are the terrors of the mighty in the land of the living? Would you see shackled prisoners behave themselves like judges, and judges stand like prisoners before them? Would you see some of the rare exploits of faith in it's highest elevation, immediately before it be swallowed up in the beatifical vision? To conclude, would you see the heavenly Jerusalem portraited on earth? Would you hear the melodious voice of ascending saints in a ravishing concert ready to join with the heavenly chorus in their delightful hallelujahs? Then draw near, come and see!

If thou be a man of an heavenly spirit, here is pleasant and suitable entertainment for thee; and after thou hast conversed a while with these excellent spirits, it may be thou wilt judge as I do, that dead saints are sweeter companions (in some respects) for thee to converse with, than those that are living: and when thou shalt see the magnificent acts of their faith, their invincible patience, their flaming love to Christ, their strange contempt and undervaluings of the world, their plainness and simplicity in the profession of the gospel, their fervent and brotherly-love to each other, their ravishing prospect (as it were on the top of mount Pisgah) of the heavenly Canaan, their swan-like songs and dying speeches. And reader, you know the first lisps of little children, and last farewells of dying saints are always most sweet and charming: those fore-tastes of the river of pleasure, the transporting glimpses they had of the crown of glory; I say, when you see and read these exemplary truths, wonder not that the pious Hewlings longed so vehemently to be in a better world, though they were to pass through a thousand deaths, or the fiery trial to it.

"After the dispersing of the duke's army, they fled and put to sea, but were driven back again, and with the hazard of their lives got on shore, over dangerous rocks; where they saw the country filled with soldiers, and they being unwilling to fall into the hands of the rabble, and no way of defence or escape remaining to them, they surrendered themselves prisoners to a gentleman, whose house was near the place they landed at, and were from thence sent to Exeter gaol, the 12th of July, where remaining some time, their behaviour was such, that (being visited by many) caused great respect towards them, even of those that were enemies to the cause they engaged in; and being on the 27th of July put on board the Swan frigate, in order to their bringing up to London, their carriage was such, as obtained great kindness from the commander, and all other officers in the ship; and being brought into the river, captain Richardson came and took them into his custody, and carried them to Newgate, putting great irons about them, and put them apart from each other, without giving liberty for the nearest relation to see them, notwithstanding all endeavours and entreaties used to obtain it, though in the presence of a keeper; which though it did greatly increase the grief of their relations, God, who wisely orders all things for good to those he intends grace and mercy to, made this very restraint and hard usage a blessed advantage to their souls, as may appear by their own words, when after great importunity and charge, some of their near relations had leave to speak a few words to them before the keeper, to whom they replied, they were contented with the will of God, whatever it should be. Having been in Newgate three weeks, there was order given to carry them down into the west, in order to their trial; which being told them, they answered, they were glad of it; and that morning they went out of Newgate, several that beheld them, seeing them so cheerful, said, Surely they had received their pardon, else they could never carry it with that courage and cheerfulness. Although this must be observed, that from first to last, whatever hopes they received from friends, they still thought the contrary, never being much affected with the hopes of it, nor cast down, nor the least discouraged at the worst that man could do. In their journey to Dorchester, the keepers that went with them, said their carriage was so grave, serious, and christian-like, that it made them admire to see and hear what they did from such young men."

A near relation that went into the West, to see the issue of things, and to perform whatever should be necessary for them, gives also an account as follows:

"At Salisbury, the 30th of Aug. I had the first opportunity of conversing with them: I found them in a very excellent composure of mind, declaring their experience of the grace and goodness of God to them in all their sufferings, in supporting and strengthening, and providing for them, turning the hearts of all in whose hands they had been, both at Exon, and on ship-board, to shew pity and favour to them; although since they came to Newgate they were hardly used, and now on their journey loaded with heavy irons, and more inhumanly dealt with. They with great cheerfulness professed, that they were better, and in a more happy condition than ever in their lives, from the sense they had of the pardoning love of God in Jesus Christ to their souls, wholly referring themselves to their wise and gracious God to chuse for them life or death; expressing themselves thus: Any thing that pleases God, what he sees best, so be it: we know he is able to deliver, but if not, blessed be his name, death is not terrible now, but desirable. Mr. Benjamin Hewling particularly added, As for the world, there is nothing in it to make it worth while to live, except we may be serviceable to God therein. And afterwards said, Oh! God is a strong refuge, I have found him so indeed.

"The next opportunity I had was at Dorchester, where they both were carried, there remaining together four days: by reason of their strait confinement our conversation was much interrupted; but this appeared, that they had still the same presence and support from God, no way discouraged at the approach of their trial, nor of the event of it, whatever it should be.

"The 6th of September, Mr. Benjamin Hewling was ordered to Taunton to be tried there: taking my leave of him, he said, Oh! blessed be God for afflictions; I have found such happy effects, that I would not have been without them for all this world.

"I remained still at Dorchester to wait the issue of Mr. William Hewling, to whom, after trial, I had free access, whose discourse was much filled with admirings of the grace of God in Christ, that had been manifested towards him, in calling him out of his natural state. He said, God by his Holy Spirit did suddenly seize upon his heart, when he thought not of it in his retired mode in Holland, as it were secretly whispering in his heart, Seek ye my face, enabling him to answer his call, and to reflect upon his own soul, shewing him the evil of sin, and necessity of Christ, from that time carrying him on, to a sensible adherence to Christ for justification and eternal life. He said, hence he found a spring of joy and sweetness, beyond the comforts of the whole earth. He further said, he could not but admire the wonderful goodness of God, in so preparing him, for what he was bringing him to, which then he thought not of; giving him hope of eternal life, before he called him to look death in the face, so that he did cheerfully resign his life to God before he came, having sought his guidance in it; and that both then and now, the cause did appear to him very glorious, notwithstanding all he had suffered in it, or what he further might. Although for our sins God hath withheld these good things from us. But he said, God had carried on his blessed work in his soul, in and by all his sufferings; and whatever the will of God were, life or death, he knew it would be best for him.

"After he had received his sentence, when he returned to prison, he said, methinks I find my spiritual comforts increasing, ever since my sentence. There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, it is God that justifies, who shall condemn?

"When I came to him the next morning (when he had received news, that he must die the next day, and in order to it was to be carried to Lyme that day) I found him in a more excellent raised spiritual frame than before: he said, he was satisfied God had chosen best for him; he knows what the temptations of life might have been; I might have lived and forgotten God, but now I am going where I shall sin no more. Oh! it is a blessed thing to be free from sin, and to be with Christ. Oh! the riches of the love of God in Christ to sinners. Oh! how great were the sufferings of Christ for me beyond all I can undergo! How great is that glory to which I am going! It will soon swallow up all our sorrow here.

"When he was at dinner, just before his going to Lyme, he dropped many abrupt expressions of his inward joy, such as these: Oh! the grace of God, the love of Christ; oh! that blessed supper of the Lamb, to be for ever with the Lord! He further said, When I went to Holland, you knew not what snares, sins, and miseries I might fall into, or whether ever we should meet again: but now you know whither I am going, and that we shall certainly have a most joyful meeting.

"He said, pray give my particular recommendations to all my friends, with acknowledgements for all their kindness. I advise them all to make sure of an interest in Christ, for he is the only comfort when we come to die.

"One of the prisoners seemed to be troubled at the manner of the death they were to die; to whom he replied, I bless God I am reconciled to it all.

"Just as he was going to Lyme, he wrote these few lines to a friend, being hardly suffered to stay so long:

"To * * * * *

"I am going to launch into eternity, and I hope and trust into the arm of my blessed Redeemer, to whom I commit you and all my dear relations; my duty to my dear mother, and love to all my sisters, and the rest of my friends.

WILLIAM HEWLING."

"When they passed through the town of Dorchester to Lyme, multitudes of people beheld them, with great lamentations, admiring his deportment at his parting with his sister.

"When they passed upon the road between Lyme and Dorchester, his discourse was exceeding spiritual (as those declared who were present) taking occasion from every thing to speak of the glory they were going to. Looking out on the country as he passed, he said, This is a glorious creation, but what then is the paradise of God to which we are going? It is but a few hours, and we shall be there, and for ever with the Lord.

"At Lyme, just before they went to die, reading John xiv. 18, he said to one of his fellow-sufferers, Here is a sweet promise for us: I will not leave you comfortless, I will come unto you: Christ will be with us to the last. One taking leave of him, he said, Farewell till we meet in heaven; presently I shall be with Christ: Oh! I would not change conditions with any in this world; I would not stay behind for ten thousand worlds.

"To another that asked him how he did now, he said, Very well, he blessed God. And further asking him, if he could look death in the face with comfort now it approached so near? He said, Yes, I bless God I can with great comfort; God has made this a good night to me, my comforts are much increased since I left Dorchester: then taking leave of him, said, Farewell, I shall see you no more. To which he replied, How! see me no more? Yes, I hope to meet you in glory. To another that was by him to the last, he said, pray remember my dear love to my brother and sister, and tell them, I desire they would comfort themselves that I am gone to Christ, and we shall quickly meet in the glorious Mount Sion above.

"Afterwards he prayed for about three quarters of an hour with the greatest fervency, exceedingly blessing God for Jesus Christ, adoring the riches of his grace in him, in all the glorious fruits of it towards him, praying for the peace of the church of God, and of these nations in particular, all with such eminent assistance of the spirit of God, as convinced, astonished, and melted into pity the hearts of all present, even the most malicious adversaries, forcing tears and expressions from them; some saying, they knew not what would become of them after death; but it was evident he was going to great happiness.

"When he was just going out of the world, with a joyful countenance, he said, Oh! now my joy and comfort is, that I have a Christ to go to, and so sweetly resigned his spirit to Christ, the 12th of September 1685.

"An officer who had shewed so malicious a spirit as to call the prisoners devils, when he was guarding them down, was now so convinced, that he after told a person of quality, that he was never so affected, as by his cheerful carriage and fervent prayer, such, as he believed, was never heard, especially from one so young; and said, I believe, had the lord chief justice been there, he would not have let him die.

"The sheriff having given his body to be buried, although it was brought from the place of execution without any notice given, yet very many of the town, to the number of 200, came to accompany him; and several young women of the best of the town, laid him in his grave in Lyme church-yard, the thirteenth day of September 1685.

"When I came to Taunton, to Mr. Benjamin Hewling, he had received the news of his brother's being gone to die with so much comfort and joy, and afterwards of the continued goodness of God increasing it to the end. He expressed it to this effect, We have no cause to fear death, if the presence of God be with us; there is no evil in it, the sting being taken away; it is nothing but our ignorance of the glory that the saints pass into by death, which makes it appear dark for ourselves or relations; if in Christ, what is this world that we should desire an abode in it? It is all vain and unsatisfying, full of sin and misery: intimating also his own cheerful expectations soon to follow, discovering then, and all along, great seriousness, and sense of spiritual and eternal things, complaining of nothing in his present circumstances, but the want of a place of retirement to converse more uninterruptedly with God and his own soul, saying, That his lonely time in Newgate was the sweetest in his whole life. He said, God having some time before struck his heart (when he thought of the hazard of his life) to some serious sense of his past life, and the great consequences of death and eternity, shewing him, that they were the only happy persons that had secured their eternal states; the folly and madness of the ways of sin, and his own thralldom therein, with his utter inability to deliver himself; also the necessity of Christ for salvation: he said it was not without terror and amazement for some time, the sight of unpardoned sin, with eternity before him. But God wonderfully opened to him the riches of his free grace in Christ Jesus for poor sinners to flee to, enabling them to look alone to a crucified Christ for salvation: he said this blessed work was in some measure carried on upon his soul, under all his business and hurries in the army; but never sprung forth so fully and sweetly till his close confinement in Newgate. There he saw Christ and all spiritual objects more clearly, and embraced them more strongly; there he experienced the blessedness of a reconciled state, the excellency of the ways of holiness, the delightfulness of communion with God, which remained with very deep and apparent impressions on his soul, which he frequently expressed with admiration of the grace of God towards him. He said, Perhaps my friends may think this summer the saddest time of my life; but I bless God it hath been the sweetest and most happy of it all; nay, there is nothing else worth the name of happiness. I have in vain sought satisfaction from the things of this world, but I never found it; but now I have found rest for my soul in God alone.

"O how great is our blindness by nature, till God open our eyes, that we can see no excellency in spiritual things, but spend our precious time in pursuing shadows, and are deaf to all the invitations of grace, and glorious offers of the gospel! How just is God in depriving us of that we so much slighted and abused! Oh! his infinite patience and goodness, that after all he should yet sanctify any methods to bring a poor sinner to himself! Oh! electing love, distinguishing grace! what great cause have I to admire and adore it!

"He said, What an amazing consideration is the suffering of Christ for sin, to bring us to God; his suffering from wicked men was exceeding great: but alas, what was that to the dolours of his soul, under the infinite wrath of God? This mystery of grace and love is enough to swallow up our thoughts to all eternity.

"As to his own death, he would often say, He saw no reason to expect any other; I know God is infinitely able to deliver, and I am sure will do it, if it be for his glory, and my good; in which, I bless God, I am fully satisfied; it is all my desire that he would choose for me, and then I am sure it will be best, whatever it be; for truly, unless God have some work for me to do in the world for his his service and glory, I see nothing else to make life desirable: in the present state of affairs, there is nothing to cast our eyes upon, but sin, sorrow, and misery: and truly, were things ever so much according to our desires, it is but the world still, which will never be a resting place. Heaven is the only state of rest and happiness; there we shall be perfectly free from sin and temptation, and enjoy God without interruption for ever.

"Speaking of the disappointment of their expectations in the work they had undertaken, he said with reference to the glory of God, the prosperity of the gospel, and the delivery of the people of God, we have great cause to lament it; but for that outward prosperity that would have accompanied it, it is but of small moment in itself; as it could not satisfy, so neither could it be abiding; for at length death would have put an end to it all: also adding, nay, perhaps we might have been so foolish, as to have been taken with that part of it, to the neglect of our eternal concerns; and then, I am sure, our present circumstances are incomparably better.

"He frequently expressed great concern for the glory of God, and affection to his people, saying, If my death may advance the glory of God, and hasten the deliverance of his people, it is enough; saying, It was a great comfort to him, to think of so great a privilege as an interest in all their prayers.

"In his conversation, particularly valuing and delighting in those persons, where he saw most holiness shining; also great pity to the souls of others, saying, That the remembrance of our former vanity may well cause compassion to others in that state. And in his converse prompting others to seriousness, telling them, Death and eternity are such weighty concerns, that they deserve the utmost attention of our minds; for the way to receive death cheerfully, is to prepare for it seriously; and if God should please to spare our lives, surely we have the same reason to be serious, and spend our remaining days in his fear and service.

"He also took great care that the worship of God, which they were in a capacity of maintaining there, might be duly performed; as reading, praying, and singing of psalms, in which he evidently took great delight.

"For those three or four days before their deaths, when there was a general report that no more should die; he said, I do not know what God hath done beyond our expectation; if he doth prolong my life, I am sure it is all his own, and by his grace I will wholly devote it to him.

"But the 29th of September, about ten or eleven at night, we found the deceitfulness of this report, they being then told they must die the next morning, which was very unexpected, as to the suddenness of it; but herein God glorified his power, grace, and faithfulness, in giving suitable support and comfort by his blessed presence, which appeared upon my coming to him at that time, finding him greatly composed; he said, Though men design to surprise, God doth and will perform his word, to be a very present help in trouble.

"The next morning when I saw him again, his cheerfulness and comfort were much increased, waiting for the sheriff with the greatest sweetness and serenity of mind; saying, Now the will of God is determined, to whom I have referred it, and he hath chosen most certainly that which is best.

"Afterward with a smiling countenance he discoursed of the glory of heaven, remarking with much delight the third, fourth, and fifth verses of the 22d of the Revelations, "And there shall be no more curse; but the throne of God, and of the Lamb, shall be in it, and his servants shall serve him, and they shall see his face, and his name shall be in their foreheads, and there shall be no night there, and they shall need no candle nor light of the sun, and they shall reign for ever and ever." Then he said, Oh, what a happy state is this! shall we be loth to go to enjoy this! Then he desired to be read to him, 2 Cor. v. "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens;" to the tenth or eleventh verses. In all, his comforts still increasing, expressing his sweet hopes and good assurance of his interest in this glorious inheritance, and being now going to the possession of it, seeing so much of this happy change, that he said, Death was more desirable than life; he had rather die than live any longer here. As to the manner of his death, he said, When I have considered others under these circumstances, I have thought it very dreadful, but now God hath called me to it, I bless God I have quite other apprehensions of it; I can now cheerfully embrace it as an easy passage to glory: and though death separates from the enjoyments of each other here, it will be but for a very short time, and then we shall meet with such enjoyments as now we cannot conceive, and for ever rejoice in each others happiness. Then reading the scriptures, and musing with himself, he intimated the great comfort God conveyed to his soul in it; saying, O what an invaluable treasure is this blessed word of God; in all conditions here is a store of strong consolation. One desiring his Bible, he said, No, this shall be my companion to the last moment of my life. Thus praying together, reading, meditating, and conversing of heavenly things, they waited for the sheriff, who, when he came, void of all pity or civility, hurried them away, scarce suffering them to take leave of their friends. But notwithstanding this, and the doleful mourning of all about them, the joyfulness of his countenance was increased. Thus he left his prison, and thus he appeared on the sledge, where they sat about half an hour, before the officers could force the horses to draw, at which they were greatly enraged, there being no visible obstruction from weight or way. But at last the mayor and sheriff hauled them forward themselves, Balaam-like, driving the horses.

"When they came to the place of execution, which was surrounded with spectators, many that waited their coming with great sorrow, said, That when they saw him and them come with such cheerfulness and joy, and evidence of the presence of God with them, it made death appear with another aspect.

"They first embraced each other with the greatest affection; then two of the elder persons praying audibly, they joined with great seriousness. Then he desired leave of the sheriff to pray particularly, but he would not grant it, only asked him if he would pray for the king? He answered, I pray for all men. He then requested they might sing a psalm; the sheriff told him, It must be with the ropes about their necks; which they cheerfully accepted, and sung with such heavenly joy and sweetness, that many present said, It both broke and rejoiced their hearts.

"Thus in the experience of the delightfulness of praising God on earth, he willingly closed his eyes on a vain world, to pass to that eternal employment, September 30, 1685.

"All present of all sorts were exceedingly affected and amazed. Some officers that had before insultingly said, Surely these persons have no thoughts of death, but will find themselves surprised by it; after said, that they now saw he and they had something extraordinary within, that carried them through with such joy. Others of them said, that they were so convinced of their happiness, that they would be glad to change conditions with them. All the soldiers in general, and others, lamented exceedingly, saying, That it was so sad a thing, to see them so cut off, they scarce knew how to bear it.

"Some of the most malicious in the place, from whom nothing but railing was expected, said (as they were carried to their grave in Taunton church, voluntarily accompanied by most of the town) that these persons had left a sufficient evidence, that they were now glorified saints in heaven.

"A great officer in the king's army has been often heard to say, That if you would learn to die, go to the young men of Taunton.

"Much more was uttered by them, which shewed the blessed and glorious frames of their hearts.

"Mr. Benjamin Hewling, about two hours before his death, writ the following letter, which shewed the great composure of his mind.

A LETTER

From Mr. HEWLING to his Mother; written two Hours before his Execution.

Taunton, September 30, 1685.

"HONOURED MOTHER,

"THAT news which I know you have a great while feared, and we expected, I must now acquaint you with, that notwithstanding the hopes you gave in your two last letters, warrants are come down for my execution, and within these few hours I expect it to be performed. Blessed be the Almighty God, that gives comfort and support in such a day; how ought we to magnify his holy name for all his mercies, that when we were running in a course of sin, he should stop us in full career, and shew us that Christ whom we had pierced, and out of his free-grace enable us to look upon him with an eye of faith, believing him able to save to the utmost all such as come to him. Oh admirable long-suffering patience of God, that when we were dishonouring his name, he did not take that time to bring honour to himself by our destruction. But he delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but had rather he should turn to him and live; and he has many ways of bringing his own to himself. Blessed be his holy name, that through affliction he has taught my heart in some measure to be conformable to his will, which worketh patience, and patience worketh experience, and experience hope, which maketh not ashamed. I bless God I am not ashamed of the cause for which I lay down my life; and as I have engaged in it, and fought for it, so now I am going to seal it with my blood. The Lord carry on the same cause which hath been long on foot; and though we die in it, and for it, I question not but in his own good time he will raise up other instruments more worthy to carry it on to the glory of his name, and the advancement of his church and people.

"Honoured mother, I know there has been nothing left undone by you, or my friends, for the saving of my life, for which I return many hearty acknowledgments to yourself and them all; and it is my dying request to you and them, to pardon all undutifulness and unkindness in every relation. Pray give my duty to my grandfather and grandmother, service to my uncles and aunts, and my dear love to all my sisters; to every relation and friend a particular recommendation. Pray tell them all how precious an interest in Christ is when we come to die, and advise them never to rest in a Christless estate. For if we are his, it is no matter what the world do to us, they can but kill the body, and blessed be God the soul is out of their reach, for I question not but their malice wishes the damnation of that, as well as the destruction of the body; which has too evidently appeared by their deceitful flattering promises. I commit you all to the care and protection of God, who has promised to be a father to the fatherless, and a husband to the widow, and to supply the want of every relation. The Lord God of heaven be your comfort under those sorrows, and your refuge from those miseries we may easily foresee coming upon poor England, and the poor distressed people of God in it. The Lord carry you through this vale of tears with a resigning, submissive spirit, and at last bring you to himself in glory; where I question not but you will meet your dying son,

BENJAMIN HEWLING."

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. CHRISTOPHER BATTISCOMB, at LYME.

THIS was another young gentleman of a good family, and very great hopes, and of a fair estate, which lay in Dorsetshire, somewhere between Dorchester and Lyme. He had studied some time at the Temple, and having occasions in the country about the time of my lord Ruffel's business, he was there seized, on suspicion of being concerned in it, and clapt into the county gaol at Dorchester, where he behaved himself with that prudence and winning sweetness, and shewed so much wit, and innocent pleasantness of temper, as extremely obliged both all his keepers and fellow-prisoners, and even persons of the best quality in that town. It is indeed a genteel, well bred place, as almost any in England, at such a distance from London. The streets are fair and large, and buildings pretty regular; two sweet, plentiful rivers running by it. It stands on a chalky hill, but wants not store of good water. The market-house is a pleasant little pile, that very much sets off the town. There are three churches in it, and one in its adjoining parish. It is endowed with several alms houses, a good grammar-school well enough provided, which has had the happiness of ingenious masters, and by their care, produced no inconsiderable number of good scholars. There are two or three old Roman fortifications near the town, which Camden and Speed took notice of. The people of it are generally civil and gallant enough, if not a little on the extreme that way. They knew how to value such a gentleman as Battiscomb, and made him such frequent visits in the prison, till the place itself was far from being scandalous, that there generally was all the conversation, and where you might be sure to meet the best company in the town of both sexes. Mr. Battiscomb had the happiness not to be displeasing to the fair sex, who had as much pity and friendship for him as consisted with the rules of decency and virtue; and perhaps their respect for him did not always stop at friendship, though it still preserved the other bounds inviolable. Pity is generally but a little way from love, especially when the object of it is any thing extraordinary. But after he had been there some time, and nothing could be proved against him, which could any ways affect him, he was at length, almost unwillingly, delivered from this sort of happy slavery. And when the duke landed, appeared with him, and served him with equal faith and valour, till the rout at Sedgmoor, when he fled with the rest, and got up as far as Devonshire, where he was seized in a disguise, and brought to Dorchester, to his former confinement.

Mr. Battiscomb behaved himself there the second time in the same manner as he did at the first, though now he seemed more thoughtful, and in earnest than before, as knowing nothing was to be expected but speedy death; though his courage never drooped, but was still the same, if it did not increase with his danger. At his trial Jeffreys railed at him with so much eagerness and barbarity, that he was observed almost to foam upon the bench. He was so angry with him, because he was a lawyer, and could have been contented all such as he should be hanged up without any trial; and truly it was no great matter whether he or the rest had had that formality or no. Mr. Battiscomb was as undaunted at the bar, as in the field, or at his execution. How he demeaned himself in prison before his death, take this following account verbatim, as it was written by his friends. Though what occurred most remarkable after his sentence, must not be omitted. Several young ladies in the town went to Jeffreys to beg his life, who repulsed them at such a brutish rate, as nobody with one spark of humanity would have been guilty of, and in a manner even too uncivil to be mentioned. The particulars may be seen in the petition of the widows and orphans of that country.

"MR. BATTISCOMB was observed to be always serious and cheerful, ready to entertain spiritual discourse, manifesting affection to God's people and his ordinances; he seemed to be in a very calm indifference to life or death, referring himself to God to determine it, expressing his great satisfaction as to some opportunities of escape that were slipt, saying, That truly he sometimes thought the cause was too good to flee from suffering in it, though he would use all lawful means for his life; but the providence of God having prevented this, this, he was sure it was best for him, for, he said, he blessed God he could look into eternity with comfort. He said, with respect to his relations and friends, to whom his death would be afflictive, that he was willing to live, if God saw good; but for his own part, he thought death much more desirable. He said, I have enjoyed enough of this world, but I never found any thing but vanity in it, no rest or satisfaction. God, who is an infinite spiritual being, is the only suitable object for the soul of man, which is spiritual in its nature, and too large to be made happy by all that this world can afford, which is but sensual. Therefore methinks, I see no reason why I should be unwilling to leave it by death, since our happiness can never be perfected till then, till we leave this body, where we are so continually clogged with sin and vanity, frivolous and foolish trifles. Death in itself is indeed terrible, and natural courage is too low to encounter it; nothing but an interest in Christ can be our comfort in it, he said, which comfort I hope I have; intimating much advantage to his soul by his former imprisonment.

“ When he went from Dorchester to Lyme, after he had received the news of his death the next day, he was in the same serious cheerfulness, declaring still the same apprehension of the desirableness of death, and the great supports of his mind under the thoughts of so suddenly passing through it, alone from the hope of the security of his interest in Christ; taking leave of his friends with this farewell, Though we part here we shall meet in heaven. Passing by his estate, going to Lyme, he said, Farewell temporal inheritance, I am now going to my heavenly, eternal one. At Lyme, the morning that he died, it appeared that he had the same supports from God, meeting death with the same cheerfulness; and after he had prayed a while to himself, without any appearance of reluctance, yielded up his spirit, September 12, 1685.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. WILLIAM JENKYN, who was condemned at Dorchester.

THIS gentleman's father was sufficiently known, and his circumstances hard enough, being seized only for his opinion, and clapped up close in Newgate; where the inconvenience of the place, and want of the exercise he formerly enjoyed, quickly killed him, as he used to say before his confinement, it would certainly do if ever it happened. Thus was he requited by that very person, for whom with Mr. Love he ventured his life so deeply, and so hardly escaped with it. It was his inhuman treatment which edged and animated his son; and the revenge of his father's blood may be presumed to have gone very far in pushing him on to engage his life and fortune in this undertaking, he having given mourning rings for his father with this poetry, William Jenkyn, murdered in Newgate. He was his father's only son, who had taken care to have him educated suitable to his birth, and ingenious inclinations; he improved sufficiently in all useful learning, and was now about one or two and twenty. He and several young gentlemen rode down from London a little before the duke landed, and were taken on suspicion, and laid up in Ilchester gaol, till the duke himself came and relieved them. He continued in his army till the rout, when, if I mistake not, he got to sea, and was forced back again with the Hewlings, or some others. He was condemned at Dorchester assizes.

To a friend discoursing with him at Dorchester about his pardon, and telling him the doubtfulness of obtaining it, he replied, Well, death is the worst they can do, and I bless God, that will not surprise me, for I hope my great work is done. At Taunton, being advised to govern the airiness of his temper, telling him, it made people apt to censure him, as inconsiderate of his condition, to which he answered, Truly, this is so much my natural temper, that I cannot tell how to alter it; but I bless God I have, and do think seriously of my eternal concerns; I do not allow myself to be vain, but I find cause to be cheerful, for my peace is made with God, through Jesus Christ my Lord; this is my only ground of comfort and cheerfulness, the security of my interest in Christ; for I expect nothing but death, and without this I am sure death would be most dreadful; but having the good hope of this, I cannot be melancholy. When he heard of the triumphant death of those that suffered at Lyme, he said, This is a good encouragement to depend upon God. Then speaking about the mangling of their bodies, he said, Well, the resurrection will restore all with great advantage; the fifteenth chapter of the Corinthians is comfort enough for all believers. Discoursing much of the certainty and felicity of the resurrection at another time, he said, I will (as I think I ought) use all lawful means for the saving of my life, and then if God please to forgive me my sins, I hope I shall as cheerfully embrace death. Upon the design of attempting an escape, he said, We use this means for the preserving of our lives, but if God is not with us, it will not effect it; it is our business first to apply to him for direction and success, if he sees good, with resigning our lives to him, and then his will be done. After the disappointments, when there was no prospect of any other opportunity, he spake much of the admirableness of God's providence in those things that seem most against us, bringing the greatest good out of them; for, said he, we can see but a little way, God is only wise in all his disposals of us; if we were left to choose for ourselves, we should choose our own misery. Afterwards discoursing of the vanity and unsatisfyingness of all things in this world, he said, It is so in the enjoying, we never find our expectations answered by any thing in it, and when death comes it puts an end to all things we have been pursuing here; learning and knowledge (which are the best things in this world) will then avail nothing; nothing but an interest in Christ is then of any worth. One reading to his fellow-prisoners, Jer. xlii. 12. “ I will shew mercy unto you, that he may have mercy upon you, and cause you to return to your own land;” he said, Yes, we shall, but not in this world, I am persuaded. September the 29th at night, after he heard he must die the next morning, he was exceedingly composed and cheerful, expressing his satisfaction in the will of God: the next morning he was still more spiritual and cheerful, discovering a very sweet serenity of mind in all that he said or did: whilst he was waiting for the sheriff, reading the scriptures, meditating and conversing with those about him of divine things, amongst other things, said he, I have heard much of the glory of heaven, but I am now going to behold it, and understand what it is. Being desired to disguise himself to attempt an escape, he said, No, I cannot tell how to disturb myself about it, and methinks it is not my business, now I have other things to take up my thoughts; if God saw good to deliver me, he would open some other door; but seeing he has not, it is more for the honour of his name we should die, and so be it. One saying to him that most of the apostles died violent deaths, he replied, Nay, a greater than the apostles, our Lord himself died, not only a shameful, but a painful death. He further said, This manner of death hath been the most terrible thing in the world to my thoughts, but I bless God, I am now neither afraid nor ashamed to die. He said, The parting with my friends, and their grief for me, is my greatest difficulty; but it will be for a very short time, and we shall meet again in endless joys, where my dear father is already entered, him shall I presently joyfully meet. Then musing with himself a while, he with an extraordinary seriousness sung two verses of one of Herbert's divine poems.

He then read the 53d of Isaiah, and said, He had heard many blessed sermons from that chapter, especially from the 6th verse, “ All we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way, but the Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all;” seeming to intimate some impression made on his soul from them; but was interrupted; then he said, Christ is all: when the sheriff came, he had the same cheerfulness and serenity of mind in taking leave of his friends, and on the sledge, which seemed to increase to the last (as those present have affirmed) joining in prayer, and in singing singing a psalm with great appearance of comfort and joy in his countenance, inasmuch that some of his enemies (that had before censured his cheerfulness for unthoughtfulness of his danger, and therefore expected to see him much surprised) now professed they were greatly astonished, to see such a young man leave the world, and go through death like Mr. Jenkyn.

IF those persons who suffered about Monmouth's business, fell only into the hands of Cannibals, some of them, at least, had escaped better than they did from Jeffreys. Those more tame and civil creatures would have spared the old and withered, though they had devoured the young and tender. But no age, no sex made any difference here; and as those who were just come into the world, children and girls of ten or a dozen years old were refused pardon; so those who were half out of it, would not be suffered to tumble into the grave entire, though, as Juvenal says of Priam, they had scarce blood enough left to tinge the knife of the sacrifices. An instance of this was my lady Lisle, of such an age, that she almost slept on her very trial, condemned for as small a matter as has been known, by one of those dormant laws, made only in terrorem, but hardly ever executed, only for corresponding with Nelthorp, an out-lawed person, and, as was pretended, giving him shelter at her house, and Hicks, who brought him thither. For Hicks, he was not then convicted, nor in any proclamation, and so it is a question whether she could, even in rigour of law, deserve death on his account. For Nelthorp, he himself says in his last speech, that he was wholly a stranger to that worthy lady; neither did she, as he verily believes, know who he was, or his name, till he was taken. For this she was found guilty, and lost her head at Winchester. Her case was thought so hard, that the honourable house of parliament afterwards reversed her judgment. At her death she made a speech, as follows:

The last Speech of LADY ALICIA LISLE.

"GENTLEMEN, friends, and neighbours, it may be expected that I should say something at my death, and in order thereunto I shall acquaint you, that my birth and education were both near this place, and that my parents instructed me in the fear of God, and I now die of the reformed Protestant religion; believing that if ever Popery should return into this nation, it would be a very great and severe judgment; that I die in expectation of the pardon of all my sins, and of acceptance with God the Father, by the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, he being the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believes; I thank God through Jesus Christ, that I do depart under the blood of sprinkling, which speaketh better things than that of Abel; God having made this chastisement an ordinance to my soul. I did once as little expect to come to this place on this occasion, as any person in this place or nation; therefore let all learn not to be high-minded, but fear: the Lord is a sovereign, and will take what way he sees best to glorify himself, in and by his poor creatures; and I do humbly desire to submit to his will, praying to him, that I may possess my soul in patience. The crime that was laid to my charge, was for entertaining a nonconformist minister and others in my house; the said minister being sworn to have been in the late duke of Monmouth's army; but I have been told, that if I had denied them, it would not at all have affected me: I have no excuse but surprise and fear, which I believe my jury must make use of to excuse their verdict to the world. I have been also told, that the court did use to be of counsel for the prisoner; but instead of advice, I had evidence against me from thence; which, though it were only by hear-say, might possibly affect my jury; my defence being but such, as might be expected from a weak woman; but such as it was, I did not hear it repeated again to the jury; which, as I have been informed, is usual in such cases. However, I forgive all the world, and therein all those that have done me wrong; and in particular, I forgive colonel Penruddock, although he told me, that he could have taken these men before they came to my house. And I do likewise forgive him, who desired to be taken away from the grand jury to the petty jury, that he might be the more nearly concerned in my death. As to what may be objected in reference to my conviction, that I gave it under my hand, that I had discoursed with Nelthorp; that could be no evidence against me, being after my conviction and sentence: I do acknowledge his majesty's favour in revoking my sentence: I pray God to preserve him, that he may long reign in mercy, as well as justice, and that he may reign in peace; and that the Protestant religion may flourish under him. I also return thanks to God and the reverend clergy, that assisted me in my imprisonment."

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. RICHARD NELTHORP, in London.

THE name of this gentleman is often met with in West's and Rumsey's plot, and for a good reason, he being not near to answer for himself. As to what he was accused, out-lawed, and executed for, his being concerned in a design for the assassination of the king and duke, he solemnly avers, as may be seen below in his speech, that he was always highly against it, and detested any such thing, was never in the least concerned in it, neither in purse or person; never knew of any arms bought for that intent, nor did believe there was any such design. Than which, what words could be more full and satisfactory? He went away in the heat of swearing, and returned with the duke of Monmouth, thinking it his duty, as he says, to hazard his life for the preservation of the Protestant religion and English liberties; but as to the duke of Monmouth's being declared king, he was wholly passive in it. He was at first committed to Salisbury prison, where he had several disputes with a learned and good man, whose opinion then differed from his, concerning the lawfulness of defending ourselves by arms against illegal violence, which was his firm judgment. Thence he was brought to London, and imprisoned in Newgate. He rejected there, with scorn, some offers made him of saving his own life by taking away other men's; and though he was under inexpressible trouble during his close confinement there, which at length arose to distraction, and the impair of his reason; yet it is remarkable that he, as Bateman before him, before he came to die, after sentence, was very calm and lively again, the entire exercise of his judgment and understanding returning, with more joy and comfort than he had before pain and misery.

He wrote one letter to his parents, another to his children, together with his last speech at his execution the 30th of October 1685. At two o'clock in the morning he wrote the letter to his parents, &c. wherein he speaks much of his brother and fellow-sufferer, Mr. Ayloff, who suffered martyrdom in London, if I mistake not, whom he says, he could embrace with more joy in the field of suffering, than ever he could have done had he met him in the field crowned with victory and laurels.

The last Speech of Mr. RICHARD NELTHORP.

"THE great and inexpressible trouble and distraction I have been under since I came into trouble, especially since my close confinement in Newgate, hath so broken my reason, that for many weeks last past, till the day my sentence was passed, I have not had any composure of mind, and have been under the greatest trouble imaginable; since my dearest wife hath had the favour granted her of coming to see me, I am at present under great composedness of mind, through the infinite goodness of the Lord. As to what I stand out-lawed for, and am now sentenced to die, I can with comfort appeal to to the great God, before whose tribunal I am to appear, that what I did was in the simplicity of my heart, without seeking any private advantage to myself; but thinking it my duty to hazard my life for the preservation of the Protestant religion and English liberties, which I thought invaded, and both in great danger of being lost. As to the design of assassinating the late king, or his present majesty, it always was a thing highly against my judgment, and which I always detested; and I was never in the least concerned in it, neither in the purse nor person, nor ever knew of any arms bought for that intent, nor did I believe there was any such design, or ever heard of any disappointment in such an affair, or time, or place, save what, after the discovery of the general design, Mr. West spoke of, as to arms bought by him; and as to myself, I was in the North when the late king was at Newmarket, and the first news I had of the fire, was at Beverley in Yorkshire. As to my coming over with the late duke of Monmouth, it was in prosecution of the same ends; but the Lord in his holy and wise providence hath been pleased to blast all our undertakings; though there seemed to be a very unanimous and zealous spirit in all those that came from beyond the seas: and as to the duke of Monmouth's being declared king, I was wholly passive in it, I never having been present at any public debate of that affair, and should never have advised it, but complained of it to colonel Holmes, and captain Patchet. I believe the lord Grey and Mr. F—— the chief promoters of it. As to the temptation of being an evidence, and bringing either into trouble or danger of his life the meanest person, upon the account for which I suffer, I always abhorred and detested the thoughts of it, both when in and out of danger, and advised some very strongly against it; except when under my distraction in prison, that amongst other temptations did violently assault me; but through the goodness of my dearest God and Father, I was preserved from it, and indeed was wholly incapable, and could never receive the least shadow of comfort from it, but thought death more eligible, and was some time before, out of my distracted and disquieted condition, wholly free from it; though not without other temptations far more criminal in the sight of men. I bless the Father of all mercies, and God of all consolations, that I find a great resignedness of my will to his, finding infinitely more comfort in death, than ever I could place in life, though in a condition that might seem honourable; every hour seeing the will of God in ordering this affair more and more cleared up to me. God hath given, God hath taken, blessed be his holy name, that hath enabled me to be willing to suffer, rather than to put forth my hand to iniquity, or to say a confederacy with those that do so. I am heartily and sincerely troubled for what hath happened, many men's lives being lost, and many poor distressed families ruined; the Lord pardon what of sin he hath seen in it. He in his wonderful providence hath made me and others concerned, instruments, not only for what is already fallen out, but, I believe, for hastening some other great work he hath to do in these kingdoms; whereby he will try and purge his people, and winnow the chaff from the wheat; the Lord keep those that are his, faithful unto the end.

"I die in charity with all the world, and can readily and heartily forgive my greatest enemies, even those that have been evidences against me; and I most humbly beg the pardon of all that I have in the least any way injured; and in a special manner humbly ask pardon of the lady Lisle's family and relations, for that my being succoured there one night with Mr. Hicks, brought that worthy lady to suffer death: I was wholly a stranger to her ladyship, and came with Mr. Hicks; neither did she (as I verily believe) know who I was, or my name, till I was taken: and if any other have come to any loss or trouble, I humbly beg their pardon; and were I in a condition, I would, as far as I was able, make them a requital.

"As to my faith, I neither look nor hope for mercy, but only in the free grace of God, by the application of the blood of Jesus, my dearest and only Saviour, to my poor sinful soul. My distresses have been exceeding great as to my eternal state, but through the infinite goodness of God, though I have many sins to answer for, yet I hope and trust, as to my particular, that Christ came for this very end and purpose, to relieve the oppressed, and to be a physician to the sick. I come unto thee, O blessed Jesus! refuse me not, but wash me in thine own blood, and then present me to thy Father as righteous. What, though my sins be as crimson, and of a scarlet dye, yet thou canst make them as white as snow. I see nothing in myself but what must utterly ruin and condemn me; I cannot answer for one action of my whole life, but I cast myself wholly upon thee, who art the fountain of mercy, in whom God is reconciling himself to the world; the greatest of sins and sinners may find an all-sufficiency in thy blood to cleanse them from all sin. O dearest Father of mercy, look upon me as righteous in and through the imputed righteousness of thy Son; he payed the debt by his own offering himself up for sin, and in that thy justice is satisfied, and thy mercy is magnified. Grant me thy love, O dearest Father! assist me, and stand by me in the needful hour of death, give thy angels charge over my poor soul, that the evil one may not touch nor hurt it. Defend me from his power, deliver me from his rage, and receive me into thine eternal kingdom, in and through the alone merits of my dearest Redeemer, for whom I praise thee: to whom, with thyself and holy Spirit, be ascribed all glory, honour, power, might, and dominion, for ever and ever, Amen.

"Dear Lord Jesus, receive my Spirit, Amen.

"RICHARD NELTHORP."

Newgate, Oct. 29, 1685.

The MARTYRDOM of Mrs. ELIZABETH GAUNT, at Wapping.

THE most likely reason that Mrs. Gaunt was burnt, was, it is very possible, because she lived at Wapping; the honest seamen, and hearty Protestants thereabouts, being such known enemies to Popery and arbitrary government, that the friends of both gave all who opposed it the name of Wappingers, as an odious brand and title. She was a good, honest, charitable woman, who made it her business to relieve and help whoever suffered for the forementioned cause, sparing no pains, refusing no office to get them assistance, in which she was the most industrious and indefatigable woman living. Among others whom she had just relieved, who were obnoxious persons, was one Burton, whom with his wife and family she had kept from starving, for which (may the very name of them be registered with eternal infamy) they swore against her, and took away her life: though she says in her speech, there was but one witness against her as to any money she was charged to give him, and that he himself, an out-lawed person, his outlawry not yet reversed; he not being out-lawed when she was with him; and hid him away. That which she wrote in the nature of a speech, has a great deal of sense and spirit, and some strange expressions which were mentioned in the introduction to all these matters; which she concludes with these words addressed to her enemies, "From her that finds no mercy from you."

If it were possible to represent the due character of this excellent woman, the task would be most agreeable. That she stood most deservedly entitled to an eternal monument of honour in the hearts of all sincere lovers of the reformed religion. All true Christians (though in some things differing in persuasion with her) found in her an universal charity and sincere friendship, as is well known to many here, and also to a multitude of the Scotch nation, ministers and others, who for conscience-sake were formerly thrust into exile. These found her a most refreshing refuge. She dedicated herself with unwearied industry, to provide for their supply and support, and therein (I do incline to think) she outstripped every individual person (if not the whole body of Protestants in this great city). Hereby she became exposed to the implacable fury of bloody Papists, and those blind tools who co-operated to promote their accursed designs. And so there appeared little difficulty to procure a jury (as there were well-prepared judges) to make her a sacrifice as a traitor to the state. Her judges, the king's counsel, the solicitor-general, the common-serjeant, &c. racked their inventions to draw Burton and his wife to charge Mrs. Gaunt with the knowledge of his being in a plot, or in the proclamation, but nothing of that could be made out, nor is there any sort of proof that Mrs. Gaunt harboured this ungrateful wretch, or that she gave him either meat or drink, as the indictment charges her; but notwithstanding that, her jury brought her in guilty, and she was condemned.

The sentence was executed upon this excellent woman on the Friday following, being the 23d of October, 1685, when she left her murderers the following memorial.

SPEECH of Mrs. GAUNT, written the Day before her EXECUTION.

NOT knowing whether I should be suffered or able, because of weaknesses that are upon me through my hard and close imprisonment, to speak at the place of execution; I wrote those few lines to signify, That I am well reconciled to the way of my God towards me, though it be in ways I looked not for; and by terrible things, yet in righteousness; having given me life, he ought to have the disposing of it, when and how he pleases to call for it; and I desire to offer up my all to him, it being but my reasonable service; and also the first terms that Jesus Christ offers, that he that will be his disciple, must forsake all, and follow him; and therefore let none think hard, or be discouraged at what hath happened unto me; for he doth nothing without cause, in all he hath done to us, he being holy in all his ways, and righteous in all his works; and it is but my lot in common with poor desolate Sion at this day. Neither do I find in my heart the least regret for what I have done in the service of my Lord and Master Jesus Christ, in succouring and securing any of his poor sufferers, that have shewed favour to his righteous cause; which cause, though now it be fallen and trampled upon, as if it had not been appointed, yet it shall revive; and God will plead it another rate than ever he hath done yet, and reckon with all its opposers and malicious haters; and therefore let all that love and fear him, not omit the least duty that comes to hand, or lies before them, knowing that now it hath need of them, and expects they shall serve him. And I desire to bless his holy name, that he hath made me useful in my generation to the comfort and relief of many desolate ones, and the blessing of those that are ready to perish has come upon me, and being helped to make the heart of the widow to sing. And I bless his holy name, that in all this, together with what I was charged with, that I have done his will, though it does cross man's will; and the scriptures that satisfy me are, Isaiah xvi. 3. 'Hide the outcasts, bewray not him that wandereth.' And Obad. 14. 'Thou shouldst not have given up those of his that did escape in the day of his distress.' But man says, You shall give them up, or you shall die for it. Now whom to obey, judge ye: So that I have cause to rejoice and be exceeding glad, in that I suffer for righteousness sake, and that I am accounted worthy to suffer for well-doing, and that God has accepted any service from me, which has been done in sincerity, though mixed with manifold infirmities, which he hath been pleased for Christ's sake to cover and forgive. And now as concerning my fact, as it is called, alas! it was but a little one, and might well become a prince to forgive; but he that shews no mercy, shall find none: and I may say of it in the language of Jonathan, 'I did but taste a little honey, and lo! I must die for it.' I did but relieve an unworthy, poor, distressed family, and lo! I must die for it. Well, I desire in the Lamb-like Gospel-Spirit to forgive all that are concerned, and to say, Lord, lay it not to their charge; but I fear he will not: nay, I believe when he comes to make inquisition for blood, it will be found at the door of the furious judge; who, because I could not remember things through my dauntedness at Burton's wife and daughter's villainy, and my ignorance, took advantage thereof, and would not hear me, when I had called to mind that which I am sure would have invalidated their evidence; though he granted something of the same nature to another, yet denied it to me. My blood will also be found at the door of the unrighteous jury, who found me guilty upon the single oath of an out-lawed man; for there was none but his oath about the money, who is no legal witness, though he be pardoned, his out-lawry not being recalled; and also the law requires two witnesses in point of life: and then about my going with him to the place mentioned, it was by his own words, before he was out-lawed, for it was two months after his absconding; and though in a proclamation, yet not high treason, as I have heard, so that I am clearly murdered by you. And also bloody Mr. A—, who has so insatiably haunted after my life; and though it is no profit to him, through the ill will he bore me, left no stone unturned, as I have ground to believe, till he brought it to this; and shewed favour to Burton, who ought to have died for his own fault, and not bought his life with mine; and captain R—, who is cruel and severe to all under my circumstances, and did at that time, without all mercy, or pity, hasten my sentence, and held up my hand, that it might be given; all which, together with the great one of all, by whose power all those, and a multitude more of cruelties are done, I do heartily and freely forgive, as against me; but as it is done in an implacable mind against the Lord Christ, and his righteous cause and followers, I leave it to him who is the avenger of all such wrongs, who will tread upon princes as upon mortar, and be terrible to the kings of the earth: and know this also, that though ye are seemingly fixed, and because of the power in your hand, are writing out your violence, and dealing with a despiteful hand, because of the old and new hatred; by impoverishing and every way distressing of those you have got under you; yet unless you can secure Jesus Christ, and all his holy angels, you shall never do your business, nor your hands accomplish your enterprizes; for he will be upon you ere you are aware; and therefore, O that you would be wise, instructed, and learn, is the desire of her that finds no mercy from you.

“P. S. Such as it is, you have it from her, who hath done as she could, and is sorry she can do no better: hopes you will pity and cover weakness, shortness, and any thing that is wanting; and begs that none may be weakened or humbled at the lowness of my spirit; for God's design is to humble and abase us, that he alone may be exalted in this day; and I hope he will appear in the needful time; and it may be reserves the best wine till last, as he hath done for some before me; none goeth to warfare at his own charge, and the Spirit bloweth, not only where, but when it listeth; and it becomes me, who have so often grieved, quenched, and resisted it, to wait for and upon the motions of the Spirit, and not to murmur; but I may mourn, because through want of it, I honour not my God, nor his blessed cause, which I have so long loved and delighted to love; and repent of nothing about it, but that I served him and it no better.”

Particulars of Mr. ROSEWELL's Trial and Preservation.

MR. Rosewell, a very worthy divine, was tried about the same time for treasonable words in his pulpit, upon the accusation of very vile and lewd informers; and a Surrey jury found him guilty of high treason, upon the most villanous and improbable evidence that had been ever given, notwithstanding sir John Talbot (no countenancer of Dissenters) had appeared with great generosity and honour, and testified, That the most material witness was as scandalous and infamous a wretch as ever breathed.

About this time it was given out by those who thirsted for blood, that Mr. Rosewell and Mr. Hays should die together; and it was upon good ground believed, that the happy deliverance of Mr. Hays did much contribute to the preservation of Mr. Rosewell; though it is very probable, that he had not escaped, had not sir John Talbot's worthy and most honourable detestation of that accursed villany, prompted him to repair from the court of King's-Bench, to king Charles II. and to make a faithful representation of the case to him, whereby, when inhuman bloody Jeffreys came a little after in a transport of joy, to make his report of the eminent service he and the Surrey jury had done in finding Mr. Rosewell guilty; the king (to his disappointment) appeared under some reluctancy, and declared that Mr. Rosewell should not die. And so he was most happily delivered from his intended martyrdom.

LET us now take a step over into Scotland, that poor country, which has been harassed and tired for these many years, to render them perfect slaves; that they might help to enslave England, to prevent which, and secure the Protestant religion, which it was grown impossible to do, but by arms; this good lord embarked from Holland about the same time with the duke, and arrived in Scotland with what forces he could make; to which were added some others who joined him: which after several marches and counter-marches, were at length led into a boggy sort of a place, on pretence, or with intention to bring him off from the other army then upon the heels of them, where they all lost one another, dispersed and shifted for themselves; the earl being taken by a countryman, and brought to Edinburgh, where he suffered for his former unpardonable crime, requiring care should be taken of the Protestant religion, and explaining his taking the test conformable thereto; for the legality of which he had the hands of most of the eminent lawyers about the city. He suffered at Edinburgh the 30th of June 1685. His speech has a great deal of piety and religion, nor will it be any disgrace to say, it was more like a sermon.

The following is a correct Copy of the last Speech of the EARL of ARGYLE, June 30, 1685.

JOB tells us, 'Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble:' and I am a dear instance of it. I shall not now say any thing of my sentence, or escape about three years and a half ago; nor of my return, lest I may thereby give offence, or be tedious: only being to end my days in your presence, I shall, as some of my last words, assert the truth of the matter of fact, and the sincerity of my intentions, and professions that are published.

"That which I intend mainly now to say, is, To express my humble, and (I thank God) cheerful submission to his divine will; and my willingness to forgive all men, even my enemies; and I am heartily well satisfied there is no more blood spilt, and I shall with the stream thereof to stop at me: and that (if it please God) to say, as to Zerubbabel, Zech. iv. 6. 'Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts.'

"I know afflictions spring not out of the dust: God did wonderfully deliver and provide for me, and has now by his special Providence brought me to this place; and I hope none will either insult or stumble at it, seeing they ought not; for God Almighty does all things well, for good and holy ends, though we do not always understand it. Love and hatred is not known by what is before us, Eccles. ix. 1.

"Afflictions are not only foretold, but promised to Christians; and are not only tolerable, but desirable.

"We ought to have a deep reverence and fear of God's displeasure; but withal, a firm hope and dependence on him for a blessed issue, in compliance with his will; for God chastens his own, to refine them, and not to ruin them, whatever the world may think, Heb. xii. 3 to 12.

"We are to imitate our Saviour in his sufferings, 1 Pet. ii. 23.

"We are neither to despise our afflictions, nor to faint under them; both are extremes.

"We are not to suffer our spirits to be exasperated against the instruments of our trouble; for the same affliction may be an effect of their passion, and yet sent by God to punish us for sin: though it is a comfort when we may say to them with David, Psal. lix. 3. 'Not for my transgression, but for my sin, O Lord.'

"Nor are we, by fraudulent, pusillanimous compliances in wicked courses, to bring sin upon ourselves: faint hearts are ordinary false hearts; chusing sin rather than sufferings, and a short life with eternal death, before temporal death and a crown of glory: such seeking to save a little, lose all; and God readily hardens them to proceed to their own destruction. How many, like Hazael, 2 Kings viii. 13. run to excesses they never thought they were capable of! Let rulers and others read seriously, and weigh Prov. i. 10 to 20, &c. and avoid what is bad, and follow what is good.

"For me, I hope by God's strength to join with Job, chap. xiii. 15. and the Psalmist, Psal. xxii. 4. and shall pray, as Psal. lxxiv. 19 to 24, and shall hope, as Psal. xciv. 14, 15.

"I do freely forgive all that directly or indirectly have been the cause of my being brought to this place, first or last; and I pray God forgive them. I pray God send truth and peace in these three kingdoms; and continue and increase the glorious light of the gospel, and restrain the spirit of prophanity, atheism, superstition, Popery, and persecution, and restore all that have backslidden from the purity of their life or principles; and bless his whole people with all blessings, spiritual and temporal, and put an end to their present trials.

"And I entreat all people to forgive me wherein I have offended, and concur with me to pray, That the great, good, and merciful God would sanctify my present lot, and for Jesus Christ's sake pardon all my sins, and receive me to his eternal glory.

"It is suggested to me, That I have said nothing of the royal family; and it remembers me, that before the justices at my trial about the test, I said, That at my death I would pray, that there should never want one of the royal family to be a defender of the true, ancient, Apostolic, Catholic, Protestant faith; which I do now: and that God would enlighten and forgive all of them that are either luke-warm, or have shrunk from the profession of it. And in all events, I pray God may provide for the security of his church, that antichrist, nor the gates of hell may never prevail against it."

COLONEL Richard Rumbold suffered at the same place, June 26, 1685, most of what occurred considerable in his defence and speech, you have had already in the business of the assassination. Two or three passages more there are worth remarks in the same; as arguments of his sense and courage. For this cause, he says, were every hair of his head and beard a life, he would joyfully sacrifice them all. That he was never antimonarchical in his principles, but for a king and free parliament; the king having power enough to make him great, and the people to make them happy. That he died in the defence of the just laws and liberties of the nations. That none was marked by God above another; for no man came into the world with a saddle on their backs, nor others booted and spurred to ride upon it. And being asked if he thought not his sentence dreadful? answered, He wished he had a limb for every town in Christendom.

COLONEL Richard Rumbold was brought about eleven o'clock in the morning from the castle of Edinburgh, to the justices court, in a great chair, on men's shoulders; where at first he was asked some questions, most of which he answered with silence; at last said, He humbly conceived, it was not necessary for him to add to his own accusation, since he was not ignorant they had enough already to do his business; and therefore he did not intend to fret his conscience at that time with answering questions. After which, his libel being read, the Court proceeded in usual manner; first asking him if he had any thing to say for himself before the jury closed? His answer was, He owned it all, saving that part, of having designed the king's death; and desired all present to believe the words of a dying man; he never directly or indirectly intended such a villany; that he abhorred the very thoughts of it; and that he blessed God he had that reputation in the world, that he knew none that had the impudence to ask him the question; and he detested the thoughts of such an action; and he hoped all good people would believe him, which was the only way he had to clear himself; and he was sure that this truth should be one day made manifest to all men. He was again asked, If he had any exception against the jury? He answered, No; but wished them to do as God and their consciences directed them. Then they withdrew, and returned their verdict in half an hour, and brought him in guilty. The sentence followed; For him to be taken from that place to the next room, and from thence to be drawn on a hurdle, betwixt two and four o'clock, to the Cross of Edinburgh, the place of execution, and there to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. He received his sentence with an undaunted courage and cheerfulness. Afterwards he was delivered into the town magistrate's hands; they brought to him two of their divines, and offered him their assistance upon the scaffold; which he altogether refused, telling them, That if they had any good wishes for him, he desired they would spend them in their own closets, and leave him now to seek God in his own way. He had several offers of the same kind by others, which he put off in like manner. He was most serious and fervent in prayers the few hours he lived (as the centinels observed, who were present all the while). The hour being come, he was brought to the place of execution, where he saluted the people on all sides of the scaffold, and after having refreshed himself with a cordial out of his pocket, he was supported by two men while he spoke to the people as follows.

"GENTLEMEN and BRETHREN,

"IT is for all men that come into the world once to die, and after death to judgment; and since death is a debt that all of us must pay, it is but a matter of small moment what way it be done; and seeing the Lord is pleased in this manner to take me to himself, I confess, something hard to flesh and blood, yet, blessed be his name, who hath made me not only willing, but thankful for his honouring me to lay down the life he gave, for his name; in which, were every hair in this head and beard of mine a life, I should joyfully sacrifice them for it, as I do this: and Providence having brought me hither, I think it most necessary to clear myself of some aspersions laid on my name; and first, That I should have had so horrid an intention of destroying the king and his brother.

[He now repeated what he had said before to the justices on this subject.]

"It was also laid to my charge, That I was antimonarchical.

"It was ever my thoughts, That kingly government was the best of all, justly executed: I mean, such as by our ancient laws; that is, a king, and a legal, free-chosen parliament. The king having, as I conceive, power enough to make him great; the people also as much property as to make them happy; they being, as it were, contracted to one another. And who will deny me, that this was not the just constituted government of our nation? How absurd is it then for men of sense to maintain, That though the one party of this contract breaketh all conditions, the other should be obliged to perform their part? No; this error is contrary to the law of God, the law of nations, and the law of reason. But as pride hath been the bait the devil hath caught most by ever since the creation, so it continues to this day with us. Pride caused our first parents to fall from the blessed estate wherein they were created; they aiming to be higher and wiser than God allowed, which brought an everlasting curse on them and their posterity. It was pride caused God to drown the old world. And it was Nimrod's pride in building Babel, that caused that heavy curse of division of tongues to be spread among us, as it is at this day. One of the greatest afflictions the church of God groaneth under, that there should be so many divisions during their pilgrimage here; but this is their comfort that the day draweth near, when, as there is but one Shepherd, there shall be but one sheepfold. It was therefore in the defence of this party, in their just rights and liberties, against Popery and slavery—

[When he said this they beat the drums: to which he replied]

"They need not trouble themselves, for he should say no more of his mind on that subject, since they were so disengenuous, as to interrupt a dying man, only to assure the people, he adhered to the true Protestant religion, detesting the erroneous opinions of many that called themselves so; and I die this day in the defence of the ancient laws and liberties of these nations: and though God, for reasons best known to himself, hath not seen it fit to honour us, so as to make us the instruments for the deliverance of his people; yet as I have lived, so I die in the faith, that he will speedily arise for the deliverance of his church and people. And I desire of you all to prepare for this with speed. I may say, This is a deluded generation, veiled with ignorance, that though Popery and slavery be riding in upon them, do not perceive it; though I am sure there was no man born marked of God above another; for none comes into the world with a saddle on his back, neither any booted and spurred to ride him; not but that I am well satisfied, that God hath wisely ordered different stations for men in the world, as I have already said; kings having as much power as to make them great, and the people as much property as to make them happy. And to conclude, I shall only add my wishes for the salvation of all men, who were created for that end."

When he had thus spoken, he prayed most fervently near three quarters of an hour, freely forgiving all men, even his greatest enemies, begging most earnestly for the deliverance of Sion from all her persecutors, particularly praying for London, Edinburgh, and Dublin, from which the streams run that rule God's people in these three kingdoms.

Summary of the last Speech of Mr. JOHN KING, at the Place of Execution at Edinburgh, on the 14th Day of August 1679.

"MEN and BRETHREN,

"I DO not doubt but that many that are spectators here, have some other end, than to be edified by what they may see and hear in the last words of one going to eternity; but if any one of you have ears to hear, which I nothing doubt but some of this great congregation have, I desire your ears and attention, if the Lord shall help and permit me to speak, to a few things.

"I bless the Lord, since Infinite Wisdom and holy Providence has so carved out my lot to die after the manner that I do, not unwillingly, neither by force: it is true, I could not do this of myself, nature always having an inclination to put the evil day far off, but through grace I have been helped, and by this grace I hope I shall: it is true, through policy I might have shunned such a hard sentence, if I had done some things; but though I could, I durst not, God knows, redeem my life with the loss of my integrity and honesty. I bless the Lord, that since I have been apprehended and made a prisoner, God

God hath very wonderfully upholden me, and made out that comfortable word, 'Fear not, be not dismayed. I am with thee, I will strengthen thee, I will uphold thee by the right hand of my righteousness,' Isaiah xli. 10. I thank the Lord he never yet gave me leave so much as to have a thought, much less to seek after any shift that might be in the least sinful: I did always, and yet do judge it better to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; therefore I am come hither to lay down my life. I bless the Lord I die not as a fool dieth, though I acknowledge I have nothing to boast of in myself: yea, I acknowledge I am a sinner, and one of the chief that have gone under the name of a professor of religion; yea, amongst the unworthiest of those that have preached the gospel; my sins and corruptions have been many, and have defiled me in all things, and even in following and doing my duty, I have not wanted my own sinful infirmities and weaknesses, so that I may truly say, I have no righteousness of my own, all is evil, and like filthy rags; but blessed be God that there is a Saviour and an advocate, Jesus Christ the Righteous, and I do believe that Jesus Christ is come into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the chief, and that through faith and his righteousness I have obtained mercy; and that through him, and him alone, I desire and hope to have a glorious victory over sin, Satan, hell, and death; and that I shall attain unto the resurrection of the just, and be made partaker of eternal life. I know in whom I have believed, and that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. I have according to my poor capacity, preached salvation in his name; and as I have preached, so do I believe, and with all my soul have commended it, and still do commend to all of you the riches of his grace, and faith in his name, as the alone and only way whereby we can come to be saved.

"It may be, many may think (but I bless the Lord, without any solid ground) that I suffer as an evil-doer, and as a busy body in other men's matters; but I reckon not much upon that, having the testimony of my own conscience for me. It was the lot of our blessed Saviour himself, and also the lot of many of his eminent, precious servants and people, to suffer by the world as evil-doers; yea, I think I have so good ground not to be scared at such a lot, that I count it my non-such honour; and oh what am I, that I should be honoured so, when so many worthies have panted after the like, and have not come at it: my soul rejoiceth in being brought into conformity with my blessed Lord and head, and so blessed a company in this way and lot; and I desire to pray that I may be to none of you this day upon this account a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence; and blessed is he that shall not be offended in Christ and his poor followers and members, because of their being condemned as evil-doers by the world.

"As for those things for which sentence of death hath passed against me, I bless the Lord my conscience doth not condemn me: I have not been rebellious, nor do I judge it rebellion for me to have endeavoured in my capacity, what possibly I could for the borne-down and ruined interest of my Lord and Master, and for the relief of my poor brethren afflicted and persecuted, not only in their liberties, privileges, and persons, but also in their lives; therefore it was for that I joined with that poor handful; the Lord knows, who is the searcher of hearts, that neither my design nor practice was against his majesty's person, and just government, but I always studied to be loyal to lawful authority in the Lord, and I thank God my heart doth not condemn me of any disloyalty; I have been loyal, and I do recommend it to all to be obedient to higher powers in the Lord.

"I have been looked upon by some, and represented by others to be of a divisive and factious humour, and one that stirred up division in the church, but I am hopeful that they will all now give me their charity, being within a little to stand before my judge, and I pray the Lord forgive them that did so misrepresent me; but I thank the Lord whatever men have said against me concerning this, that on the contrary I have often dissuaded from such ways and practices, as contrary to the word of God, and of our covenanted and reformed religion; and as I ever abhorred division and faction in the church, as that which tends to its utter ruin, if the Lord prevent it not, so I would in the bowels of my Lord and Master, if such an one as I may presume to persuade, and exhort both ministers and professors; if there be any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, that you be like minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind; in lowliness of mind, let each esteem others better than themselves, Phil. ii. 3. harmoniousness and honesty in the things of God, can never enough be sought after, and things that tend to the prejudice and hurt of Christ's interest, can never enough be fled from and avoided.

"And as I come hither willingly to lay down my tabernacle, so also I die in the belief and faith of the holy scriptures, and in the faith of the Apostles, and primitive Christians, and Protestant reformed churches, and particularly the church of Scotland, whereof I am a poor member.

"I shall but say a few words.

"First, All you that are profane, I would seriously exhort you, that you return to the Lord by serious repentance; if you do, iniquity shall not be your ruin; if you do not, know that the day of the Lord's vengeance is near and hasteneth on. Oh know for your comfort; there is a door of mercy yet open, if you be not despisers of the day of salvation. And you that have been, and yet are reproachers and persecutors of godliness, and of such as live godly; take heed, oh take heed, sad will be your day, when God arises to scatter his enemies, if you repent not for your ungodly deeds.

"Secondly, All those who are taken up with their own private interests, and if that go well, they care the less for the interest of Christ, take heed and be zealous, and repent, lest the Lord pass the sentence, I will spew you out of my mouth.

"Thirdly, For the truly godly, and such as are lamenting after the Lord, and are mourning for all the abominations of this city, and are taking pleasure in the very rubbish and stones of Zion; be of good courage, and cast not away your confidence. I dare not say any thing to future things, but surely the Lord has a handful that are precious to him, to whom he will be gracious; to these it is a dark night at present, how long it will last the Lord knows! Oh let not the sad disasters, that this poor people meet with, though very astonishing, terrify you; beware of snares that abound, cleave fast to your reformed religion, do not shift the cross of Christ, if you be called to it; it is better to suffer than sin, account the reproaches of Christ greater riches than all the treasures of the world.

"In the last place, let not my death be grievous to any of you; I hope it will be more profitable both for you and me, and for the church and interest of God, than my life could have been. I bless the Lord, I can freely and frankly forgive all men, even as I desire to be forgiven of God; pray for them that persecute you, bless them that curse you. As to the cause of Christ, I bless the Lord I never had cause, to this day, to repent for any thing I have suffered, or can now suffer for his name. I thank the Lord who has shewed mercy to such a vile sinner as I am, and that ever he should advance me to so high a dignity, as to be made a minister of his blessed and everlasting gospel; and that ever I should have a seal set to my ministry, upon the hearts of some in several places and corners of this land: the Lord visit Scotland with more and more faithful pastors, and send a reviving day unto the people of God; in the mean time be patient, be steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; and live in love and peace one with another, and the Lord be with his poor afflicted, groaning people that yet remain.

"Now I bid farewell to all my friends and dear relations: farewell my poor wife and children, whom I leave in the good hands of him who is better than seven husbands, and who will be a father to the fatherless. Farewell all creature comforts; welcome everlasting life, everlasting glory; glory, welcome everlasting love, everlasting praise :

bless the Lord, O my soul ! and all that is within me.

“ JOHN KING.”

Summary of the Dying Words of Mr. JOHN KIDD, at the Place of Execution at Edinburgh, on the 14th Day of August 1679.

“ Right worthy and well-beloved Spectators and Auditors,

“ CONSIDERING what bodily distempers I have been exercised with, since I came out of the torture, viz. scarce two hours out of my naked bed in one day, it cannot be expected, that I should be in a case to say any thing to the purpose at this juncture, especially seeing I am not as yet free from it; however I cannot but reverence the good hand of God upon me, and desire with all my soul to bless him for this my present lot.

“ It may be there are a great many here that judge my lot very sad and deplorable. I must confess death itself is very terrible to flesh and blood, but as it is an outlet to sin, and an inlet to righteousness, it is the Christian's great and inexpressible privilege; and give me leave to say this, that there is something in a Christian's condition, that can never put him without the reach of insufferableness, even shame, death, and the cross being included.

“ And then if there be peace betwixt God and the soul, nothing can damp peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; this is a most supporting ingredient in the bitterest cup, and under the sharpest and fiercest trial he can be exposed unto, this is my mercy, that I have something to lay claim unto, viz. The intimations of pardon and peace between God and my soul.

“ And as concerning that for which I am condemned, I magnify his grace, that I never had the least challenge for it, but on the contrary, I judge it my honour, that ever I was counted worthy to come upon the stage upon such a consideration; another thing that renders the most despicable lot of the Christian, and mine sufferable, is a felt and sensible presence from the Lord, strengthening the soul when most put to it, and if I could have this for my allowance this day, I could be bold to say, O death, where is thy sting? And could not but cry out, welcome to it, and all that follows upon it: I grant the Lord from an act of sovereignty may come, and go as he pleases, but yet he will never forsake his people, and this is a cordial to me in the case I am now exposed unto.

“ Thirdly, The exercising and putting forth his glorious power, is able to transport the soul of the believer, and mine, above the reach of all sublunary difficulties; and therefore seeing I have hope to be kept up by this power, I would not have you to look upon my lot, or any other that is or may be in my case, in the least deplorable, seeing we have ground to believe, that in more or less he will perfect his power and strength in weakness.

“ Fourthly, That I may come a little nearer to the purpose in hand, I declare before you all, in the sight of God, angels, and men, and in the sight of that sun, and all that he has created, that I am a most miserable sinner, in regard of my original and actual transgressions. I must confess, they are more in number than the hairs of my head. They are gone up above my head, and are past numbering; I cannot but say as Jacob said, I am less than the least of all God's mercies; yet I must declare to the exalting of his free grace, that to me, who am the least of all saints, is this grace made known, and that by a strong hand, and I dare not but say, he has loved me, and washed me in his own blood from all iniquities, and well is it for me this day, that ever I heard, or read that faithful saying, That Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.

“ Fifthly, I must also declare in his sight, I am the most unworthy that ever opened his mouth to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ in the gospel. Yea, the sense of this made me altogether unwilling to fall about so great a work, until by the importunity of some, whose names are precious and favourable to me, and many others, I was prevailed with to fall about it, and yet I am hopeful, not altogether without some fruit; and if I durst say it without vanity, I never found so much of the presence of God upon my spirit, as I have found in exercises of that nature, though I must still confess attended with inexpressible weakness, and this is the main thing for which I must lay down my tabernacle this day, viz. That I did preach Christ and the gospel in several places of this nation; for which I bless him (as I can) that ever such a poor obscure person as I am, have been thus privileged by him; for making mention of his grace as I was able.

“ In the next place, though to many I die desired, yet I know, to not a few my death is not desired; and it is the rejoicing of my heart, that I die in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has loved me, and given himself for me, and in the faith of the prophets and apostles, and in this faith of theirs there is not a name under Heaven by which men can be saved, but the name of Jesus, and in the faith of the doctrine and worship of the Kirk of Scotland, as it is now established according to the word of God, confession of faith, catechisms larger and shorter; and likewise I join my testimony against Popery, perjury, profanity, heresy, and every thing contrary to sound doctrine.

“ In the close, as a dying person, and one who has obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, I would humbly leave it on godly ministers to be faithful for their Lord and Master, and not to hold their peace in such a day, when so many ways are taken for injuring of him, his name, way, sanctuary, ordinances, crown, and kingdom; I hope there will be found a party in this land, that will continue for him and his matters in all hazards; and as faithfulness is called for in ministers, so professors would concern themselves that they countenance not, nor abet any thing inconsistent with former principles and practices. Let the land consider, how neutral and indifferent we are grown in the matters of God, even like Ephraim long ago, a cake not turned.

“ As concerning that which is the ground of my death, viz. preaching here and there in some corners; I bless my God, I have not the least challenge for it; and though those that condemned me are pleased to call such preachings rendezvous of rebellion, yet I must say this of them, they were so far from being reputed such in my eyes, that if ever Christ had a people, or party, wherein his soul took pleasure, I am bold to say, these meetings were a great part of them; the shining and glory of God was eminently seen amongst these meetings, the convincing power and authority of our Lord went out with his servants in those blasphemously nick-named conventicles: this I say, without reflection upon any. I have a word to say further, that God is calling persons to repentance, and to do their first work: O that Scotland were a mourning land, and that reformation were our practice, according as we are sworn in the covenant.

“ Again, That Christians of grace and experience would study more straitness and stability in this day, when so many are turning to the right hand, and many to the left; he that endureth to the end shall be saved; he hath appointed the kingdom for such as continue with him in his temptations.

“ Next, if ever you expect to have the form of the house shewed you in all the laws thereof, goings-out thereof, and comings-in thereof, then think it no shame to take shame to you for all that has been done: sitting down on this side Jordan, is like to be our bane. Oh! when shall we get up and run after him, till he brings us into the promised land, let us up and after him with all our heart, and never rest till he return.

“ I recommend my wife and young one to the care and faithfulness of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the God that fed me to this day, and who is the God of my salvation, their God and my God, their Father and my Father. I am also hopeful, that Christians, friends and relations, will not be unmindful of them when I am gone.

"Lastly, I do further bear my testimony to the cross of Christ, and bless him that ever he counted me worthy to appear for him in such a lot as this: glory to him that ever I heard tell of him, and that ever he fell upon such a method of dealing with me as this; and therefore let none that loves Christ and his righteous cause, be offended in me.

"And as I have lived in the faith of this, that the three kingdoms are married lands, so I die in the faith of it, that there will be a resurrection of his name, word, cause, and of all his interest therein; though I dare not determine the time when, nor the manner how, but leave all these things to the infinitely wise God, who has done, and will do all things well. Oh that he would return to this land again, to repair our breaches, and take away our backsliding, and appear for his work! Oh that he would pass by Scotland once again, and make our time a time of love; come Lord Jesus, come quickly! Himself hasten it in his own time and way. The Lord is my light and life, my joy, my song, and my salvation; the God of his chosen be my mercy this day, and the enriching comforts of the Holy Ghost keep up and carry me fair through, to the glory of his grace, the edification of his people, and my own eternal advantage. Amen.

"JOHN KIDD."

Having now given our readers a faithful account of the behaviour and dying speeches of the most eminent persons who suffered in Scotland, we shall return again for London, where the last person of quality that suffered, was the duke of Monmouth, whose expedition and sufferings are next related.

The MARTYRDOM of JAMES, DUKE of MONMOUTH, who was beheaded at Tower-Hill.

THE last person with whom we shall conclude this mournful tragedy, and the greatest in it, is the late James, duke of Monmouth; one indeed who, if he had been less, might have been one of the greatest men either in England or the world. By reason of some passages in his life, not so defensible, it was thought, at first, better to draw a veil before that unfortunate prince, and say nothing at all of him. But what allowances are made for custom and education, God only knows. I remember a shrewd answer given to an objection of this nature, Where, said one, should he learn any better? But, however, where there has been any time to think soberly of past actions, or none of that nature reiterated, charity is obliged to judge favourably. And besides, the good West-Countrymen would be very angry if they should not find their master that they loved so well, and suffered so much for, among the rest of these noble heroes. None can deny but he was a great general, a man of courage and conduct, and great personal valour, having signalized himself both at Mons and Maestricht, so as to gain a high and just reputation. He was all along true and firm to the Protestant interest in and out of parliament, though abhorring any base way of promoting it, as well as his friend my lord Russell. This is intended rather as a character, or very short compendium, than any history of his life. He was all along the people's darling, whose hearts were entirely his, by his courtesy and affability, as other persons lost them by their sourness and haughty pride. After Russell's death he went into Flanders, whence had he prosecuted his design, and gone, as it is said he intended, into the emperor's service, how many laurels might he have won, and how many more would now be growing for him? But his fate was otherwise. After the defeat of his army at Sedgmoor, he fled with my lord Gray, who was first taken, and he himself a little after brought up to London, and on his attainder in parliament, beheaded on Tower-Hill. It is said, a certain brave old officer, who then came over with him, and since with the prince, offered with a small party of horse to have ventured through the guards, and took him off the scaffold. But they could not be got together; his time was come. Providence had designed other things, that our deliverance should be more just, peaceable, and wonderful, and that the glory thereof should be reserved for their sacred majesties king William and queen Mary.

"I REPENT in general of all my sins, and am more particularly concerned for what blood hath been spilt on my account, and the rather seeing the issue is such as I fear will prove of fatal consequence to the reformed Protestant religion.

"Instead of being counted factious and rebellious, the very opposing Popery and arbitrary power, now arising and appearing plain enough, would sufficiently have protected my cause; besides, several other most heinous and notorious crimes (such as the unhappy fate of the earl of Essex, and my father of ever blessed memory, and others now covered over with jesuitical policy), should have been detected and avenged.

"I have lived and shall now die in the faith of this, that God will work a deliverance for his people, and then will be discovered the great and horrid, and scarcely to be paralleled villanies our enemies have been guilty of; but now you see my case is desperate, yet know that I die a martyr for the people, and shall rather pity the state, that their false and covetous minds have brought themselves and me to, than discover who are the persons concerned in my overthrow; and I heartily forgive all that have wronged me, even those that have been instrumental in my fall, earnestly praying for their souls.

"And I hope king James will shew himself to be of his brother's blood, and extend his mercy to my children, even as he was wont to his greatest enemies, they being not capable to act, and therefore not conscious of any offence against the government."

NOW Argyle and Monmouth being laid in their graves, king James was so puffed up with a petty victory over a few clubmen, and so wrapt up with a conceit, that he had now conquered the whole nation, (so that now believing himself impregnable) he resolves to be revenged upon the western people for siding with his capital enemy Monmouth, and to that purpose, sends down his executioner in ordinary, Jeffreys, not to decimate according to the heathen way of mercy, but with the beesom of his cruelties, to sweep the country before him, and to depopulate instead of punish; at which time acquaintance or relation of any that fell in the field, with a slender circumstance tacked to either, was a crime sufficient for the extirpation of the family. And young and old were hanged by clusters, as if the chief justice had designed to raise the price of halters; besides the great number of those that upon bare suspicion were transported beyond sea, and there sold for slaves; and the purchase-money given away to satisfy the hunger of needy Papists. After-ages will read with astonishment the barbarous usage of those poor people; of which, among many instances, this one may seem sufficient, whereby to take the dimensions of all the rest: that when the sister of the two Hewlings hung upon the chief justice's coach, imploring mercy on the behalf of her brothers, the merciless judge, to make her let go, caused the coachman to cut her hands and fingers with the lash of his whip. Nor would he allow the respite of the execution but for two days, though the sister with tears in her eyes offered a hundred pounds for so small a favour. And whoever sheltered any of those forlorn creatures, were hurried to the slaughter-house with the same inexorable outrage, without any consideration either of age or sex; witness the execution of the lady Lisle at Winchester. As for Argyle and the duke, though they might die pitied, yet in regard they had declared open hostility, it was no more than upon ill success they were to expect.

Now, to complete our Western martyrology, and that we we may not be too tedious, shall proceed to give the particular cases of those that were condemned and executed in the West, with their Christian behaviour and dying speeches, as their plain country friends have preserved them.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. MATTHEW BRAGG.

MR. Matthew Bragg, the next sufferer under consideration was a gentleman descended from an ancient and good family; he was bred an attorney, in which he practised the law: his case being this, he happened to be upon the road riding home to his house, being come from a gentleman's house for whom he kept courts. He, as before, being met with by a party of horse belonging to the duke of Monmouth, who were going to search the house of a Roman-Catholic for arms, who lived two or three miles from the place where they met him, they required him to go with them, and shew them the way, he knowing the country better than they did; he desired to be excused, telling them, It was none of his business, and besides he had no arms. But his excuses signified nothing, they forced him amongst them, where they went; when being come, a party immediately entered the house, and searched it: Mr. Bragg never dismounted, they being then satisfied, took him along with them to Chard, where the duke of Monmouth then was. Being there, after having set up his horse where he used to do, often having occasion there, he was much tampered with to engage in the design, but he refused it; but the next morning made haste out of town, not seeing the duke at all; calling for his horse, it was told him, that it was seized for the duke's service. So then he took his cane and gloves, and walked to his own house, which was about five or six miles, and was no more concerned in the affair, than that after the duke's defeat at King's-Sedgemoor, some busy person informed, and required a warrant from a justice of peace for the said Mr. Bragg, who obliged himself to enter into a recognizance to appear at the next assizes; the said justice accounting the matter in itself but trivial; and indeed all men did judge him out of danger. At Dorchester he appeared in court to discharge his bail, on which he was presently committed, and the next day being arraigned, pleading not guilty, put himself on the trial, by God and his country, which found him and twenty-eight more of thirty guilty; the lord chief justice often saying, If any lawyer or parson came under his inspection, they should not escape; the evidence against him was the Roman-Catholic, whose house was searched, and a woman of ill fame, to whom the lord chief justice was wonderfully kind; but his evidence, which were more than twenty, to prove his innocence, signified nothing, the jury being well instructed by the lord chief justice. Being thus found guilty, sentence was presently pronounced, and execution awarded, notwithstanding all the interest that was made for him, as before observed.

Being now condemned on Saturday, and ordered to be executed on Monday, he spent the residue of his little time very devoutly, and much becoming a good Christian, and a true Protestant of the church of England, all which availed nothing with this Protestant judge. He was frequently visited by a worthy divine of the church of England, who spent much time with him, and received great satisfaction from him. The said divine told me, That his deportment, behaviour, and conversation, was so much like an extraordinary Christian, that he could not in the least doubt but this violent passage would put him into the fruition of happiness. He wished and desired a little longer time, out of no other design, but thoroughly to repent of his sins, and make himself more sensible of, and fit for to receive the inheritance that is prepared for those that continue in well doing to the end. When he came to the place of execution with great courage and resolution, being as he said, prepared for death, he behaved himself very gravely and devoutly. When he was on the ladder, being asked, Whether he was not sorry for his being concerned in the rebellion?

He replied, That he knew of none that he was guilty of; and prayed them not to trouble him; adding, He was not the first that was martyred; he was so much a Christian as to forgive his enemies. And after some private devotions he suddenly was translated, as we have all hopes to believe, from earth to heaven. The only favour of this Protestant judge was, to give his body to his friends, in order to it's interment amongst his family.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. SMITH, Constable of Chardstock, at the same Time.

THE next eminent person that suffered with him at the same time and place, was one Mr. Smith, who was constable of Chardstock, who having some money in his hands that belonged to the militia, which came to the knowledge of some of the duke's friends, they obliged him to deliver it to them, which he was forced to do; and for this was indicted for high-treason, in assisting the duke of Monmouth, to which he pleaded Not guilty. The evidence against him were the same with those that had been against Mr. Bragg. The said Mr. Smith informed the court and the jury, what little credit ought to be given to the evidence. The lord chief justice thundered at him, saying, Thou villain, methinks I see thee already with a halter about thy neck; thou impudent rebel, to challenge these evidences that are for the king. To which the prisoner replied very boldly, My lord, I now see which way I am going, and right or wrong I must die; but this I comfort myself with, that your lordship can only destroy my body; it is out of your power to touch my soul. God forgive your rashness; pray, my lord, know it is not a small matter you are about, the blood of man is more precious than the whole world. He then was stopped from saying any more. The evidences being heard, a strict charge was given the jury about him. To be short, the jury brought him in guilty; so that he with the rest received sentence of death all together, and were executed on Monday; but by particular order from my lord, he was ordered to be first executed. The day being come for execution, being Monday, he with a courage undaunted was brought to the place, where with Christian exhortations to his brethren that suffered with him, he was ordered to prepare, being the first to be executed, where he spoke the following words:

" CHRISTIAN FRIENDS,

" I AM now, as you see, launching into eternity; so that it may be expected I should speak something before I leave this miserable world, and pass through those sufferings, which are dreadful to flesh and blood; which indeed shall be but little, because I long to be before a just judge, where I must give an account, not only for the occasion of my sufferings now, but for sins long unrepented of, which indeed have brought me to this dismal place and shameful death. And truly, dear countrymen, having ransacked my soul, I cannot find my small concern with the duke of Monmouth doth deserve this heavy judgment on me; but I know, as I said before, it is for sins long unrepented of; I die in charity with all men; I desire all of you to bear me witness, I die a true professor of the church of England; beseeching the Lord still to stand up in the defence of it. God forgive my passionate judge, and cruel and hasty jury; God forgive them, they know not what they have done. God bless the king; and though his judges had no mercy on me, I wish he may find mercy when he standeth most in need of it: make him, O Lord, a nursing father to the church; let mercy flow abundantly from him, if it be thy will, to those poor prisoners, to be hereafter tried; and, Lord, if it be thy holy will, stop this issue of Christian blood, and let my guiltless blood be the last spilt on this account. Gentlemen all, farewell, farewell all the things of the world."

Then having sung some few verses of a psalm, and put up some private ejaculations to himself, he said, " O Lord, Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit;" and so submitted to the executioner, September 7, 1685.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. JOSEPH SPEED, of Culliton.

THIS man suffered at the same time and place: when he came near the place of his execution, spying his countryman and friend, he called him, and said, I am glad to see you here now, because I am not known in these parts; being answered by his friend, I am sorry to see you in this condition: he replies, It is the best day I ever saw; I thank God I have not led my life as unchristian-like as many have done, having since the years of sixteen always had the checks of conscience on me, which made me to avoid many gross and grievous sins; my course of life hath been well known to you, yet I cannot justify myself; all men err. I have not been the least of sinners, therefore cannot excuse myself; but since my confinement I have received so great a comfort, in some assurance of the pardon of my sins, that I can now say, I am willing to die, to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, and say to death, Where is thy sting? And to grave, Where is thy victory? Being asked by some rude soldiers, whether he was not sorry for the rebellion he was found guilty of? He courageously replied, If you call it a rebellion, I assure you I had no sinister ends in being concerned; for my whole design in taking up arms under the duke of Monmouth, was to fight for the Protestant religion, which my own conscience dictated me to, and which the said duke declared for, and had, I think, a lawful call and warrant for so doing, and do not question, if I have committed any sin in it, but that it is pardoned: pray, Mr. Sheriff, let me be troubled no more in answering of questions, but give me leave to prepare myself (those few minutes I have left) for another world, and go to my Jesus, who is ready to receive me: then calling to his friend, who stood very near him, said, My dear friend, you know I have a dear wife and children, who will find me wanting, being somewhat incumbered in the world; let me desire you as a dying man, to see that she be not abused; and as for my poor children, I hope the Father of heaven will take care of them, and give them grace to be dutiful to their distressed mother; and so with my dying love to all my friends, when you see them, I take leave of you, and them, and all the world, desiring your christian prayers for me to the last moment; then repeating some sentences of scripture, as, Colossians iii. 1, 2. If ye then, &c. and praying very fervently, said, I thank God I have satisfaction; I am ready and willing to suffer shame for his name: and so pouring forth some private ejaculations to himself, and lifting up his hands, the executioner did his office: the soldiers then present said, They never before were so taken with a dying man's speech; his courage and christian-like resolution caused many violent men against the prisoners, to repent of their tyranny towards them; some of whom in a short time died full of horror: and thus fell this good man, a true Protestant, and one that held out to the last.

The MARTYRDOM of JOHN SPRAGE and Colonel HOLMES, at Bridport and Lyme.

JOHNSprage, who suffered at Bridport, was a very good man, and behaved himself with a great deal of christian-like courage to the end: his speech and his devotions, &c. must be omitted, not being possible to take them, by reason of the rudeness, &c. and the shortness of the time allowed him by the officers.

There were executed with Mr. John Sprage twelve in the county of Dorset. Mr. John Sprage of Lyme, a man more fit to die, than he that condemned him was fit to live: he was a zealous Christian, and a man that in a manner lived in heaven while on earth; he was but of an ordinary estate in this world: but to be short, his praise, his worth, his fame will never die in those places where known: he went about doing good, even in his worldly employments, as I have been credibly informed; hardly any thing coming that way, but what his spiritual meditations were upon. He was apprehended near Salisbury, brought to Dorchester, where I saw him several times, and was conversant with him before his trial; he carried himself very moderately to all; some of divers principles in matters of religion, he continually prayed with them, advising and instructing them to those holy duties which were necessary to salvation. Being asked, how he could endure those hardships he had undergone since his being taken? Says he, If this be all, it is not so much; but my friend, if you were to take a journey in those ways you were not acquainted with, you would (I hope) desire advice from those that had formerly used those ways, or lived near by them: Yes, says he. Then said he, The ways of affliction which I have lately travelled in, I had advice many a time from a minister, who hath often told his congregation of the troublesomeness of the road, and of the difficulty of getting through; and hath given me, and hundreds of others to understand the pits and stones in the way, and how to avoid them; he has been a man used to these roads many years; I have taken his advice; I am got thus far on comfortably, and I trust shall do so to the end; I am not afraid to fight a duel with death, if so it must be: now I thank God I can truly say, O death, where is thy sting? And, O grave, where is thy victory? Two or three days after their sentence, they were drawn to execution, but were very rudely and opprobriously dealt with, to the shame of those that then had the charge over them; their rigour unto them was more like Turks than Christians. But to conclude, being come to the place of execution he prayed very devoutly with them all, but by the rudeness of the guards, there could be no copy taken that could be said to be true: all of them died very courageously, especially this stout christian champion, who spoke to them in these words (looking on the soldiers) saying, Little do you think that this very body of mine, which you are now come to see cut in pieces, will one day rise up in judgment against you, and be your accuser, for your delight in spilling of christian blood; the heathens have far more mercy: O it is sad, when England must out-strip Infidels and Pagans! but pray take notice, do not think that I am not in charity with you; I am so far, that I forgive you and all the world; and do desire the God of mercies to forgive you, and open your hearts, and turn you from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to the Lord Jesus Christ; and so farewell. I am going out of the power of you all; I have no dependence but upon my blessed Redeemer, to whom I commit my dear wife and children, and all my family.

There were many of note executed at Lyme, particularly colonel Holmes, who was the first of those there executed, near the same place where they landed, when they came ashore with the duke of Monmouth, being brought to the place after some difficulty; for the horses that were first put into the sledge would not stir, which obliged those concerned to get others, which they did from the coachman, who had that morning brought them to town; when they were put into the sledge, they broke it in pieces, which caused the prisoners to go on foot to the place of execution; where being come, as I told you before, the colonel began thus at the foot of the ladder: he sat down with an aspect altogether void of fear, but, on the contrary, with a kind of smiling countenance, began to speak to the spectators to this purpose, that he would give them an account of his first undertaking in the design, which was long before in London; for there he agreed to stand by, and assist the duke of Monmouth, when opportunity offered; in order to which, he went to Holland with him, and there continued until this expedition, in which God had thought fit to frustrate his and other good men's expectations: he believed the Protestant religion was bleeding, and in a step towards extirpation, and therefore he with these his brethren that were to suffer with him, and thousands more, had adventured their lives and their all to save it; but God Almighty had not appointed them to be the instruments in so glorious a work; yet notwithstanding withstanding he did verily believe, and doubted not, that God would make use of others, that should meet with better success, though the way or means was not yet visible, but of this he did not doubt; he also was satisfied of the duke's title, so that matter did not afflict him on account of his engaging on this score: and going on further with a discourse of this nature, he was asked by a person, Why he did not pray for the king? He with a smiling countenance answered, I am sorry you do not yet understand the difference between speaking and praying: and having ended his discourse, he then prepared himself by prayer for his dissolution, which for half an hour was very devout and pious.

Having finished his prayer, he took occasion to speak to his suffering brethren, taking a solemn leave of them, encouraging them to hold out to the end, and not to waver, observing that this being a glorious sun-shining day, I doubt not, though our breakfast be sharp and bitter, it will prepare us, and make us meet for a comfortable supper, with our God and Saviour, where all sin and sorrow shall be wiped away; so embracing each of them, and kissing of them, told the sheriff, You see I am imperfect, only one arm, I shall want assistance to help me upon this tragical stage; which was presently done, and execution suddenly took place.

The colonel with eleven more were brought from Dorchester to Lyme, six in a coach, and six in a cart; as he was drawn through the town, he cheerfully beholding the people, advised them not to be discouraged at their severe deaths; for that though it was their hard fortunes to lose the day in so good a cause, yet he questioned not but it would be revived again, and by such means as he nor they could not imagine; God, I hope and trust, will never let this nation fall into Popery. Being brought to the inn, where they stopped near two hours, until the butchers had prepared every thing for the slaughter, they were visited by a very worthy divine, and vicar of that town, who offered them those spiritual helps, usual on those occasions, which some of them embraced, and others not; their principles being different from the church of England. The gaoler speaking to colonel Holmes to knock off his irons, he said, Great men of state wear chains, and it is accounted for their honour, but though there is a vast difference betwixt those golden ones and mine, yet I take mine to be more honourable, as that good apostle said, he accounted it an honour to suffer shame for his master's name; the sledge being in readiness they prepared to enter it; but alas! who should draw such men to execution? Though men were so bloody, the very beasts refused to draw them; and instead of going forward, they went backwards, and could by no means be made to do it, which so enraged some persons, that they took the coach-horses out of the coach, and placed them to the sledge; but presently the sledge broke in pieces; then spoke this worthy good man: Pray, gentlemen, you see all your strivings will not do to draw us to execution, I verily believe there is more in it than you are aware of; pray read about the prophet, that went out of God's way, his beast saw what he could not, and turned aside. Give us leave and we will walk to the place.

Being there come, the colonel prepared first to mount that tragical stage, the heads of his speech you have before; embracing his fellow-sufferers, and kissing them, and giving them some spiritual comforts; he desired help of the sheriff to go up the ladder, having but one arm, and the gallows higher than ordinary, which was granted; and in a short time after the executioner performed his task.

The colonel in his prayer not mentioning the king, he was charged as before; to which he replied, He prayed for him in general, praying for all mankind. Thus fell the valiant and good Christian, colonel Holmes; his dying words were afterwards found to come to pass; he was much lamented by all that saw him, except by some, who, it was feared, were delivered up to a seared conscience.

The MARTYRDOM of Messrs. SAMPSON LARKE, CHRISTOPHER BATTISCOMB, Dr. TEMPLE, Captains MATTHEWS, MADDERS, and KIDD, Mr. JOSEPH TYLER, &c. &c.

MR. Sampson Larke, who was a very eminent, pious man, and had lived in that town, but a little before, many years; he was there well acquainted, and all people that knew him had a value for him, behaving himself with that humility and circumspection, as nobody could have any occasion but to value him: he designed to have spoken somewhat on a portion of scripture, and was beginning, having mentioned the place he intended to speak upon, but was interrupted, and told, the work of the day being great, they should want time. So then he stopped, and replied, He could make application where he should not meet with interruption: and so applied himself to prayer, which he performed with great devotion and zeal for a quarter of an hour, to the great satisfaction of the auditors; and so taking leave of his suffering brethren, he mounted the stage, which was to be the last act he made in this world: being on the ladder, he saw some of his friends and neighbours weeping and mourning for him, to whom he spoke, Pray weep not for me, I am going to a place of bliss and happiness, wherefore pray repair to your houses, and ere you get thither, I doubt not but I shall be happy with my God and Saviour, where all tears shall be wiped away, and nothing shall remain but hallelujahs to all eternity.

There was also Mr. William Hewling, of London, a young gentleman under twenty, who came over with the duke of Monmouth; he seemed to be in a calm and composed frame of spirit, and with a great deal of courage and seriousness he behaved himself. There is already something said of his conversation and discourse; therefore we shall say nothing more of him, but that in all manner of appearance he died a good Christian, a true Protestant, and doubtless now enjoys the benefit of it. There were several worthy gentlemen more there executed, viz. Mr. Christopher Battiscomb, Dr. Temple, captain Madders, captain Matthews, captain Kidd, &c. in all, twelve, who all of them died with that courage and resolution as became Christians.

We proceed now to other parts of the country, where with the like butchery were only five executed, amongst whom was one Mr. Tyler, of Bristol, who had had a command in the duke's army, where he behaved himself very stoutly to the last; after the army was dispersed, he among others was taken, received sentence of death at Dorchester, and here brought for the completion of the same, and from thence we hope was translated to heaven. He spent his time between the sentence and execution very devoutly, in confirming and strengthening those that were to be his fellow-sufferers; and made it his business to bring them to a willingness to submit to, and a preparedness for death: the day being come, and he brought to the place of execution, he thus spoke, My friends, you see I am now on the brink of eternity, and in a few minutes shall be but clay; you expect I should say something, as is usual in such cases; as to the matter of fact I die for, it doth not much trouble me, knowing to myself the ends for which I engaged with the duke of Monmouth were both good and honourable. Here being stopped, and not suffered to proceed further, he then comforted his fellow-sufferers, desiring them to join with him in singing an hymn, which he himself composed for the occasion.

When the hymn was finished, he prayed devoutly for half an hour; after prayer he gave great satisfaction to all present of his assurance of heaven, had many weeping eyes for him, and was much lamented in the town, though a stranger to the place; so unbuttoning himself, said to the executioner, I fear not what man can do unto me; I pray thee do thy work in mercy, for I forgive thee with all my heart, and I also pray to God to forgive thee; do not mangle my body too much; and so lifting up his hands to heaven, the executioner did his office. There was also one William Cox that died with him, who also died very courageously, despising the shame, in hopes and expectation of a future better estate.

He and his two sons were some of the first that came to the duke of Monmouth, and all taken, and all condemned together: the father only suffered, the sons by providence were preserved. When he was going to execution he desired to see his sons, then in another prison in the town, to whom he gave his blessing; and though he was going to be executed, yet had that satisfaction to hope that Almighty God would preserve them, which really happened.

Account of Messrs. GLISSON, JOHN SAVAGE, RICHARD HALL, JOHN SPRAGUE, and WILLIAM CLEGG, who were executed at Sherborne.

THERE were twelve executed at Sherborne, in the same county, who all died courageously, especially one Mr. Glisson, of Yeovil, in the county of Somerset; his extraordinary deportment and carriage at the place of execution, was so very considerable, as gave great satisfaction to his friends, and amazement to his enemies. He declared to the world that he was a true Protestant, and had not engaged with the duke of Monmouth, but judged it high time to stand up for the same, though God Almighty had thought fit to frustrate his designs, and to bring him to that place to seal the same with his blood.

Likewise, John Savage and Richard Hall, of Culliton, in the county of Devon, suffered at the same time and place; in their particular conversation they valued those most that they saw most of piety in, and pitied others that they saw not so well prepared; saying, that the remembrance of our vanity may cause compassion towards such as were in such a condition; exhorting all to be serious, and to consider their latter end, which deserved the greatest attention of mind; the way to die comfortably, being to prepare for it seriously; and if God should miraculously preserve us from this death now before our eyes, it should be the duty of us all to spend the remaining part of our time in such a manner as now, when we see death just at the door. At the hour of execution their cheerfulness and comfort was much increased, saying, Now the will of God will be done, and he hath most certainly chosen that for us which is best; with many other such like Christian expressions, too tedious here to be inserted, because we design to keep to our first intentions, and not to swell the account too large. Upon the whole, after they had with much earnestness recommended their souls to the all-wise God by prayer, they all with much content and satisfaction submitted themselves to the executioner, not doubting of a happy translation, and accordingly were executed and quartered; the rest of the executions in this county, as at Weymouth, Pool, Shafton, Wimborne, &c. not being ascertained, we shall pass over, and only give you particular touches, which we saw to our perfect knowledge.

John Sprague and William Clegg, of Culliton, in the county of Devon, were condemned at Exon, and there brought to be executed. Before they were brought into the place, a messenger came from the prisoners with a request to the vicar of the parish, to desire his company and assistance in this their extremity, and to administer those spiritual helps that were suitable to men in their circumstances. Accordingly the said minister came very readily, and did demand of them, What they had to desire of him? The dying persons answered, They desired his prayers. Accordingly he prayed with them a considerable space of time. And after that, he asked of them several questions, for to give him and the world satisfaction of the prepared condition they were in, in order to their launching into eternity, especially about the doctrine of non-resistance. John Sprague very soberly and moderately replied, but whether satisfactory or not, we leave to the reader; He believed that no Christian ought to resist a lawful power; but the case being between Popery and Protestantism, altered the matter; and the latter being in danger, he believed that it was lawful for him to do what he did, though God in his providence had thought fit to bring him to this place of execution. After reading a chapter out of the Corinthians, and singing a psalm suitable to the occasion, he very vehemently and fervently recommended his soul to the all-wise God by prayer for near half an hour, to the great satisfaction of all that heard him; then his wife and children coming to him, weeping bitterly, he embraced them in his arms, saying, Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your sins, for that he had that quiet satisfaction, that he was only going to be translated into a state of bliss and happiness, where he should sin and sorrow no more, but that all tears should be wiped away, wishing them to be diligent in the service of God. Then recommending his wife and children to the protection of the Almighty God, who had promised to be a husband to the widow, and a father to the fatherless, who was faithful and able to make up their loss in him, in that which should be better for them than he could be; desiring God to be a refuge for them to fly to for security and preservation from the troubles that seemed to threaten this poor nation: the which they did conscientiously perform, though death here made a separation, he doubted not of meeting them in heaven at last. And so the executioner performed his task.

In the interim his brother-sufferer, William Clegg, was all the time on his knees, praying to himself with a seeming zeal; suddenly after which, his time being come to follow his brother, he only told the people, That his fellow-sufferer had spoken what he thought was necessary, and they were also his sentiments; and so submitted to execution.

An Account of Mr. ROSE, Mr. EVANS, &c. who were executed at Axminster and Honiton.

THERE was one executed at Axminster, whose name was Mr. Rose; he was a gunner that landed with the duke of Monmouth, he had great resolution, and not at all startled with the fear of death. He said, That he defied death, and all them that were the occasion of it. He was very courageous, and died so. He spent some time in private prayer, and was not allowed time, because there was to be an execution at Honiton; so that his execution being over, we passed on to Honiton, where four were executed, one of which was a surgeon, his name, as is supposed, was Mr. Port, who behaved himself with that extraordinary Christian courage, that all the spectators were almost astonished, he being but young, about twenty, his prayers being fervent, his expressions so pithy, and so becoming a Christian of greater age, that drew pity and compassion from all present; a rude fellow, just before he was to be executed, called for a bottle of wine, and so began drinking the king's health to one of the guard, which he perceiving, Poor soul, said he, your cup seemeth to be sweet to you, and you think mine is bitter; which indeed is so to flesh and blood; but yet I have that assurance of the fruition of a future state, that I doubt not but this bitter potion will be sweetened with the loving-kindness of my dearest Saviour, that I shall be translated into such a state, where is fulness of joy and pleasure for evermore.

Likewise Mr. Evans, a minister, ought not to be omitted, who did all along, in the time of his confinement in prison, behave himself with that devotion and strictness, that became a Christian of great eminency, as indeed he was; he spent much of his time in preaching and praying to his fellow-prisoners, exhorting them to hold out to the end; he at last by appointment, being condemned, was executed by himself; at which time and place he behaved himself with great courage and devotion, and with a great willingness and cheerfulness he submitted to execution. There might have been much more said of this worthy man, but because we will keep to our design, shall be omitted. Many others, who were also very eminent, suffered in this county, for asserting and endeavouring to secure the Protestant religion.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. SIMON HAMLING and Mr. CATCHETT, at Taunton.

IT is now necessary to add, the unfortunate case of Mr. Simon Hamling, at Taunton, in order to shew that sometimes innocency will not protect. Mr. Hamling was formerly an inhabitant of the place, but of late years had lived two or three miles from thence; he was a very honest, worthy, good Christian; but was a dissenter, and indeed in the judgment of some fiery men, that might be crime enough, as did too sadly appear in divers cases. But to our purpose: Mr. Hamling living in the country, hearing of the duke of Monmouth's being in town, he there came to speak with his son, who lived in that place; where being come, he gave him advice, which was, that as he expected his blessing and countenance, he should not at all concern himself in the matter, but submit to the will of God in all things. And having thus advised his son, he returns home; and two days after came again to town on a market-day with his wife, to buy provisions for his family, and returned to his house again. And this was all the times he was in town while the duke was there. But after the business was over, he was brought in on suspicion, being a dissenter, that was crime enough, except money appeared to a justice of that town, who usually did commit or dismiss as that appeared. This man was arraigned at Taunton, pleaded not guilty. The matter above is the truth of this case; the evidences were two profligate rascals, that had encouragement from the justice, they usually doing what he put them on. The prisoner had many to prove this fact, and his honesty; but this did not avail, the jury found him guilty, with two more, who were presently sentenced, and next morning executed, to be examples to others. It is said, the justice made application to our famous Protestant judge, and hinted some mistake concerning him. To which, as I have been informed, he should reply, you have brought him on; if he be innocent, his blood be upon you. Which was a very fine reply from a merciful judge, but nothing else could be expected, as the whole treatise evinceth: the tender mercies of the wicked being cruel. This man behaved himself very worthily at the place of execution, and did at the last declare his crime to be the same as is above mentioned, and not otherwise. Thus fell this pious Christian, a man by all sober people that knew him beloved, and disrespected by none but loose villains, who took away his life at last.

There was one Mr. Catchett executed with him, his crime, being a constable of the hundred, he was surprised by a party of the duke's, and shewed a warrant to bring in provisions and other necessaries for the use of the army, which if he had not obeyed, was threatened to have his house burnt, &c. so that he was obliged to do what he did for his own preservation; but this was not sufficient, for being found guilty, he was also executed at the same time and place.

*The Embarrassments and Escape of Mr. THOMAS
LAWRENCE, &c. &c.*

MR. THOMAS LAWRENCE, at Dorchester, was also dealt very hardly with. He had the managing of an estate belonging to a person of quality, who had a barn in the parish of Lyme, where the duke landed. The day after his landing a party came and took away three horses from off this estate, which he having the trust and care of, makes application to the duke for them, adding, that he ought not to suffer any of his master's goods to be wanting, but must endeavour to recover them again. Thus he entreated the duke for the horses, but all would not prevail; but at last had one, and was forced to leave two. This was looked on as an abetting, judged to be by consent. After the defeat was given, he was had before a justice of the peace, who bound him over to the assizes, where appearing, he was committed; pleaded not guilty on his trial, which he pleaded to very honestly, yet was found guilty, and sentenced to die. My lord was excellent at improvement, it was thought he would, if possible, have brought in the gentleman that owned the estate, who was very rich. This honest Mr. Lawrence was to be sacrificed, and his execution ordered to be at Warham; but my lord's favourite got a reprieve for him by the help of four hundred pounds, two hundred pounds being actually paid, the other secured by bond.

I promised, before I conclude, to give some account of the barbarous and cruel whippings, which were executed on many good, honest, and sufficient persons, both men and women, in the counties of Dorset, Devon, and Somerset, by the severe and cruel sentence of the lord chief justice; some for such small crimes, as an impartial man may judge they deserved none at all; more especially one Mr. Stayle, of Thorncomb, in Devonshire, his sufferings were so hard, that it caused many to pity him; he was a good liver, well beloved among his neighbours, and a true Protestant.

One Mrs. Brown, of Lyme, suffered very dear in that nature; she only jokingly said unto the officer of the excise, I will pay my excise to king Monmouth; which being sworn before this severe judge, she was found guilty of a misdemeanor, was sentenced to be whipped in several market-towns, which accordingly was done. But this cruelty was not only extended to those of riper years, and able better to endure those painful sufferings, but even to children.

A poor boy of Weymouth, in the county of Dorset, having got some pamphlet relating somewhat to satisfy the people that the duke of Monmouth came to secure the Protestant religion, had the hard fortune to take his trial before this harsh judge; he was said to be about ten or twelve years of age; he had the flesh of his back so cut with whipping, that some say he died with the same; but whether he died or not, never was such cruelty in all this world.

A full Account of the MARTYRDOM of CAPTAIN MADDERS, in the County of Somerset.

THIS Captain Madders, at the time of the duke's landing, was a constable at Crewkern, in the county of Somerset, and so diligent and active for the king in his office, that when two gentlemen of Lyme came there, and brought the news of the duke's landing, and desired horses to ride post to acquaint his majesty therewith, he immediately secured horses for them, the town being generally otherways bent, and assisted them so far as any called loyal, in those times, could do; which was represented to the lord chief justice, in expectation thereby to save his life. But an inquiry being made about his religion, and returned by a very worthy gentleman of those parts, That he was a good Protestant, an honest man, had a very good character amongst his neighbours: O then, says he, I will hold a wager with you he is a Presbyterian, I can smell them forty miles. Though moderately I now say, they could smell him two hundred miles west; then surely he must die, because he was, and had the character of an honest man, a good Christian, and a brave tradesman. But to be short, I could say a great deal more of him, being immediately acquainted with him, and was with him to the very last. Being brought to the place of execution, he was the last man except one executed, and he behaved himself, whilst the rest were executing, with great zeal; and lifting up his hands and eyes, would often say, Lord, make me so willing and ready to the last. And God did hear his prayers; for though he seemed to the spectators to be somewhat unwilling to die, yet at the last he died with as much assurance and Christian resolution as any; for after his public prayer he came once down the ladder, and prayed again privately, then mounted the ladder again; the sheriff saying, Mr. Madders, if you please you may have more liberty; he answered, No, I thank you, Mr. Sheriff, now I am ready, I am willing, and desire to be dissolved, and to be be with Christ. Oh! you cannot imagine what comfort and refreshment I have received in a few minutes; my comforts are so great that I cannot contain myself. So blessing and praising of God, he was translated, as I hope (we have no grounds to imagine the contrary) from earth to heaven, repeating Rev. xx. 6. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power."

A full Account of the MARTYRDOM of CAPTAIN KIDD, at the same Time.

CAPTAIN KIDD was the last executed at that time, as we have observed before; as soon as captain Madders was turned off; he began to prepare to follow, and called to the guards and them present, Do you see this? (pointing up to eleven that were dead before him) Do you think this is not dreadful to me, that eleven of twelve of us, that but a few hours hence came down together, are dead and in eternity? And I am just going to follow them, and shall immediately be in the same condition. Says one to him, It must be dreadful to flesh and blood. Says he, Well, gentlemen, I will assure you, I am so far concerned, that methinks I begrudge their happiness, that they should be so long before me in bliss and happiness: but I will make haste to follow; I am satisfied this is the best day that ever I saw: the day of a man's death is said to be better than the day of his birth: and truly so I find it as to my flesh, for I shall be presently free from sin and sorrow; I am satisfied God hath done his best for me: I might have lived and have forgotten God, but now I am going where I shall sin no more: it is a blessed thing to be free from sin, and to be with Christ: O how great were the sufferings of Christ for us, beyond all that I can undergo! How great is that glory to which I am going! Then taking his leave of the people then present, he prayed some small time very devoutly, and with seeming great joy and comfort; and the executioner did his office.

A full Account of the MARTYRDOM of Dr. TEMPLE, SAMUEL ROBINS, CHARLES SPEAK, and Mr. PARROT, at Taunton.

DOCTOR TEMPLE was one of them that landed with the duke, and was his chief physician and chirurgeon; he lived in Nottingham, but minding to see other parts of the world (as I have heard) goes for Holland, where he came acquainted with the duke of Monmouth; concerning which he thus spoke, just as he was going off the ladder.

"Christian Friends, and Dear Countrymen,

I Have somewhat to say, and not very much, before I depart from you, and shall be seen no more, And,

"First, As to my engagement with the duke of Monmouth.

"Secondly, How far I was concerned: and,

"Thirdly, I shall leave all of you to be judges in matter of fact.

"First, As a dying man I now declare, that when I entered myself with the duke of Monmouth, to be his chirurgeon, it was on no other account but to serve him in the West-Indies; where I knew no other design whatsoever, but to possess himself of some of those islands, until I had been at sea two days, wherein one privately told me, we were absolutely bound for England, and I should take it from him it was true: it much surpris'd me, but knowing no way to avoid it, or to get on shore, though it was at that time contrary to my inclinations, if I could have avoided it, I would not let others see that I had that dissatisfaction within me. After our landing at Lyme, I knew it was never the nearer to attempt my escape, the country being so beset; on the other hand, if the duke of Monmouth did win the day, I might have rais'd my fortunes as high as I could expect: these were the arguments that flesh and blood did create in my breast for self-preservation.

While I was with the said duke, I did him as much service as I could, and faithfully: after it pleas'd God to disperse the army under his command, I endeavour'd to secure myself, but by Providence was taken at Hinton, from thence committed to Exon, and after removed to Dorchester, where I received my sentence, and am now, as you see, just going to execution: the Lord prevent all of you from such ignominious deaths; and I advise you all, that you never take any great thing in hand, but what you have a warrant for from the Lord: I assure you I had no satisfaction in this; but this I am sure, that if I have done any thing amiss in it, it is pardoned; I bless God I have that satisfaction, I die a professor of the church of England; I desire pardon of all those I have any ways wronged or abused, as I freely forgive all those that have wronged or abused me; I am in charity with all men. Lord have mercy upon me, give me strength to go through these pains, and give me full assurance now at these my last moments: come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

There was also one Samuel Robbins, of Charmouth, in the county of Dorset, executed or rather murdered, at Warham, in the said county: we cannot pass him by in silence, his case being so extraordinary hard, that to speak moderately between the king and his case, we verily believe never man suffered innocenter; and this our readers will be satisfied in, after they have heard his crime, and on what small grounds he was found guilty, or so supposed, by my lord chief justice.

Mr. Robbins used generally in summer to use the craft of fishing, to get a competent maintenance for his family, and happened to be out at sea a fishing before Lyme that day the duke came into land; and was commanded on board one of the duke's ships, he not knowing who they were, and they bought his fish of him; after which they told him that was the duke of Monmouth, pointing at him, and that he was just going to land: he desired to go on shore, which was refused, and was told, that as soon as the duke was landed he should have his liberty; so accordingly he came on shore, and was never after with him, or ever took up arms under him: I leave the reader to judge whether this was high treason or no. This was all he was guilty of, except that he was a good honest man, a zealous Christian, a man of very good life and conversation, as I think his neighbours will attest it, in most towns and parishes where he lived: but alas! he had a good book in his house when taken, called, The Solemn League and Covenant; this was the high treason he must be guilty of, which was aggravated to the lord chief justice, by one or two hot spirits his neighbours. But to be short, he received sentence of death with great courage, and not at all dismayed, saying very often in prison before, if it pleas'd God to call him now (to glorify his name by this Providence of his) to death, he should be ready; but, said he, I am as innocent of any thing I have done against any man that may deserve this punishment, as the child now unborn. When he came to the place of execution, he very cheerfully declared his innocency to the spectators, as before, and so praying very devoutly for some time, he was executed: his prayer we have no exact copy of.

There was also one Mr. Charles Speak, of London, a gentleman of good extraction, being son to the worshipful George Speak, Esq. near Ilminster, in the county of Somerset, where he was executed: his case also was extraordinary hard; but there may be two great reasons given why he was executed; the first was, because he came from that good pious family, which always have been opposers to Popery, and suffered deeply for their courage that way. Secondly, the said Mr. Charles Speak had purchased some great place in the King's-Bench, or Common-Pleas, which was very profitable to him; so that by his fall, there being a forfeiture, much money might be made of it; all intercession could not avail with the lord chief justice, for his life. He happened to be at Ilminster at the time of the duke's being there, which was the greatest crime he was guilty of; the validity of his evidence I leave to those in the West, who know how far it was carried that way. He was a fine courteous loving gentleman.

leman; and notwithstanding his youth, he acted the part of an old christian soldier at his death, preparing himself to undergo those pains, saying very often, they were nothing to his deserts from God Almighty; but as for what I am accused of, and sentenced for, I hope you will believe I am not so guilty as my judge and accusers have endeavoured to make me; if it had pleased God, I should have been willing to have lived some time longer, but God's time being come, I am willing, I will be contented to drink this bitter cup off. Being at the place of execution, the crowd was so great, that I suppose he was shorter than otherwise he would have been; but alas, how could it be? For on every side of him, as well as up and down the town, the inhabitants were weeping and bewailing. Oh it is the worst day that ever we saw in this town! Must this good gentleman die here? Oh yet save his life, I am ready to die for him! And the like. He prayed very heartily for near an hour, and sung a psalm, and so we hope was translated to heaven, there to sing everlasting praises and hallelujahs. His father and mother, as may be easily judged, were not a little concerned about him; but their adversaries malice ended not here, but father and mother must be brought in, and how many thousands of pounds it cost them, is too well known in London to be here recorded; and most parts of the kingdom have heard in the public letters their names mentioned. Some may think they were concerned with the duke, but we never heard there was so much made appear against them, as could have made them to have been brought in guilty of high misdemeanors, had not the good gentleman and his lady been virtuous people, abhorring the debaucheries of the times, and of such a competent estate, able to spare ten or twelve thousand pounds; the hard usage this honest brave gentleman and his virtuous lady had, and their sufferings, to relate them, would be too numerous; and besides, it is so well known in most places in the West, that we shall, without saying any more, proceed with our further information.

Mr. Parrat, who was executed at Taunton: said (as it is supposed) he was a Londoner, and a brewer. When he came to the place of execution, he seemed a man almost unconcerned at death. After some time he began to deliver himself somewhat low in voice to the people, and after rising by degrees, he seemed more like a minister in the pulpit preaching devoutly, than a prisoner just going to execution; beholding the surrounding people in tears he desired all not to be faint-hearted because of their fall, and to think that there were no hopes remaining. He said, he verily believed God would yet work out deliverance for them, and the time they were in the greatest extremity, that would be God's opportunity. Put your whole trust, confidence, and dependence on the Lord, and he will never leave you, nor forsake you.

WHILE Mr. Boddy was in prison, especially after sentence, he behaved himself mighty humble, meek, and was much in meditation, which was observed by several divines, especially one who attended him to the last, whose name was Mr. Simpson. His poor wife coming to see him at Wells, and to make her interest with some friends, if possible to save his life; but finding it lost labour, and that she could by no means prevail, she died there for grief before her husband was executed, to his great grief. When he came to the place of execution, he delivered himself to the people as follows:

"Good people, I am come here to pay a debt due to nature, which every one, one time or another, must pay, though not in this manner or nature. I am condemned as a traitor and rebel against my king, which were things I always hated and abhorred; and therefore give me so much time as to deliver myself to you: and what I say I hope you will believe at this time, being just going to give an account, not only for every idle word, but for all things I have done since I have had a being.

"I was born in Lyme-Regis, in the county of Dorset, and bred up a seaman from my infancy; I have had the honour to serve his majesty king Charles the Second, in his wars with the Dutch and French, divers times. I always thought it to be the duty of every true Englishman to stand up in his country's quarrel with foreigners, to maintain our ancient privileges and honour of our nation. I served him faithfully: and as for any undertaking now with the late duke of Monmouth, for which I am now come to suffer death; as for my designs, I am sure they were good, for I did believe him to be my sovereign's son and heir; but if otherwise, I have done amiss and am sorry, and hope the Lord hath pardoned it. While I was in arms, I am sure there is none can say I have personally wronged them. I desire all your prayers for me to the last. I am no orator, therefore if you please (speaking to the minister) do these last spiritual services for me, as for to pray with me, and for me."

The minister being much taken with him, desired leave of the sheriff to ask him some questions; which being granted, the minister said unto him, I must make bold with you, but not to hold you too long before I pray, but to satisfy myself and the people on what ground you stand; I mean as concerning your everlasting state. Now pray resolve me a few things: First, Whether you do own that doctrine of non-resistance, owned by the church, That it is not lawful on any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the king? O sir, as to that I answer, Could I have been satisfied he had been my lawful prince, I should not have done it. But, said the minister, he is, and you are not to be judge; except you own those things, some people will hardly have charity for you after you are dead. What matters that? said he, Would you have me, now you put me so close to it, to lie? No, I will not. I say, if he was my lawful king, I was misled in my judgment, and have committed a great error; but, Lord, I hope thou hast washed away all my sins, in and through the blood of my dear Redeemer, in whose merits alone I hope for mercy. I desire to be asked no more questions. Then the minister prayed very devoutly near half an hour; after which, lifting up his hands and eyes to heaven, he quietly submitted to his execution.

"I Suppose the spectators here present may expect that I should say something before I leave this sanguinary stage and passage through my bloody sufferings, by which my immortal spirit will be speedily transported into an invisible and eternal world: and I conclude they have different resentments hereof. Some resent them with much joy, high exultation, and triumph; others with equal grief and sorrow; that to the one I am a most pleasant spectacle, that they behold me with high complacency and delight; but to the other I am a mournful and unpleasant one, and they behold me with no less pity and compassion. Concerning the first, I can say, I freely forgive them, and heartily pray that God would most mercifully and graciously prevent their mourning through misery, not only here, but eternally hereafter. Concerning the other, I will say, Weep for your own sins, and for the sins of the nation, for the highest rebellions that ever were committed against the great and eternal God; lament bitterly for those sins that have been the meritorious cause of the late terrible judgment, that which I fear will cause God to break in upon this nation with an overflowing deluge of judgments, which are far more tremendous and dreadful. As for sympathizing with me, in drinking this bitter cup appointed for me, I return you most humble and hearty thanks, earnestly desiring God to come unto you, and fill your souls with all celestial comforts and spiritual consolations. Something I must say to purge and clear myself from a false accusation laid to my charge; as that I was engaged with colonel Blood, in rescuing colonel Mason, near Boston, when he was sent down with a guard from London to York, to be tried for high-treason; and that I was the man that killed the barber of that city; and that I also was with him when he stole the crown. Now as I am a dying man, and upon the very brink of a stupendous eternity (the truth and reality whereof I firmly believe) without any reservation, or the least equivocation, I do declare in the presence of the all-seeing God, that impartial Judge, before whom in a very little time I must appear, I never saw nor conversed with Mr. Thomas Blood, from 1656, till after he stole the crown, which was in 1671, or 1672, nor was ever engaged with him in any of his treasonable plots or practices. It is true, I being involved in great trouble of another nature (of which I have given to the world a narrative, and which is notoriously known in the country where I then lived, by some that were enemies to me for my preaching) I was persuaded to apply myself to Mr. Blood, to procure by his intercession his late majesty's gracious favour: accordingly he brought me into his royal presence; while I was there, his majesty carried it with great clemency, without expressing one word of that which I am now charged with. Mr. Blood continued with his majesty a little longer than I did; then he told me that he had granted me a pardon, which I did thankfully accept of, knowing it would free me from all penalties and troubles that I was liable to, and were occasioned by my non-conformity. Then engaging him to take out my pardon; he told me, That he got it out with several others that had been engaged with him in several treasonable designs and actions; at which I was troubled, supposing it might be imputed to me thereby; yet, God knows, I have often since reflected upon it with great regret and dissatisfaction. If Mr. Blood did inform the late king to make himself the more considerable, and to bring as many of his party as he could to accept of their pardons, that he might be rendered utterly incapable of plotting any further mischief against his government, or any otherwise that I was engaged with him in any of his treasonable attempts; I now appeal to God, as a dying man, concerning it, that he hath done me an irreparable wrong. I also in the same manner do declare, that I was never engaged with any party in plotting or designing, or contriving any rebellion against the late king, and particularly, that I was altogether unconcerned in and unacquainted with that for which my lord Russell and others suffered, and as much a stranger to any against the present king. And whereas it is reported of me, that at Taunton I persuaded the late duke of Monmouth to assume the title of king; I do once more solemnly declare, That I saw not the said duke, nor had any conversation with him until he came to Shipton-Mallet, which was thirteen days after he landed, and several days after he had been at Taunton. And it is as false that I rid to and fro in the West to stir up and persuade men to go into his army, and rebel against his present majesty; for I was in the east country when the duke landed, and from thence I went directly to him, when he was at Shipton-Mallet, not one man accompanying me from thence. But hitherto as I lived, so now I die, owning and professing the true reformed Christian (commonly called the Protestant) religion, which is founded on the pure written word of God only, and which I acknowledge likewise to be comprehended in the articles of the doctrine of the church. This religion I have made a reasonable and free choice of, and have heartily embraced, not only as it protests against all Pagan and Mahometan religion, but against the corruption of the Christian; and I humbly and earnestly pray to God that by his infinite wisdom and Almighty power, he will prevent not only the utter extirpation and diminution thereof, by the height and influence of what is contrary thereto; and for that end the Lord make the professors of it to live up more to it's principles and rules, and bring their hearts and conversations more under the government and power of the same. I die also owning my ministry, non-conformity, for which I have suffered so much, and which doth now obstruct the king's grace and mercy to be manifested and extended to me; for as I chose it not constrainedly, so I appeal to God as a dying man, not moved from fullness or humour, or factious temper, or erroneous principles of education, or from secular interests, or worldly advantages, but clearly from the dictates of my own conscience, and as I judged it to be the cause of God, and to have more of divine truth in it than that which is contrary thereto; so now I see no cause to repent of it, nor to recede from it; not questioning but God will own it at the last judgment day. If no more had been required after the late king's restoration to qualify ministers for public preaching, than was after the first restoration from the time of Charles the First, probably I might have satisfied myself therewith, and not scrupled conformity thereto; but the terms and conditions thereof, by a particular law made in 1662, being not only new, but so strict and severe, that I could never have satisfaction in my own conscience, after all my endeavours used for a compliance therewith, and a conformity thereto: to say nothing of the covenant, which I never took, but the giving my assent and consent, have been too difficult and hard for me to comply with. And I very well remember, that about fourteen years ago, entering into discourse with Mr. Patrick Heldore, an Irishman, who was contemporary with me in Dublin, concerning conformity, which he much endeavoured to persuade me to; I urged the severity of the fore-mentioned conditions against it, and after some debates and reasons with him, I told him I did believe they were contrived and designed on purpose to prevent our public preaching, and to keep us out of the church: to which he ingeniously replied, He judged it was so: for, said he, a bishop in Ireland (whose name I have forgot) told me the very same.

"But though I could not wade through, and conquer this difficulty, yet I censure not those that did it; and I believe after all the hottest disputes, and most violent contests between conformists and non-conformists, there are of both parties that will be glorified in heaven hereafter. According to the 29th art. of the church of England, a visible church is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, the sacraments of the Lord duly administered, according to Christ's ordinance, and all those things that of necessity are requisite and necessary to salvation; so with such a church have I held the most intimate communion, and with such could hold it: I would not therefore be so incorporated with any church, as to exclude me from, and render me incapable of holding communion with other churches; I was never strongly bound up to any form of ecclesiastical government, but that under which a pure and undefiled religion doth flourish, and that which contains and really practises holiness, and advances the kingdom of God in the world, that can I approve of, and willingly live under, were I to live.

"I did approve of the ancient and present form of civil government; English monarchy I am fully satisfied with, and do also declare, that it is not warrantable for any subject to take up arms against, and resist their lawful sovereigns and rightful princes; and therefore had I not been convinced by several things that I have read and heard, to believe that the late duke of Monmouth was the legitimate son of his father Charles the Second, I had never gone into his army, judging that without this I could not be freed from the guilt of rebellion, which I always resolved to keep myself clear from: and though his father denied he was married to his mother, I thought it might be answered with this; that kings and princes, for state reasons, often cannot be fathomed by their subjects, affirming and denying things which otherwise they would not do, and make even their natural affections to truckle and stoop thereto. I exhort all to abhor all treasonable plots, and pretences of all rebellion, with the highest detestation, and to take the plain text of sacred scripture to walk by, in honouring and obeying, and living in subjection to rightful kings, and not readily to receive, or suddenly to be impressed with evil reports and defamation of them, also not rashly to be propagators of the same.

"I desire God to forgive all mine enemies, and to give me an heart to forgive them, which are many, some mighty, and all most malicious: particularly Barter, of Lifnel, who betrayed me, and proved such a traitor to

James,

James, duke of Monmouth, his old and intimate friend. I am grievously afflicted that I should prove the occasion of the great sufferings of so many persons and families: but this hath fallen under the just and wise ordering of Divine Providence, as David's going to Abimelech, when he proved the occasion of the death of all the persons, men, women, and children in the city: but who shall say unto God, What doest thou? The care of my most dear wife and a great many children, I cast upon God, who I hope will be better than the best of husbands unto her, and the best of fathers unto them: God knows how just and legal right my wife hath unto her estate; to him therefore I commit her, to defend her from the violence and oppression of men, particularly from a most inhuman and unnatural brother: but no wonder if he will lay violent hands upon his sister's estate, that hath so often laid them on his own father. I die a deeply humbled, self-judging, and self-condemning sinner, loathing and abhorring my many and great iniquities, and myself for them, earnestly desiring full redemption from the bonds of corruption, under which I have groaned so many years, longing for a most perfect conformity to the most holy and glorious God, the only infinite pure Being; thirsting for a perfect diffusion of his grace through all the powers and faculties of my soul, panting after perfect spiritual life and liberty, and a consummate love to my dearest Jesus, who is an all-comprehensive good, and to be satisfied with his love for ever: a vigorous and vehement zeal for the Protestant religion, with a belief I had of the duke's legitimacy, hath involved me in this ignominious death; yet blessed be God, that by sincere repentance and true faith in the blood of Jesus, there is passage from it to a glorious eternal life, and from these bitter sorrows to the fulness of sweetest joys that are in his presence, and from these sharp bodily pains to those most pure pleasures, that are at his right hand for evermore: and blessed be God, that such a death as this cannot prevent and hinder Christ's changing of my vile body, and fashioning it like his glorious body, in the general resurrection-day.

"I am now going into that world, where many dark things shall be made perfectly manifest and clear, and many doubtful things fully resolved, and a plenary satisfaction given concerning them; all disputes and mistakes concerning treason, rebellion, and schism, shall be at an end, and cease for ever: many things that are innocent, lawful, and laudable, which have foul marks and black characters stamped and fixed upon them here, they shall be perfectly purified and fully cleansed from there; where at one view more shall be known of them, than by all wrangling debates and eager disputes, or by reading all polemical books concerning them here. I greatly deplore and bewail the greedy appetite and insatiable thirst, that professing Protestants have after the blood of their brethren, and the high pleasure they take in the effusion thereof. But what will not men do, when they are either judicially blinded, or their secular worldly interest insensibly insinuates and winds itself into their religion, is so twisted and incorporated with it, that it animates and acts it, is the life and soul, the vital form and power, and made wholly subservient thereunto?

"I bless God for all my sufferings, and particularly for this last; for the benefit and fruit of it, by God's sanctifying of them to me, have been great; hereby I have been effectually convinced of the vanity of the world, and my own sinfulness by nature and practice, and to see that to be sin which I never saw before; and to be more thoroughly humbled for what I know to be sin, not only of commission, but of omission also; hereby I have been brought to a more thorough, deep, inward sense and feeling of the absolute necessity of the righteousness of Christ to justify me, and he hath been made much more dear and precious to my soul, than ever he was before. Hereby my soul hath been more refined from the dross of sensuality, wrought into a more heavenly frame, raised up to a higher pitch of spirituality; hereby I am made more meek and humble, and so judge more charitably of others that differ from me in opinion and judgment: so though by God's most righteous judgment I have been apprehended, and most justly and deservedly undergo this suffering for my sins, yet I hope they have wrought for me a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, fitting and preparing me, making me a better qualified subject for, and far more meet to be a partaker of the same. By the grace and strength of God, I will not purchase my life by the death and blood of my Protestant brethren, but chuse to die rather than be a betrayer of them; the impetuous and violent assault of this I dreaded more than death itself. Blessed be God I was not exposed unto it, and conquered by it, as some have been; having such full bodily vigour and strength, being in such perfect health, notwithstanding my age, predominating in me, it hath made it more difficult to die, than if I had been clogged and incumbered with infirmities, made to bow and stoop under them by prevailing diseases and distempers, gradually worn out therewith, which many times makes men weary of life, and to desire to die; and this in conjunction with many things (which I forbear to mention) highly gratifying and pleasing to sense, which I must leave for ever, strengthens and heightens the difficulty, and begets a greater regret and reluctance in my will, to have the earthly tabernacle of my body dissolved, and my soul to dislodge and quit the same. But now when the black and gloomy shades of death do overspread me, I can say, to the glory of God's most free and powerful grace, true faith in some measure hath changed the difficulty into a facility and easiness of dying: it hath very much subdued the reluctance of my will against it; for it makes future things present, and invisible things visible, and doth realize and substantiate the same to me; and as by it I penetrate and pierce into eternity, and behold invisible and immortal things, so hereby, blessed be God, I have obtained a greater victory over sense: the world is crucified to me, and I to the world, and all the most pleasant and delightful objects therein; all finite, fading creatures, comforts and enjoyments, are become minute and small, despicable and contemptible to me, in comparison thereof, being infinitely contained and comprehended therein. Shall my soul clasp and cling about these mortal and perishing things? Shall it cleave and be glued to them? Shall it be confined and captivated into what is kept in the narrow bounds of time, and in this lower world? Shall it earnestly desire and thirst for muddy streams, yea, rivers of flesh-pleasing good; when by an eye of faith I can look into the indeficient, inexhaustible, purest fountain; the immense, immensurate ocean of divine good; hoping to drink thereof, to swim and bathe my soul therein for ever and ever? And when I consider how long my ears have been bound up, and tied to their innumerable and horrid oaths, and cursed blasphemies, and mine eyes to see the prophanation of the day of God; and when I beheld such an overflowing flood of most prodigious impiety, such an inundation of most monstrous iniquity, and so much hell upon earth, and that there is so much decay of holy zeal, and true piety, and christian religion, amongst the professors of it, such seeming incurable breaches and divisions, such expiring love, and charity, and partings among them; it hath powerful influence on my soul to reconcile it more to death, and makes it electively, and from choice, to leave this present world, and to take up my abode in that which is unseen and future, where there shall be nothing but perfect love and holiness; a sinless state, and serving God with all unweariedness and perfection, with the highest complacency and delight that immortal souls can be capable of: there is perfect peace and concord, the innumerable company of angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect, all fastened together with indissoluble and uninterrupted chains of most pure love, and all continually wrapt up in, and transported with the highest admiration of God's love, his infinite and incomprehensible excellencies and perfections, singing hallelujahs to him without ceasing, and triumphing in his praise for ever and ever. The consideration also, that I know so little of these sublime, profound, and divine mysteries; of the most glorious mystery of salvation by Jesus Christ; that I am so incapable to fathom the depth of the providences of God, whose ways are in the sea, and whose paths are in the deep deep waters, and whose footsteps are not known, and particularly in the late stupendous and amazing one; and that I am so ignorant of the nature of angels and spirits, with their offices and operations, and of their high and glorious excellencies; and that I am so little acquainted with the nature of my own soul, as at present dwelling in, and united to my body, and as disunited and separated from it; how without corporeal organs it shall most vivaciously and vigorously perform all its proper functions and offices, and more than ever strongly and indefatigably serve the Lord Jesus, most fervently and abundantly love him, and delight in him every way, much more obtain the supreme and highest end of its creation and being; and this makes me much more willing to die, that I may have the knowledge thereof, with innumerable other things, that I am now either ignorant of, or do but imperfectly know; and so be made happy by a plenitude of fulness of enjoying intellectual pleasures, which are of all other most suitable, sweet, and satisfactory to immortal souls. And also I see that he that departs from iniquity makes himself a prey; and so many plunging themselves into the ways of iniquity, lest they should be accounted odious and vile, which makes them so much degenerate, not only from Christianity, but from humanity itself, as if they were scarce the excrement of either; contemning even that most noble, generous, heroic spirit that dwelt in many heathens, who accounted it most honourable and glorious to contend for their rights and liberties, yea, to suffer death, and the worst of deaths, in defence of the same; and judge them accursed and most execrably in the world that do so; and not only so, but for their own profit and advantage, have many of them enslaved their posterity by it, and are most industrious and laborious, most fierce and furious to destroy them, whereby they are become as unnatural as children that seek the ruin of their parents that begot them, and brought them forth; or them that lay violent hands upon themselves, dashing out their own brains, cutting their own throats, hanging and drawing themselves, ripping up their own bellies, tearing out their own bowels, they being in different senses children and members of that body politic they design and attempt the destruction of; and when I know not how long the duration and continuance of these things shall be, or a conclusion or end by God shall be put thereto, who by divine and unerring wisdom governs the world; why shall my soul be unwilling to take its flight into the unseen and eternal world, where no sullied, sordid, or impious thing, most incongruous and unbecoming nature, shall be seen or found, and where I shall behold no narrow, conclusive, contracted soul there, habitually preferring their private before a public good, but all most unanimously and equally centre in one common, universal good, and where the sighs, groans, and cries of the afflicted and persecuted shall be heard no more for ever?

"I earnestly exhort all most highly to prize and value time, and diligently improve it for eternity; to be wise, seriously and seasonably to consider of their latter end: for by the irrepeatable and irreversible law of heaven we must all die, yet we know not how, where, or when. Live with your souls full of solicitude and care, with a most deep concernedness and most diligent industriousness, whilst you have time and opportunity, and the means of grace, health, and strength, make sure of these two great things, viz.

"1. What merits for you a right and title to eternal life and glory, and the future unchangeable blessedness, as the Redeemer's most precious blood and righteousness; that thereby a real application and imputation may be unto you by sincere believing.

"2. That that which makes you qualified subjects for it, is the great work of regeneration, wrought in your souls, being renewed in the spirit of your minds, the Divine Nature being impressed upon them, repairing of the depraved image of God in you; that being transformed into his own likeness, thereby in the world you may mind and favour more the things of the spirit than the things of the flesh, celestial and heavenly more than terrestrial and earthly, superior more than inferior things; and therewith have a holy life and conversation conjoined, that results and springs from the same, as fruit from the root, and acts from the habits. Let all, in order thereto, seriously consider these few texts of sacred scripture, let them predominantly possess you; let them be deeply and indelibly transcribed upon your souls; let them be assimilated thereunto, and made the written epistles, the lively pictures thereof, Matt. v. 8, 20. 'Blessed be the pure in heart, for they shall see God. For I say unto you, that except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven. John iii. 3. Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10, 11. Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God, &c. Gal. v. 19, 20, to 23. Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these, adultery, &c. James i. 18. Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures. 1 Pet. i. 3. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Verse 13. Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, &c. Coloss. iii. 1, 2. If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things that are above: set your affections on things above, not, &c. Gal. v. 24. And they that are Christ's, have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts, &c. Eph. ii. 1. And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins. Rev. xx. 6. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power. Rom. viii. 1. There is therefore now no condemnation, &c. 1 Pet. i. 15. But as he that hath called you is holy, so be ye, &c. Verse 23. Being born again, not of corruptible seed, &c. Psal. iv. 3. But know that the Lord hath set apart him that is godly for himself, &c.' I shall mention now no more, the whole Bible abounds with these texts, with what a renovation and change of our carnal and corrupt hearts and natures, there must be, with holiness of life and conversation, before we can be capable of a future and blessed immortality, and of inheriting the kingdom of God for ever and ever. Amen."

The last Speech of Captain ABRAHAM ANSLEY.

"I AM come to pay a debt to nature; it is a debt that all must pay, though some after one manner, and some after another: the way that I pay it may be thought by some few ignominious, but not so by me; having long since, as a true Englishman, thought it my duty to venture my life in defence of the Protestant religion against Popery and arbitrary power: for this same purpose I came from my house to the duke of Monmouth's army: at first I was a lieutenant, and then a captain, and I was in all the actions the foot were engaged in, which I do not repent: for had I a thousand lives, they should all have been engaged in the same cause, although it hath pleased the wise God (for reasons best known to himself) to blast our designs; but he will deliver his people by ways we know nor think not of: I might have saved my life, if I would have done as some narrow-souled persons have done, by impeaching others; but I abhor such ways of deliverance, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy life with sin. As to my religion, I own the way and practice of the independent churches, and in that faith I die, depending on the merits of our Saviour Jesus Christ for my eternal salvation: his blessing be with you all. Farewell to thee, poor England, farewell.

"ABRAHAM ANSLEY."

A correct Copy of Mr. JOSIAS ASKEW's Letter to his Father, written a short Time before his Execution.

"HONOURED FATHER,

"I Not having an opportunity to make my gratitude known to you for all your endeavours, for the saving a poor

a poor, vain, perishing, and troublesome life; and seeing it is all in vain, I would desire you both to acquiesce in the will of God, and rejoice with me for this happy day of my departure from this state of pilgrimage, home to the possession of those heavenly mansions, which my God and Father hath provided for me, in and through my Lord Jesus Christ: it is in him alone I put my trust and confidence, and therefore can boldly say, Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again, and is set down at the right hand of God, making intercession for all those that have a well-grounded confidence in him. My time is but short, and by reason of company I am disturbed; therefore I conclude with my last breath, begging of God, that he would keep you constant in his fear, in this day of great temptation, and at last receive you to his glory, where we shall once more unite in praising without interruption or distraction, world without end, Amen: until which time, the grace of God the Father, the love of God the Son, the comfortable refreshings of God the Holy Ghost, be with you, all your's, and the whole Israel of God, both now and for ever: which is the hearty prayer of your son,

" JOSIAS ASKEW."

A further Account of Mr. JOSIAS ASKEW by a Friend.

"TO prevent your further trouble in suing for a pardon, I think it convenient to let you know, I do not question but my dear cousin hath had his pardon sealed by the King of kings, and is in everlasting blessedness, singing hallelujahs, salvation, glory and honour to him that sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever: for God did so carry him through to drink that bitter cup with so much courage and cheerfulness to the last, as was to the admiration of all spectators, notwithstanding the terrible sight he saw at the place of suffering, and so vehemently as he was tried by the adversary, yet it did not in the least discompose him, or alter his countenance; for he continued with a smiling countenance to the last, and was transported above measure. I want words to express it, he was like one wrapped up in heaven, with his heart there, and his eyes fixed thereon. I could wish you had been there, it would have driven away all cause of sorrow from your heart, to see his deportment, and hear the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth: he remembered his duty to you both, and left Paul's blessing with you, grace, mercy, and peace; his love to his dear sister; he desires her not to be troubled for him, for he hath made his peace with God, and was assured he should go to eternal happiness; he would have written more to you and to his sister, but that he had so short a time after sentence, that he wanted opportunity; when he went out of prison, he said, Gentlemen, now I am going, and it is the time I much longed for; I would not change with him that passeth sentence upon me, for a world. I was with him to the last, and seeing his courage, did very much encourage me, though I never saw such a sight with my eyes."

The MARTYRDOM of JOHN HOLWAY, at Warham, in the County of Dorset.

JOHAN HOLWAY lived in Lyme, where the duke landed, and appeared in arms at that time, until his captain left him; then took up arms under the duke of Monmouth, and went with him, until the king's proclamation came forth, That all that would lay down their arms before some justice of the peace, in four days after, and take a certificate for their so doing, they should be acquitted, and have his majesty's pardon, which this person did, though one day too late; which blot my lord chief justice hit, being very good at it, and passed the sentence of death on him. Before his trial he was not much concerned at his case, and thought himself almost out of danger: but to be short, he received his sentence with much courage and resolution, and by the means of one Mr. Tiller, who was to suffer with him, was brought to that settled frame of spirit, as is fit for one in that condition: as he was riding in the cart, toward the place of execution, the troopers being just behind the cart, he told them they looked like brave fellows, but (said he) if I were to have my life for fighting the best five of you, I would not question it. At the place of execution he said not much, but that he thought his and other men's blood would be revenged one time or another, and said, Forgive me, have mercy on my poor soul, pardon all my sins, and the like, and so the executioner performed his task.

MR. Matthews was much concerned the morning before he died, to see his wife weep, and to be in such grief for him, which drew tears from his eyes; and taking her in his arms, he said, My dear, prithee do not disturb me at this time, but endeavour to submit to the will of God; and although thy husband is going from thee, yet I trust God will be all in all unto thee; sure, my dear, you will make my passage into eternity more troublesome than otherwise, if you thus lament and take on for me; I am very sensible of thy tender love towards me, but would have you consider, that this separation will be so much for my advantage, as your loss cannot parallel. I thank God I am willing to die, and to be with my Jesus: be satisfied, the will of God must be done: thy will be done, O God, in earth as it is in heaven: so embracing her, took his last farewell of her, and prepared to go to the place of execution, which having reached, he with a very modest, sober, and composed frame of spirit stood while he saw several executed before him; his turn being then come, he spoke as follows:

" DEAR COUNTRYMEN,

"I suppose we are all of one kingdom and nation, and I hope Protestants; O, I wonder we should be so cruel and blood-thirsty one towards another; I have heard it said heretofore, that England could never be ruined but by herself, which now I fear is doing. Lord have mercy on poor England, turn the hearts of the inhabitants thereof, cause them to love one another, and to forget one another's infirmities. Have mercy, O Lord, on me; give me strength and patience to fulfil thy will, comfort my dear and sorrowful wife, be a husband unto her, stand by her in the greatest trouble and affliction, let her depend upon thy Providence; be merciful to all men, preserve this nation from Popery, find out yet a way for it's deliverance, if it be thy good will, and give all men hearts to be truly thankful; comfort my fellow-sufferers that are immediately to follow, give them strength and comfort unto the end: I forgive all the world, even those that have been the immediate hasteners of my death: I am in charity with all men. And now, blessed Lord Jesus, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven; give us this day our daily bread; forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us; and lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil; for thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen."

Having thus said, he ascended the ladder, and desired the executioner not to be hard to him, who answered, No; and said, I pray, master, forgive me: to which he said, I do with my whole heart, and I pray God forgive thee; but I advise thee to leave off this bloody trade. The executioner said, I am forced to do what I do, it is against my mind. So lifting up his hands to heaven, the executioner performed the dreadful task.

AT the time of the duke's landing at Lyme, this gentleman lived at Culliton, about five miles west of that town, and was supposed to be concerned in the design with the duke. He always was a great admirer of him, which got him many enemies among the gentry of that county: he always hated the name of a Papist; and as it fell out, he did foresee Popery advancing, as his words to divers of his neighbours can testify. As for his disposition, he was of a very generous and heroic spirit. But to proceed, no sooner had he the news of the duke's being landed, but he sets himself to work to serve him, desiring all he knew to join with him, and was one of the first that went to him to Lyme, and was with him to the end: but after the rout, travelling to and fro to secure himself, was at last taken at Chard by three Mofs-troopers, under no discipline, who made it their business to ruin their neighbours in those parts; they are so well known, I need not say any more. He was from thence carried to Ilchester, and so secured in Ilchester gaol; and at the bloody assizes at Dorchester took his trial, and received his sentence with the rest. Great application was made for him, but my lord chief justice Jeffreys's ears were deaf, and so he was ordered to be executed at Weymouth. After sentence, two of his friends came to him, and told him, There was no hope. He answered, My hope is in the Lord. After which he spent most of his time before execution in prayer and meditation, and conferring with many good persons. The morning being come, he prepared himself, and all the way drawing to execution was very devout. Being come to the place, there was a minister, I think, of that place, who sung a psalm, and prayed with them, and would have some discourse with this person, which he avoided as much as possible; but he asked him, What were his grounds for joining in that rebellion? Who answered, Had you, sir, been there, and a Protestant, I believe you would have joined too; but do not speak to me about that, I am come to die for my sins, not for my treason against the king, as you call it. So pointing to the wood that was to burn his bowels, he said, I do not care for that; what matters it what becomes of my body, so my soul be at rest? So praying to himself near half an hour, and advising some he knew, never to yield to Popery, he was turned off the ladder. He was a courageous, bold-spirited man, one of great reason, just and punctual in all his business, and much beloved by his neighbours.

One Mr. Lancaster was executed at the same time and place, whose courage and deportment was such, that he out-braved death, and in a manner challenged it to hurt him, saying, I die for a good cause, and am going to a gracious God. I desire all your Christian prayers; it is good to go to heaven with company. And much more he spoke concerning the duke of Monmouth, whom he supposed at that time to be living; and so praying privately for some small time, he was turned, or rather leaped over the ladder.

MR. Sandford with nine others were brought from Dorchester to Bridport, to be executed. Coming to the place of execution, he held up his hands to heaven, and turning himself to the people, said, I am an old man you see, and I little thought to have ended my days at such a shameful place, and by such an ignominious death; and indeed it is dreadful to flesh and blood, as well as a reproach to relations, but it would have been a great deal more if I had suffered for some felonious account. Says one to him, Is not this worse, do you think, than felony? He answered, I know not any thing I have done so bad as felony, that this heavy judgment should fall upon me, except it be for my sins against my God, whom I have highly provoked, and must acknowledge have deserved ten thousand times more; Lord, I trust thou hast pardoned them; seal my pardon in the blood of my Saviour; Lord, look upon, and be with me to the last moment.

One John Bennet was also executed at the same time, he was a poor man, but pious, and of good report with his neighbours in Lyme, where he lived. It is said that when he was on trial, a certain person informed his lordship, that the prisoner then at the bar, had aims of the parish; and that his lordship should reply, Do not trouble yourselves, I will ease the parish of that trouble.

In prison, and at the place of execution, he behaved himself so well to all, that many of his enemies pitied him, and would, if it had lain in their power (as they said) have saved him. His son being then present, offered to have died for him, and was going up the ladder, if it might have been suffered. He prayed some short time, and so was translated, as we have hopes to think, from this troublesome world into celestial joy and happiness eternal!

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. GATCHILL, Mr. SIMON HAMBLING, and Mr. JOHN HUCKER, at Taunton.

MR. Gatchill was a constable of the hundred; he was surprised by a party of the duke's, and shewed a warrant to bring in provisions and other necessaries for the use of the army, which if he had not obeyed, was threatened to have his house burnt; so that he was obliged to do what he did for his own preservation. But this was not sufficient, for being found guilty he was ordered to be executed.

As he was drawn to execution, he looked on the people, and said, A populous town, God bless it. Just before he was executed, he spoke, That the crime he was accused of, and condemned for, was high-treason, but he did not know himself to be guilty of it; and that what he did he was forced to do. And further said, I am so well known to you, that I do verily believe you have charity to think that what I speak is true. As for the niceties of the law, I do not well understand them; and much more to the same effect he spoke. And so after prayer, he was executed with his suffering brother, Mr. Simon Hambling.

Mr. John Hucker, was also executed at Taunton, who died with equal fortitude and resignation, he was a very worthy gentleman of that town. He had some ill friends in the duke's army, that cast aspersions on him, as though he was the person that was a traitor to the duke, by firing a pistol in Sedgmoor; but I have strictly examined many on that point, and can find it to be nothing but the worst of an enemy's malice, to wound him after his death in his reputation, which he always valued highly when living. To be short, he has left the character, amongst his neighbours, of an honest man, a good Christian, and one that was true to the interest of the duke, and sealed it with his blood.

A full and impartial Account of KIRK's CRUELITIES, and the several BARBARITIES committed in the West.

ON Kirk's first arrival at Taunton, he came with two cart-loads of men bloody, and their wounds not dressed, just as they were hauled into Bridgewater prison; they were guarded by grenadiers with bayonets. He also brought with him into Taunton a great drove of foot, chained two and two together. He hanged nineteen on the Corn-hill immediately, not suffering either their wives or children to speak to them, or to take their leave of them.

During the execution, Kirk caused the pipes to play, drums and trumpets to sound, that the spectators might not hear the cries and groans of dying men, nor the cries of their friends. He caused their bowels to be burned, and their quarters to be boiled in pitch, and hanged all about the town.

He hanged one on the White-Hart sign-post three times, to try if he would own he had done amiss; but he affirmed to this effect, That if it was to do again, he would engage in the same cause; so Kirk would have him hanged in chains; and so he was, till king William came to the deliverance of this nation from Popery and slavery.

When

When Jenkins, the Hewlings, &c. were to die, before they came out of the B———, there was a great fire made on the Corn-hill, in order that they might see the fire that was to burn their bowels.

Of several that were hanged, he caused also their bodies to be stripped, and their breasts to be cleaved asunder; in the place where he caused the executions to be done, you might have gone up to the ankles in blood; he also caused the hearts of the poor executed men to be thrown into the fire with a great shout, saying, "Here is the heart of a traitor."

A captain of W——— was hanged, and the rope broke, whereby he hoped to have saved his life; but they took from a market-horse a ring-rope, and hanged him again.

When the prisoners were brought to the bar at the assizes, Jeffreys said, if any man pleaded not guilty, he should die. Notwithstanding there was one who not being concerned in Monmouth's business, when asked, said, Not guilty, my lord: Jeffreys said, Take him, gaoler, and let him be executed another time.

There was an honest man hanged for sparing threepennyworth of hay for Monmouth's horse.

There was also a constable hanged for executing of Monmouth's warrant.

Besides these, many hundreds were put in the castle-hall, by which it was feared they would infect the town. Francis Burges was taken upon Maidendown, by the persuasion of sir ———; he was hanged by fastening a rope to a chamber window, and set upon a hoget.

By good report, there were several scores died in Ilchester by infectious diseases, and in their irons, and handbolts; for if they were not hard-hearted, and used the extremest rigour imaginable, the keepers were not counted good subjects. One of Welinton that was to be hanged then, was saved, supposed by order of sir ———, and one of Crookern hanged in his stead; this is true, and so it was at other places; but it were endless to record all the cruelties exercised by Kirk and Jeffreys, after Monmouth's defeat.

What remains now, is to give an account of hundreds that had fled and hid themselves up and down in holes and rocks, whose friends made all application to some great person or other to procure their pardons; some to this, some to others, that they thought favourites with the king; but the rewards must be ascertained before any application could be made (for pardons were just as they were in Rome) according to the ability of the person, from half a crown to sixteen thousand guineas; any tooth, good barber. Divers lists being sent up, and the rewards ascertained, which amongst many of them put together, did amount to considerable sums. So that it was now, who could find a friend to relieve his distressed relations, which were forced to wander up and down in caves and deserts, for fear of being taken. But this misfortune attended the agents, that unless my lord chancellor were used, by his creatures that were allowed by him so to do, other applications commonly met with disappointments.

Several interesting Anecdotes by Mr. BURD, and other West-Country Gentlemen, relative to the Barbarities of these Times.

MR. Burd lived near Frome, and gave (in a letter hereafter inserted) a remarkable account of several passages; for he proclaimed the duke of Monmouth at the head of the army, which was unwillingly done by the duke then: he also saw the maids of honour present their flags, and several come to kiss the duke's hand, as king after proclamation, and presented a purse of guineas on their knees. At this time one widow made a pathetic speech to him, and delivered her mite.

When the army went through Pensford, a parson came out of an alehouse, and asked them, Gentlemen, how doth the king do? If he comes this way to day, I will kiss his hand, meaning the duke of Monmouth.

The first indicted was the parson on a single indictment; after Jeffreys had drank a bottle of claret (as was his custom) he repairs to the bench, where being seated, the parson was brought before him.

At first Jeffreys reprimanded the parson so severely that he was ready to sink for fear; but recovering himself, said, Not guilty; alleging he never wore a weapon, nor was in the army, only stood by on horseback, and viewed the army.

Upon this Jeffreys replied, There is a worse weapon than a sword, that is a parson's tongue, and declared to the parson, that whoever stood by the army, or gave a smile on it, was guilty of rebellion (though a smile might be in derision).

Now the parson pleaded, that it was not known that the duke should have come to Kinson half a quarter of an hour before he came, and that he had business that way, which stopped him, and that he was forced to stay and see the encampment, but exchanged not one word with any belonging to the army.

Likewise the parson urged, that both the witnesses against him swore in malice, because he had put one of them into the spiritual court for tythes, and the other witness he had arrested.

Jeffreys at last demanded if any neighbouring gentleman could give a character of the parson (though he looked upon all the gentry thereabouts rebels).

The parson alleged, captain Cox, the foreman of the grand inquest, knew him; he was sent for accordingly.

As soon as captain Cox appeared, Jeffreys asked him, If the parson had observed all the ceremonies, and behaved himself loyally?

In answer, captain Cox declared, He knew no ill character of him, &c.

Jeffreys, after this, summed up the evidence against the parson, but wheeled at last into this, I fear the sin of rebellion lurks under that canonical coat, I would have him hanged to be an example to others.

If Burd had said he heard the parson say he would kiss the king's hand, if he came by that way, the parson had certainly been trussed up.

However, the parson's jury brought him in Not guilty; upon which Jeffrey's made him down on his knees, and bid him go, and preach for his sake upon that text, Fear God, and honour the king, &c.

During the parson's trial the court was interrupted with the maids of honour, who came hoping for pardon; and often the court was interrupted with petitions, and certificates under the justices hands, to certify that the bearers did, according to the king's proclamation, come in within five days, and therefore expected their pardon.

Now it came to pass that one alderman Holliday's son was one that came in within the five days, and his father offered to vindicate his son, and to be bail for him; (for all that came in within the time, he made them give special bail) Jeffreys said, He knew many aldermen were villains, and he hoped to beat some fur out of their gowns.

He then began to try the two hundred odd men: Burd was in the front, as their names were called; he made every man shew his face; for if they were in years, they had been rebels ever since Oliver's time, their age tried them. But for further confirmation of some of these particulars, we refer you to Mr. Burd's letter, directed to Mr. John Dunton, in these words.

"To Mr. JOHN DUNTON.

"SIR,

"LOOKING over a book lately, entitled, A panegyric on the lord Jeffreys, I find a great deal therein contained true to my own knowledge, and therefore doubt not of all the rest, for I was one myself condemned by him at Wells assizes, and my getting off next to a wonder to all that heard thereof; the particulars whereof, and the manner how, being too long and tedious, I shall not trouble you therewith; only being informed you intend to reprint your bloody assizes, I thought it not amiss to acquaint you with two or three of the most material

terial passages that happened within the compass of my own knowledge and view. When I was committed a prisoner to Bath, where I lay fourteen weeks, I found there seven and twenty more confined in a little room, some lying on boards, others through much difficulty had obtained the favour of straw to lie on. Among those afore-mentioned there were two poor men, who lived in and about Taunton and Ilminster, whose names were William Hufsey, a worsted-comber, I judge about seventy years of age; he alleged, that he went into the army to fetch home his son, being himself past engaging in the war; Thomas Paul, I think of the same occupation, and upwards of sixty years old, but a Quaker. This said Hufsey and Paul were never under the least apprehension of suffering during their fourteen weeks imprisonment, till the very day they were condemned, and the said Hufsey oftentimes affirmed, he was never out with the duke's army; and the said Paul being uncle to a very great man's chaplain at court, the said chaplain was his chief dependance, and promised him a pardon by his interest. Now it so happened, that the prisoners commonly about once a week had liberty from their keeper to go out of the said prison, hand-bolted two and two, to the said keeper's house, for an hour or two, to divert and recreate themselves; and commonly these two ancient men, Hufsey and Paul, were linked together, and they would both of them generally take the liberty to drink till they were a little merry and brisk; and when they returned in that situation to the said prison, it would be most times the usual custom of William Hufsey (as soon as ever the keeper had took off their hand-bolts) to strike the said Thomas Paul on the shoulder, jocosely saying, Never fear, Tom Paul, if thou and I be hanged, we will hang cheek by jole; which expression I oftentimes heard, though I did little think at that time either of them would suffer; but it so happened, that contrary to both their imaginations they were hanged side by side.

The day after they were condemned, I accidentally met with the said William Hufsey, walking out in the middle of the cloisters at Wells by himself, with his hat over his eyes, very melancholy, weeping, at which I was a little surpris'd, and asked what was the matter? he replied, with tears in his eyes, Ha! Mr. Burd, I look upon myself now, and never till now, a dead man; you are a young man, and if you can get off this business, you may live to see many years; and remember that I told thee so, before the year 1688 be over, you will see all things turned upside down, and king James, for what he had done, would be turned out, and another would come in, and effect what was then begun; and with a great deal of earnestness and zeal repeated his words over again; but at that time thinking what he so earnestly affirmed, was the effect of his concern for his own death, I did scarce ever recollect what he then affirmed, till 1688 was over, when I saw all things exactly happened as he before had told me. Another passage I took notice of among others, was, when I was at the bar to receive my doom, one of judge Jeffreys's officers told the judge there was one of the maids of honour (so called, because twenty or thirty of that sex presented flags to the duke, at Taunton, after he was proclaimed king) come to surrender herself, begging mercy at his hands; whom when he saw, he looked on her with a very fierce countenance, raving at her, &c. bid the gaoler take her, which struck such a fear into the poor girl, that she pulled her hood over her face, and fell a weeping; and the gaoler, according to the command of the fierce judge, took her away immediately out of court; and, as I was afterwards informed, she died in his custody not many hours after for fear, as our lord-mayor died for fear of Jeffreys, when brought before him. When I myself received my sentence, there was another young man hand-bolted to me, whose name was Jacob Tripp, about twenty-one years of age, and so stout and brisk, that he would almost attempt to fight a lion: I could tell you all his case and circumstances as well as my own, but it will be too large to insert here; only thus much I will insert here about him. He was always of the tory party, but he fell in with Monmouth's men; it so happened, that after sentence passed on both of us, we were at the same time both taken very dangerously ill, of a very malignant, infectious fever, during which illness a reprieve came for both of us for so many days, which days being expired, Tripp's enemies, his brother tories (which before were his chief confederates and acquaintance) said he deserved worse usage than those who always had been such, by their unwearied diligence had obtained an order for his execution, he being at that time so ill, that he had not been sensible for near a week before, and his physicians gave him over for dead, and did affirm it impossible for him to live twenty-four hours; yet to shew their unbounded rage, they immediately got him lifted out of his bed, where he lay senseless and a dying, wrapt up in his sheets, and laid him in a chair, when two men carried him to the market-place in Wells, the place of execution, where they hung him up, and quartered him (when he was as senseless as a stock or stone) before a great many spectators, many of which took the infection of his distemper, together with abundance of the soldiers, which caused them to die like rotten sheep; and this infection spread afterward far and near round the country, to the loss of a great many people's lives. I could tell you more remarkable passages, but doubting I am too long in these already mentioned, let this suffice, from "Your humble servant unknown,

Beckington, June 24, 1702.

"JOHN BURD.

"Postscript. Mr. Dunton, you may, if you please, correct this, and put it into some better style if you think fit; but the matter of fact is all true to my knowledge, as I have truly and impartially related the same; for I had the honour to be known to the duke of Monmouth before he came into England on that unhappy expedition, which made my getting a pardon so difficult, that had there not been some disgust happened between some great men concerning me, scarce any money would have purchased it; for thus it was, that very night the rout was, being on a Sunday about eight o'clock, there came a foot messenger to the duke, into the field near Bridgewater, and gave him an account what posture the king's forces (then at Weston, on the edge of Sedgmoor) lay in; the duke gave him a gratuity, and sent him back again to make a further discovery, and bring a further account thereof, but he was unfortunately taken, and returned no more; upon which the duke riding into the town, his horse in a very strange and unusual manner threw him, which I oftentimes since thought was ominous: about eleven o'clock at night the army marched out of Bridgewater, toward Weston, which proved a fatal night. The night after, being Monday night, I was taken about twenty miles distant, at an alehouse, with two young men (one a Londoner) our horses being carried to Bath, and we to be sent after with a guard; but I, having an opportunity, got off, and left my comrades behind, who I understood did also follow my example; but being taken again the same day, and delivered into the hands of a Roman-Catholic, he took care, and conveyed me to Wells, before the lord F——, who with the king's army was arrived there from Sedgmoor; his lordship being prepossessed against me, would hear nothing at all; I offered to speak, but he told me, I should be hanged, &c. and immediately sent me a prisoner to the lower church in Wells, which was then full of the same sparks; and under a multitude of passages that happened, too tedious to relate, I had not been there above two days and two nights, but I was unexpectedly released, by means of the bishop of W——, who had obtained my lord F——'s consent; so then I had a pass given me, under the hand and seal of the lord bishop, by order and consent of the said lord F——, to require all officers, civil and military, to suffer me to pass to my place of abode; notwithstanding which (as I was on my journey) I was again seized, and hurried away to Bath, and there had before another great man, who was exasperated against me also by the information of some enemies, that had told him how great a rebel I had been, and that I had proclaimed the duke king, in the presence of four thousand men, &c. which appearing so very visible by their offering to swear it, the said great man man in a fury told me, he would take care I should be hanged, notwithstanding my pafs; and so sent me to the common gaol in Bath, where I remained about fourteen weeks, and then was had to Wells, and there condemned. But I had forgot to mention, that as soon as I was committed to Bath prison, I sent a messenger to acquaint the bishop of W——r, that notwithstanding his and my lord F——'s pafs, I was again committed to Bath prison; which he seemed to be much concerned at; but in the end I was given to a pardon-monger, and he made his market upon me, though afterwards I was told (when too late) that the judge had instructions from above, that I should not suffer. When I was at the bar, it was in the front of above two hundred more, that all received sentence together; unto whom the judge made a speech of an hour long, to wheedle them all into a confession, by quoting places of scripture, to set forth the heinousness of their crime of rebellion; and then comes with a long harangue, telling us, how merciful the king was, and how ready he was to shew mercy to the worst of us; in which he had this lofty expression (which I remember I did not then believe), Nay, says he, and thumps the cushion, I had almost said, the king is more ready to forgive, than you were to rebel."

A full Account of the Trial, Sentence, and happy Deliverance of Mr. JOHN TUTCHIN, in Dorchester, in the County of Dorset. Also of WILLIAM WISEMAN, EDWARD JERVAISE, &c.

MR. John Tutchin, a young gentleman of Hampshire, was among the several persons designed to be whipped, according to a sentence, which, perhaps, no history can parallel.

This young gentleman had the misfortune, with many others of his acquaintance, to be in the interest of the duke of Monmouth, but had a better fortune than many of them, by concealing his name: for when he was taken a prisoner by the country guard, he was committed to prison under the borrowed name of Thomas Pitts, and his real name was not discovered till after he was acquitted of the rebellion, no person appearing against him as evidence.

However, Jeffreys having discovered his true name before Mr. Tutchin was gone from the prison, was resolved upon revenge, and said, he was never so far outwitted, by an old or young rogue in his life; and after he had examined Mr. Tutchin to many particulars, by which Mr. Tutchin knew that Jeffreys had a true account of him; for he told him the time when he was in Holland, the very place where he lodged there, the manner of his coming over, and the name he went by at that time; and finding Mr. Tutchin would not answer to some questions he asked him, concerning some gentlemen in Hampshire, who were concerned with Mr. Tutchin in raising some men at Lymington, for the service of the duke of Monmouth, I say, after this, he was resolved to try Mr. Tutchin again.

Mr. Tutchin still pretended ignorance in these matters to his prison-keeper, who was set upon Mr. Tutchin by Jeffreys, to bring him to a confession: but the gaol-keeper, whose name was Knapton, though he seemed an enemy to the duke's men, coloured many things that might have taken away the lives of several, and did what he could to allay the heat of the implacable judge.

As we have given no ill character of this gaoler, Mr. Knapton, it may be a pardonable digression, to tell the reader something of another, which I had from the mouth of Mr. Tutchin: when Richardson, the keeper of Newgate, brought down the Hewlings, and some other gentlemen, to Dorchester against the assizes, the said Richardson drinking with another gaoler, said, "Come, brother, here's to our good health; this is our time to make our fortunes, and now we must lay aside all humanity, for no compassion is to be shewn to these dogs."

To return, however, to Mr. Tutchin, he was brought up again to the hall; but Jeffreys not caring to indict him for rebellion, pretended that the crime of changing his name deserved a severe sentence; and thereupon passed sentence as follows: That he should remain in prison during the space of seven years; that once every year he should be whipped through all the market-towns in Dorsetshire; that he should pay a fine of one hundred marks to the king, and find security for his good behaviour during life.

We should observe, that when this sentence was past upon Mr. Tutchin, the ladies in the court, of which there were a great many; all burst out a crying; but Jeffreys turning towards them, said, Ladies, if you did but know what a villain this is, as well as I do, you would say, this sentence is not half bad enough for the wretch.

Having passed the sentence, the clerk of the arraigns stood up, and said, My lord, there are a great many market-towns in this county, the sentence reaches to a whipping about once a fortnight, and he is a very young man. Aye, says Jeffreys, he is a young man, but he is an old rogue; and all the interest in England shall not reverse the sentence I have passed upon him.

True it is, no devil incarnate could rage, nor no Billingsgate woman could scold worse than this judge did at this young gentleman whilst he was at the bar; he called him a thousand rogues and villains, told him that he was a rebel from Adam, that never any of his family had the least loyalty; and, said he, I understand you are a wit and a poet, pray, sir, let you and I cap verses. Mr. Tutchin smiled in his face, and told him, He knew upon what ground he stood, and when he was overmatched.

While under this barbarous sentence, Mr. Tutchin's friends endeavoured to persuade him to sue for a pardon; but he utterly refused it, and drew up a petition with his own hand (of which the following is an exact copy) which was presented to the king at Winchester.

The PETITION of JOHN TUTCHIN to the KING.

"To the King's Majesty: the humble Petition of JOHN TUTCHIN, of Lymington, in the County of Southampton, Gent. now a Prisoner in the County Gaol of Dorset,

"SHEWETH,

"THAT your petitioner now lies in this prison under sentence of the lord chief justice Jeffreys, to remain in the said prison during the space of seven years, that once every year he shall be whipped through all the market towns in Dorsetshire, that he shall pay a fine of one hundred marks to the king, and find security for his good behaviour during life.

"That this sentence was past upon your petitioner, under pretence of his having changed his name, and no matter of treason or rebellion being proved upon him.

"That your petitioner has always demeaned himself according to his duty required by law, and that he is ready to venture his life in defence of a lawful king, that shall govern according to law, in preservation of the liberties of Englishmen.

"That he humbly conceives, the sentence passed upon him by the said Jeffreys is worse than death; and therefore,

"Humbly prays your majesty will be mercifully pleased to grant him the favour of being hanged with those of his fellow-prisoners, that are condemned to die; and till then

"Your petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

"JOHN TUTCHIN."

*And underneath his name } "Malim mori quam vapulari."
were written these words: }*

That is, "I prefer death to an ignominious whipping."

By this petition it may be seen, that Mr. Tutchin was a young man when he wrote it; for many exceptions were made against it: to the king's majesty, instead of the king's most excellent majesty; and you may be sure, the western hangman did not overlook his calling of him plain Jeffreys in the body of his petition.

However, the court esteemed it a barbarous sentence; and it is said, the king esteemed it no less. But all the answer that could be got, was from the lord Sunderland, That Mr. Tutchin must wait with patience.

Hereupon, Mr. Tutchin endeavoured to get a pardon from the people who had grants of lives, many of them 500, some 1000, more or less, according as they had interest with the king; but Jeffreys would not so much as hear his name mentioned, and the sentence was ordered to be executed.

About four or five days before the execution of the sentence, a brother-in-law of Mr. Tutchin's, a physician, persuaded him to take a dose of physic to make himself sick, by which means the execution might be put off, and perhaps in that time some means might be found for his enlargement: he took the dose, and in three or four days the small-pox came out very thick upon him, no man ever had them to a higher degree; and in that condition he lay by himself in prison, nobody to look after him but his fellow-prisoners, for there being a pestilential distemper in the prison, of which some scores died every week, any communication with the prisoners was prohibited by the magistrates of the town.

Mr. Tutchin lying in this miserable condition, and his life being despaired of, his friends worked the easier with Jeffreys to get the sentence reversed, which some people would have believed a sign of repentance in Jeffreys, had he not taken the money himself. After Mrs. Tutchin had done this last kind office for her son, she sickened of the small-pox, and died, his brother and two sisters fell sick of the same distemper; so that when Mr. Tutchin had friends allowed to come to him, like Job's comforters, they brought him the tidings that his mother was dead, and all the relations he had in the world were a dying, and that they had contracted for a pardon for more money than he was worth, for a life which he never valued. So he was popt into a pardon amongst others; for it was usual at that time for one courtier to get a pardon of the king for half a score, and then by the assistance of Jeffreys to augment the sum to fourscore or an hundred, and so this unfortunate gentleman fortunately got out of his broil.

Notwithstanding we must not leave Mr. Tutchin here, though what afterwards we shall say of him, does not relate to what was transacted in the West, yet it may not be amiss to shew how the providence of God does often change the face of things, and alter the circumstances and conditions of men, so that those who boast of their power, and exercise their authority with the greatest severity, many times become the scorn and contempt of those they have triumphed over: who could have thought, when Jeffreys past that sentence on Mr. Tutchin in the West, that ever Mr. Tutchin should see that wicked judge a prisoner, apprehended by the injured people, and committed by a tool of his own party? Yet so it come to pass.

Jeffreys having endeavoured to make his escape beyond sea in a sailor's habit, was discovered by one, to whom he had done some acts of injustice, and was taken in Anchor-and-Hope-Alley, in Wapping, and by the mob carried before the instrument of Popery, fir J—C—, then lord-mayor of the city of London, and by him committed to the Tower.

When Mr. Tutchin heard of this, he went to pay his lordship a visit; who did not know Mr. Tutchin at first, he being much altered with the small-pox; but Jeffreys understanding who he was, told him he was glad to see him; Mr. Tutchin answered, He was glad to see him in that place. Jeffreys returned, That time and place happened to all men, and that when a man was born, he knew not what death he should die, nor what his circumstances should be in this life, and abundance of such cant; but added, That he had served his master very faithfully, according to his conscience. Mr. Tutchin asked him, Where his conscience was when he past that sentence upon him in the West? Jeffreys said, You are a young man, and an enemy to the government, and might live to do abundance of mischief; and it was part of my instructions, to spare no man of courage, parts, or estate; but withal added, that his instructions were much more severe than the execution of them, and that at his return he was snubbed at court for being too merciful. So after he had treated Mr. Tutchin with a glass of wine, Mr. Tutchin departed.

Some short time after this, Jeffreys had a barrel of oysters sent him to the Tower, which he caused to be opened, saying, He thanked God he had some friends left. But when the oysters were tumbled out on the table, a halter came out with them, which made him change his countenance, and so palled his stomach, that he could eat none of them. This was confidently reported to be done by Mr. Tutchin; but I having heard him protest that he was not in the least concerned therein, we must believe it to be done by another hand.

One William Wiseman was the second in the list of persons sentenced to be whipped; a boy of about 14 or 15 years of age, at that time an apprentice to a barber at Weymouth. It seems the duke of Monmouth's declaration was put up in that town in the night time, and some people who could not read, finding it in the morning, took it down, and this boy, being by, read it to them. This was his crime, for which Jeffreys sentenced him to be whipped through all the market-towns in Dorsetshire.

The sentence was accordingly executed first at Dorchester, where in consideration of the boy's age he was whipped more gently than some people thought necessary.

Hereupon a clergyman of the church of England, named Blanchard, came to the gaoler, and reviled him, saying, He would do his business for him with the lord chief justice, for shamming his sentence, in not whipping the boy half enough. The gaoler breaking out in a passion, said, You talk of the cruelties of the Popish priests, but commend me to a church of England priest for cruelty: they are like the country justices, who will not believe a man is burnt in the hand, unless they can see a hole through it.

Now whether this parson made the complaint, or no, is uncertain; but sure it is, complaint was made, and the boy was ordered to be whipped again, the morrow following the day he was whipped before; which, to please this parson and Jeffreys, was done to that degree, that the boy fell into a fever, which was likely to have cost him his life. After Jeffreys had left the country, he was whipped through the town of Weymouth, and there the sentence terminated.

One Edward Jervaise was the third in this list, a hatter, of Milbourn-Port. This man, it seems, being in some company, happened to say, that he had a Monmouth in his heart. Upon which he was apprehended, and sent to Dorchester gaol. This man was a criminal in another respect, which was enough to hang any at that time of day; for he had three or four uncles, and other relations in the duke's army. I was told one of his uncles, being taken prisoner by Kirk, was immediately ordered to be hanged up, but being a brave stout man, some of Kirk's officers interceded for his life, which Kirk was willing to grant, provided he would acknowledge his rebellion; which he refused to do: at length they would release him if he would say, God bless king James, which he also refused; and so was hanged, and the last words he said were, God bless the duke of Monmouth.

Edward, his nephew, when he came into court, could not deny, that he had Monmouth in his heart, and thereupon was sentenced to be whipped through all the market-towns in Dorsetshire, paying a fine to the king.

The sentence having been passed, he steps to Mr. Tutchin (then in court, and who received sentence before him) and said, Master, I understand the jig we are to dance well enough; but what must we pay this money for? Mr. Tutchin answered, you never knew people dance without music, and this money is ordered to pay the fiddlers. Nay then, says Jervaise, it is well enough; and went away with the least concern that could be. He was was whipped through Dorchester and his own town, and no more.

A woman of Lyme was the next, who kept an ale-house, and brewed her own drink. Two or three days after the duke of Monmouth landed, the excise officers came to her house to collect the duties, but she refused it, and said, she would pay no more excise till the duke of Monmouth was king of England. For which crime she was sentenced to be whipped through all the market-towns in Dorsetshire, and was whipped through Dorchester and Lyme, and no further. For when Jeffreys was gone out of the country, the justices were not so severe, and connived at the gaolers stopping part of the sentences.

Besides these there was another in Dorchester prison, that was alike sentenced to be whipped; he professed himself to be an astrologer and physician, but was very unluckily misled by the stars into the country at this time; for coming to a corporation town to vend his physic, and tell fortunes; the people not knowing but that he was a conjuror indeed, desired him to consult the stars about the fate of the duke of Monmouth then in arms; he erected his scheme, and found that king James would be ruined and undone, and that the duke of Monmouth would happen to be king in a short time, which coming to the magistrates ears, they committed him to prison, where he erected another scheme concerning his own fate, when he found by the stars that he would be whipped at the cart's arse for erecting his former scheme; which proving true, he could not say that the stars always deceived him.

The reader has now a short account of the whipping sentences in Dorchester, which sentences, together with some others executed before that time, were made one article against the late king James upon the revolution, and are included in the bill of rights; so that no king of England for the future can be guilty of such illegal barbarities without reflection on the fate of that unhappy monarch.

There were in this prison, at one time, in one room nineteen young gentlemen, and not one of them twenty-one years of age, and all of them were hanged, except Mr. Tutchin.

Major Holmes was in this prison, who had been a lieutenant-colonel in the duke of Monmouth's service; he was taken prisoner after the Philips-Norton fight, and though his arm was shot to pieces, so that it hung by a piece of flesh, the barbarous soldiers stript him stark naked and carried him before a justice of peace, who being at dinner, ordered him to be kept till he had dined. The servants got the colonel into the kitchen, and gave him some clothes to cover his nakedness, and some refreshment; in which time the colonel laying his shattered arm on the dresser, with the cook-maid's knife cut off his arm with his own hand.

It is proper to mention this gentleman, because perhaps there was never more indignity offered to grey hairs and real worth, than in the person of this colonel Holmes. One day he was sitting in a little garden in the prison with the Hewlings and about three more young gentlemen, when a certain lord, well known at that time, came and insulted him, and told him it was a shame to see an old man among a parcel of boys. Mr. Tutchin told his lordship, that the worst boy there durst fight him for his life; said the colonel, my lord, these are boys, but they are brave boys; and let me be well mounted at the head of these boys, we will fight your lordship for our lives at the head of the best troop of guards. The indignities offered by that lord were far beneath a gentleman, and suitable to the courage he shewed in the late king's service; but when he went from this company to the common side, he was there as much insulted by one Furrard, a highwayman, who called him a thousand rogues, cowards, and villains.

The usage of the prisoners was indeed barbarous enough, the gaolers were obliged to shew them to every little fellow in authority, so that they were daily insulted, and paid dear enough for every thing they had; but what was most barbarous, they would not allow their relations to come to them in the time of their sickness, so that many died for want of help in a pestilential distemper, the like perhaps was never known. The small-pox at that time was the worst that was known, very few recovered of it. Mrs. Mary Blake, a young lady of Taunton, who was committed to this prison for making the colours presented to the duke of Monmouth, died of this distemper, to the great grief of her family; as did several others.

However, the greatest persecutors and insulters of these poor people were the country parsons: they did not preach to the spirits in prison, but they reviled them. One of them, when he heard some condemned persons in prayer just before their execution, said, These fellows will pray the devil out of hell; and the prison was seldom free of the black coats.

Thanks be to God, however, we now speak of these things only, and do not see them; and that those who are now living, though they have lost their estates, yet they see what they contended for, I mean their liberty and property established.

The Life and Death of GEORGE, LORD JEFFREYS.

LORD Jeffreys was born at Aston, near Wrexham, in Denbighshire, in Wales, about the year 1648, his father's name was — Jeffreys; being reputed a gentleman in that country, though of no large fortune or estate; however he lived very comfortably on what he had, improving his yearly income by his industry; and gained by his plain and honest endeavours a good repute amongst the gentry of those parts; insomuch that it was not long before he, upon the recommendation of some person of interest and ability, married a wife of a good family, and they lived very comfortably together in their rural habitation, being far from ambition, or striving for court favour; but contented with what God had blessed them with, and the fruits of their own industry, they found a solid happiness in that contentment. Nor had they lived together any considerable time, but amongst other children, the fruits of lawful wedlock, God was pleased to bestow on them the person who is intended for the subject of this discourse, who was in due time baptized by the Christian name of George; whether he had god-fathers, &c. it does not occur; however, he, under the care and diligence of his industrious parents, grew up, and appeared to all that knew him, of a very prompt and ready wit, active, and striving for pre-eminence, even among the companions of his tender age, which lively demonstrated that an air of ambition was inherent to his person.

When he was capable to receive learning, he was put to a country-school, where he was furnished with such education as that afforded, which was not extraordinary; yet his natural parts set it off to the best advantage; and growing to years of somewhat a ripe understanding, and not very tractable, his father by the advice of some of his friends caused him to be brought to London, and finding him not inclinable to any trade, but rather addicted to study, he entered him, or by his procurement he was entered into the Free-School at Westminster, where he profited much, so that he was, by the care of the worthy master thereof, soon enabled to understand the languages, or at least as many of them as were necessary for the study of the law, which above other things he aimed at; though his father seemed not very agreeable to his desires; for perceiving in his soul a more than ordinary spark of ambition, fearing it might kindle into a flame, and prove one day his ruin, he laboured to hinder the ways he conceived most likely to bring it upon him; and is reported to say (when he found he could not dissuade him from his purpose, gently clapping him on the back) Ah, George, George, I fear thou wilt die with thy shoes and stockings on: what he meant by that expression, I determine not, but leave the reader to conjecture.

On the restoration of king Charles the Second, affairs in the kingdom wore a new face, the law revived again, and began to flourish; the practitioners lived lived in much credit and reputation, and many of them purchased large estates, which served to wing the desire of this person with impatience; and some say he was the rather incited to it by a dream he had whilst a scholar at Westminster-School, viz. That he should be the chief scholar in that school, and afterward should enrich himself by study and industry, and that he should come to be the second man in the kingdom, but in conclusion should fall into great disgrace and misery. This was confidently reported; and some say himself told it to sundry persons since, when he found the second part of it was fulfilled, by acquiring the chancellorship, and standing high in the favour of his prince.

We find, however, the latter part did not deter him from his purpose, for having entered himself in the Inner Temple-House, one of the chief inns of court, after his performing such things as are conformable to the customs of the house, we find him called to the bar, by the interest he made with the benchers and heads of that learned society, earlier than had been usual, leaping over the heads of elder graduates.

This having happened about the twentieth year of the reign of king Charles II. and the city of London beginning to raise herself out of her ashes, more stately and magnificent than before she sunk in flames, a sacrifice to the revenge and malice of the Papists, as by the late inscription on the monument, and upon record it appears: this great city, I say, regaining her trade, her privileges and customs were kept up with great exactness, so that in the courts at Guildhall there was much business; which being considered by this person as more beneficial than that at Westminster, by reason of it's frequency, and being carried on briefer, and with less difficulty: which induced him to give his attendance also at Hicks's-Hall, and other inferior courts and places; insomuch that he being of a bold presence, and having naturally a fluent tongue, an audible voice, and good utterance, he had not pleaded often before he was very much taken notice of, and gained so much credit with the people, that they preferred him before any of the younger barristers; by which means he found his stars begin to smile upon him, so that he was in a manner courted to take fees, and had breviate thrust into his hand frequently in the middle of a cause by persons, when they perceived it went ill on their sides, and was like to go against them.

Elated thus with success, he now thought of nothing more than how he might climb; nor did he want an opportunity, for the next station we find him in, is that of common-serjeant to the great and honourable city of London; and so much fortune favoured him at this time, that alderman Jeffreys, the great smoker, having often observed his discourse and actions, took such a liking to him, that being of the same name, though not in the least any relation, he backed him with his purse and interest, which was not inconsiderable; and thereby not only enabled him to carry on his grandeur, but to purchase as he found a conveniency or advantage, in order to his keeping it up in the world.

Such, I say, being the degrees by which he was climbing the slippery stair of honour, to contract a firmer alliance, he addressed himself to a brisk young widow, daughter to sir Thomas Bludworth, then one of the aldermen of the city, and who in the time of the dreadful conflagration had the chair, as being then lord-mayor; and so far prevailed upon the lady and her father that he gained both their consents, and the contract was made, the nuptials solemnized, and soon after he had the pleasure to behold the fruits of her labour; sir John Howel, the recorder of London, giving place, the recordership became vacant, which made this person lay hold of that opportunity, to use his own and the interests of his friends, to acquire that place of trust and honour: nor did his measures fail him, for by the powerful influence he had by this time gained over sundry persons, who were best able to promote him to what he so earnestly laboured to arrive at, he was chosen and confirmed recorder of the honourable city; taking upon him the charge and care of the writings, papers, &c. that belong to so great a charge and trust, as that of a recorder of the city of London.

Now become by these means (as himself declared) the mouth of the city, and, as we may term him, capital judge in the Guildhall, in controversies at the sessions held there, &c. and the power of breathing forth sentences of punishment being put into his hands, he found his ambition enlarged, aiming at nothing more than to become a court-favourite: nor was it long before an opportunity offered itself, to make him be taken notice of: for so it happened, that some persons had imprinted a psalter, and entitled it (the better to shadow the injury they had done to the company of stationers, by invading their property) the King's Psalter, which occasioning a dispute, it was referred to a hearing before the council at Whitehall, the king being present, and the company the better to make out their title and claim, carried with them this person as their counsel, who in opening of the case, and making the complaint of the apparent injury done to the company, in printing what was really their property, he had this expression, viz. They have teemed with a spurious brat, which being clandestinely midwived into the world, the better to cover the imposture, they lay it at your majesty's door, &c. This, though the king might have taken it (for sundry reasons) as a reflection upon his royal person, yet he was so far from resenting it that way, that he only turned to one of the lords that sat next him, and said, This is a bold fellow, I'll warrant him. And indeed the stationers had the matter declared by the honourable board in their favour.

The Popish plot being discovered about this time by Dr. Oates and others, the nation was for a while in a ferment, and matters run extremely high in disputes and controversies, and he sailed with the current, declaring with much heat and violence against the priests, jesuits, and others of the conspirators and Romish faction; as appeared not only by his vehement expressions in pleading against them, but the alacrity and little concern that was visible in his countenance, when at any time, as recorder of London, he passed sentence of death upon any of them, which he generally did with more or less reproach, and became in a manner the terror of that party. But he no sooner perceived the wind tacking at court, and that there was some misunderstanding between king Charles the Second and his parliament, than he began to fall off, and grow cold in prosecuting the ends of the government, being frequently at court, and labouring, as much as in him lay, to draw the magistracy of the city after him; as appears more especially in one passage, viz. The king being recovered of an indisposition, that had for some time put the kingdoms in a fear and doubt of his life, the lord-mayor and aldermen went to congratulate him upon his going abroad; after which, and a favourable reception, it was proposed by Jeffreys, that they should in like manner wait upon his royal highness, then duke of York, who was not long before returned from Flanders; but perceiving no forwardness to be seconded, he only, with his father-in-law, stayed behind to gain that access. These and other proceedings created in the city a jealousy; that he had espoused an interest to their prejudice, which wrought so strong in their conceits, that it was concluded in the council-chamber at Guildhall, that he should resign his recordership; and accordingly they sent to him to deliver back the papers and writings they had intrusted him with, which accordingly was done, and sir George Treby constituted recorder in his stead.

Vexed to the heart at this, he now openly declared himself to be what before was only suspected, indulging his thoughts in nothing more, than how he might revenge it upon the dissenters, to whose influence on the court of aldermen he attributed his dismission from the recordership, and used his endeavours to blacken them as much as he could. Yet all his honour was not sunk; for he had prevailed for the removal of sir Job Charlton from the chief-justiceship of the county-palatine of Chester, and by the importunity and interest of his party at court, gained it for himself; and took the first possession of that charge in much splendour, paying at that time his father a visit with a numerous train, which, as it is reported, put the old gentleman in such a fret, for for the drinking up his cyder, and devouring his provisions, that he charged him with the undertaking to ruin him, by bringing a whole country at his heels, commanding him never to attempt the like prodigality again with hopes of success.

Several petitions being put up upon the dissolving the parliament, in 1682, by most of the counties, boroughs, and corporations of England, for the speedy calling another, to redress the grievances of the nation; and the king shewing some dislike to that manner of proceeding, this person further to endear himself to the interest of the court, declared in his station as vehemently against them, by saying, He abhorred that petitioning, &c. from which, and the discountenancing the petitioners as much as in him lay, he gained the name and epithet of an Abhorrer; and upon the burning the pope in effigy at Temple-Bar, upon the birth-day of queen Elizabeth, amongst other figures, the arch wags had set one on horseback with his face to the tail, and a paper on his back, viz. I AM AN ABHORRER.

In the mean time, the parliament being called, met at Westminster, and amongst others, this person was called before them, for attempting to intrench upon the rights and privileges of the people, &c. and obliged at the bar of the House of Commons (after having been heard what he could say in defence of his proceedings by his counsel) to make his acknowledgment upon his knees, and receive the reprimand of the speaker; whereupon, with some sharp rebukes, as the censure of the house, he was dismissed.

This parliament being dissolved, and a call of serjeants had at the King's-Bench bar, Westminster, he was the first in the roll, and consequently the king's serjeant; and as it is usual to present the king with a ring on that occasion, the motto he agreed to, was, A Deo Rex, a Rege Lex; viz. The king from God, and the law from the king. And now the Popish party playing their cards with more security, Edward Fitzharris, who had been impeached by the Commons, and stood charged by them of high-treason; being nevertheless, upon the dissolution, tried at the King's-Bench bar, this person was the principal stickler against him, and by his rhetoric and florid expressions, wrought so powerfully with the jury, who were somewhat in doubt what they should do in this case, that they found him guilty, and the impeachment in parliament set aside, he was executed as a traitor at Tyburn: and soon after this, the Dissenters losing their esteem in the eyes of the court party, and some justices of peace of Middlesex being sharp upon them, this person was chosen chairman at the sessions at Hicks's-Hall, where he had an opportunity to make them, as he found his time, feel the resentment of his anger; but this place being held too low for a spirit winged with so large an ambition, he aimed at higher things, resolving, like Icarus, to be near the sun, though at the hazard of melting his waxen wings, dropping headlong into the sea of inevitable ruin. Whereupon perceiving some hot contests in the city of London, about the election of magistrates and officers, he turned the edge of his fury that way, inso-much, that a Quo Warranto came down against the charter of the honourable city of London, and in fine, after much pleading and arguments pro & contra, the charter was surrendered, at least in consent, by those that were in power, and the king suspending the execution of the judgment obtained, caused such orders to be observed as he thought most convenient, which being so well known to the citizens of London, it would appear a presumption in me to enter upon particulars; yet the chief cavil against the city was, taking the toll of markets, collecting money to build Cheap-side conduit, &c. Nor was it long after this, that several persons were tried for rioters, who attended the election of sheriffs and mayor, and fines were passed upon many worthy citizens, as rioters on that occasion; in promoting which, this person as a counsellor by his florid rhetoric was mainly instrumental, by giving the court an account of their respective abilities, the better to settle the fines; and the lord chief justice Saunders dying, he succeeded him as lord chief justice of the King's-Bench; in which station he was scarcely settled, but he admitted the Popish lords to bail, that lay under an impeachment in parliament, and whose bailing had been refused by his predecessors, the judges.

Here by the way it will not be amiss to let the reader have a taste of some passages that happened on the public stage of business, in the jocular part of this great man's life, and the repartees he met with, of which I shall instance a few.

It happened once upon a trial, that a plain country fellow, giving evidence in the court, and pressing it home, moved this person, who was counsel on the other side, to pick a quarrel with this poor man's leather doublet, and amongst other interrogations, bawled out, You fellow in the leather doublet, pray what have you for swearing? The man upon this, looking steadily on him, replied, Truly, sir, if you have no more for lying than I have for swearing, you might wear a leather doublet as well as I. This bluntly retorted, caused at that time much laughter, and filled the town with the discourse of it.

It happened another time, that some musicians brought an action against a person, at whose wedding-day they had played, for the money they were promised or expected, when in the midst of the evidence, this person called to one of them, viz. You fidler, &c. at which the man seemed disgusted; he again, upon the party's alleging himself to be a musician, demanded, What difference there was between a musician and a fidler? As much, sir, said he, as there is between a pair of bagpipes and a recorder. And he then being recorder of London, it was taken as a suitable repartee.

A gentleman in the country having married a city orphan, comes and demands her fortune, which was about 1100l. but by all the friends that he could make, could not procure it, till he goes to Jeffreys, then recorder, and gave him 100 guineas to be his friend to get out his wife's fortune, upon which Jeffreys told him, that the court of aldermen would sit such a day; the gentleman appearing, was called in, Jeffreys being present, who asked him, Sirrah, what's your business? Upon which the gentleman told him, That he had married a city orphan, and desired he might have her portion out of the chamber; upon which Jeffreys asked him, If he had asked the consent of the court of aldermen? He told him, No. Upon which he called him rogue, rascal, sirrah, you should have asked leave from the court for such a marriage. He told him he understood not the custom of the city, and begged their pardon, being a country gentleman. Upon this Jeffreys abused him again; but afterwards gave him a note for his money; his public railing upon him being only to blind the court, that they might not suspect him bribed.

When he was chief justice, being at a country assize, trying a cause, an old man with a great beard came to give evidence before him, and not doing it to his mind; he began to cavil with his beard, and amongst other expressions told him, That if his conscience was as large as his beard, he might well swear any thing. This so nettled the old blade, that without any respect to his greatness, he briskly replied, My lord, if you go about to measure consciences by beards, your lordship has none.

Now Jeffreys prosecuted Mr. Baxter for his paraphrase upon the New Testament, and sent him to prison; he coming out by an Habeas Corpus, was fain to abscond in the country (in constant pain) till the term. Then his often waitings at the bar (where he could not stand) and then to be railingly treated by Jeffreys and Withins, and called rogue and knave, and not suffered to speak one word of answer for himself, and his counsel being reviled that offered to speak for him, was far harder to him than his imprisonment. And then going from the bar, he only said, That his predecessor thought otherwise of him. Jeffreys replied, There was not an honest man in England that took him not for a knave; not excepting the king, that had given him another testimony in words.

The several trials in the West were deferred for some time after the fatal blow given to the duke of Monmouth.

on Fower-Hill, because of my lord's being at Tunbridge; but the latter end of August, he with a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, assisted with four other judges, set forward with a party of horse, he being made by special commission their general. The first place he came at, was Winchester, where were divers prisoners on suspicion; but here began the tragedy: for the lady Lisle was there arraigned for high-treason, in harbouring Mr. Hicks and Mr. Nelthorp, that had been concerned with the duke; the lady being on her trial, the jury being dissatisfied once and again, but my lord's threats and other managery, so disposed the jury, that at last they brought the lady in guilty; on which he pronounced the sentence of death on her, as usual in such cases; but she had the favour of being beheaded: their other prisoners were carried to Salisbury; and this was the most remarkable thing at those assizes.

For Salisbury they set forward from thence, where were many prisoners that had been picked up and down the country, then in the gaol, the which, with those that were brought from Winton, were ordered to be carried to Dorchester, there not being evidence enough to accomplish what was then designed by my lord; so that little of moment passed there, but to pursue the matter, proceeds from thence to Dorchester, where he with his assistants, gownmen and swordmen, arrived on the 3d of September, on which day, being Thursday, the commission was read. Friday morning there was an excellent sermon preached before their lordships, by a worthy divine, chaplain to a worthy person of that country, much tending to mercy: it was observed, that while my lord chief justice was in church at prayers, as well as at sermon, he was seen to laugh; which was so unbecoming a person in his character, that ought, in so weighty an affair as he was then entering upon, to have been more serious, and have craved the assistance of Almighty God.

When the sermon was over, their lordships repaired to the court, which by order of the lord chief justice was hung with red cloth, a colour suitable to such a succeeding bloody tragedy, being accompanied by a numerous company of the gentry of that county, as well as the flower of the neighbouring counties of Somerset and Devonshire, and then proceeded to give his charge; in which charge, by reason of the severity of his sentiments, and positions laid down to make discoveries of all such as were abettors, aiders, or assisters to the late duke of Monmouth, on pain of high-treason, which was a great surprise to all the auditors, and so vehemently urged, and so passionately expressed, as seemed rather the language of a Romish inquisitor, than a Protestant judge; and then adjourned until eight o'clock next morning, when a bill was found against thirty persons charged with high-treason, for aiding and assisting the late duke of Monmouth; who put themselves on their trials, notwithstanding my lord's threatening, That if any did put themselves on trial, and the country found them guilty, they should have but a little time to live. And at the same time insinuated, That it were better to plead guilty, if they expected any favour.

"Now these thirty being on trial, the evidences being sworn and examined before the jury; by the violent deportment of the lord chief justice, and sharpness of the jury, they found twenty-nine guilty, though some of them were very hardly dealt with, and not so criminal as my lord and the country imagined. Particularly amongst the twenty-nine, were Mr. Matthew Bragg, of Thorncomb, and Joseph Speed, of Culliton, in the county of Devonshire, and Mr. Smith, constable of Chardstock, in the said county, and George Steward, of Culliton aforesaid.

"These persons being found (as before) guilty, my lord immediately pronounced sentence of death on them all, as is usual in cases of high-treason, and did the same night give a warrant to the sheriff for the execution of thirteen of the twenty-nine on Monday following; which accordingly was done, notwithstanding great application was made to the lord chief justice by gentlemen of the best quality, in this and the neighbouring counties, for a reprieve for Mr. Bragg, to all which he was deaf, and not to be prevailed upon, though he was assured of his honesty, and true conformity to the church of England, yet it availed nothing. At last it was only requested for ten days respite, yet that had no better effect; but on Monday he with twelve more of that number were accordingly executed at Dorchester.

In the interim this proceeding was designed to shorten business, and to wheedle the rest that were to follow to a confession, without which the tenth part of them could not be proved guilty. A method was also taken without precedent, to entrap many poor ignorant people, by a couple of officers that were sent into the gaol, to call over, and to take the names of the prisoners, on promise, if they confessed, they might expect mercy, otherwise not; which many did. And this was written so, that had they pleaded not guilty, these two were designed to have been evidences against them from their own confessions, which so disposed the remaining great numbers, that all, except a very few, pleaded guilty, which put an end to any further trial.

Now the only thing remaining, was the pronouncing sentence on them, which were in number 292, who received sentence of death all at once. One Mr. Lawrence put himself on trial, but by the jury found guilty, whose case was hard, his circumstances being so small to be condemned to die; and had actually suffered, had not application been made to my lord's favourites, and with the payment and securing of 400l. preserved him from execution.

When this matter was adjusted, and execution awarded to about 80, which were executed, and their quarters set up and down the country to the dread of the spectators, as well as the annoyance of the travellers; his extraordinary whippings, though unmerciful, are not to be taken notice of. So we leave this place, and proceed towards the city of Exon: in their way thither, lying at an honourable gentleman's house, divers of the neighbouring parishes made their petitions to the lord chief justice in the behalf of some relations concerned. It happened, that through some disorder amongst his servants, some pistols were fired that night, which gave him a suspicion, or at least he took it, of some design upon him; on which at parting he said, Not a man of all those parishes that were of that vicinity, if found guilty, should escape. And so we proceed, and arrive at Exon, where to the number of 243 prisoners being in custody for assisting the said duke of Monmouth, one amongst the rest, Mr. Fower Acers, pleading not guilty, he being found by the jury, the said lord chief justice immediately pronounced sentence upon him, and immediate execution, which was done to terrify the rest, who all pleaded guilty; so that these unfortunate people had not time to have the fairness of trials allowed them, which is a right due by the laws of God and man. The remaining number he all condemned; and here was a little sparing, not so many ordered for execution as were in the other county, but those that were executed, were hung up and down in most towns of the county, and their quarters and heads scattered up and down the highways and public places. An extraordinary sentence of severe whipping was pronounced against Mr. Samuel Staple, of Thorncomb, in the said county; but these are trifles, and we shall endeavour to pursue our design, and make as quick dispatch as we can, that time may not be lost, the king served, and this miscreant's thirst quenched with Protestant blood, which is always well pleasing to inquisitors, and so proceed to the town of Taunton, at which place being arrived, it was thought fit by the lord chief justice to be as expeditious as might be; so that late in the afternoon the court sat, where the commission being read, he proceeded to give charge, which was so very keen and full of sharp invectives, as if the country itself had not been able to make expiation to his lordship, to quench his thirst in the blood of those that ventured their all in defence of the Protestant religion; and here we enter upon the bloodiest part of the tragedy; in this town, and at Wells in the said county, were more than 500 prisoners.

Now to begin at Taunton; the next morning after the charge given, the assizes began, where some few put them-fellows on trial, who were found guilty, and immediately ordered to be executed: of which number one Mr. Simon Hambling was one, who was a zealous worthy good man, and his case no way dangerous, but on the contrary, had he had to do with a judge of another stamp. To proceed to the rest: this first cruelty caused the rest to plead guilty in hopes of favour, which was only a few days to live, which those that pleaded had not. Amongst these at Taunton were divers eminent persons that had been taken in the West, and carried to London, and brought down there to complete the bloody tragedy in those parts: Mr. Parrot, Mr. Hewling, the elder, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Hucker, and divers others were very eminent. To take notice of every particular in this matter, will alter our design, and swell the account to too great a bulk, being only designed for a short sketch; and useful it may be to see the cruelty of men when in their power, and how the devil stirreth up his instruments, to pursue those that adventure for the cause of God and religion. Here were in this country executed 239, the rest that were condemned were transported, except such as were able to furnish coin, and that not a little: for an account was taken of men's abilities, according to which the purchase for life must be managed by two of his favourites, who had a small share, the rest went into his lordship's pocket; according to the actions of Rome, where sins of any kind may be pardoned for money. This indeed was a glorious design in the eye of the mother church, to root out heresy by executions and transportations, to make room for a pack; here expedition must be made to conclude at Wells, for that a great man being fallen, our great judge designing his chair, which in short he had, as the reward of so eminent and extraordinary a piece of service as he did for the advancement of the Roman-Catholics interest, which is cruel always where it prevails.

Here we leave the town of Taunton, after awarding execution to many there, and their quarters to be scattered up and down the country; so we proceed to Wells, where divers prisoners that had been carried from gaol to gaol, in expectation of evidence against them, were in carts removed to Wells: in which place, to finish this expedition, the same method as was at the former assizes, was also taken here by a severe charge, affronting the gentlemen of this county, as he had done in all the counties before, terrifying the juries (when any pleaded) to make them bring in the persons guilty; some of which were over-awed, and it is doubted contrary to their judgments; which if so, the Lord forgive them.

Many eminent and worthy persons that received the sentence of death were among this number, but the executions of the county being put together, as you have before seen, we make no particular division of the number here, and the number at Taunton, the whole being recited before: we shall therefore endeavour to be as brief as we can, to give you what we think material, and truly matter of fact; my lord now being come to conclude this extraordinary commission, and in haste to be elevated, maketh all manner of dispatch to repair to the king then at Windsor, to give an account of his transactions, and to receive the reward of his meritorious service, in this butchering of Protestants, which is so acceptable to his holiness, and his bigotted disciples, as nothing can be more; and indeed, if you will believe them, a work that merits heaven at last, besides what temporal preferments are thought fit in this world. If this judge were a true Protestant, his case is much the worse, being made use of as a tool to destroy, and carry on Popish designs. Thus the affairs being ended, the country filled with heads and quarters of those that were executed, the rest that had not wherewith to purchase their lives, left in custody in order for transportation.

When this bloody tragedy in the West was over, our Protestant judge returns to London: soon after which alderman Cornish felt the anger of somebody behind the curtain; for it is to be noted, that he was sheriff when Best prayed an indictment might be preferred, and was, as well as sheriff Bethel, earnest in promoting it; alleging, that it was no ways reasonable that the juries of London should lie under such a reproach, &c.

But passing this over, we now find this person arrived at the pinnacle of honour: the purse and mace were reserved for him, vacant by the death of the lord-keeper North, and he advanced to the lord-chancellorship of England; raised by this means, as one might think, above the envy of the crowd; and it might be wished, in so dangerous a height he had looked better to his foot-steps; for now being created baron of Wem, we find him in a high commission, or ecclesiastical court, suspending the honourable the lord bishop of London, from performing the episcopal office and function of that see, and for no other default, than not readily complying with the king's letter, in suspending Dr. Sharp, dean of Norwich, for preaching a sermon in the parish church of St. Giles's in the Fields, at the request of the parishioners, shewing the errors and fallacies of the Romish religion; the better to confirm them in the faith and doctrine of the church of England. Nor was it this good bishop alone that was aimed at; for Magdalen-College, at Oxford, was next attempted, and in that very mother of learning, and chief seminary of our church, such alterations were made as startled the kingdom; by whose counsel I undertake not to determine: but in the midst of liberty of conscience, as twice declared, the church of England had a test put upon her sons, which seemed such a paradox that has been rarely heard of, viz. To read the king's declaration for liberty of conscience in the churches, during the time of divine service, and a mark, and penalties threatened to the refusers; which was evidently demonstrated by the imprisonment of those worthy patriots of the church, his grace the lord archbishop of Canterbury, the lord bishops of Bath and Wells, Ely, Peterborough, Chichester, St. Asaph, and Bristol; who for shewing their reasons why they could not comply with this command, by way of humble petition, were sent to the Tower, and afterwards tried upon information of high misdemeanor, at the court of King's-Bench; where their innocence appearing in a plain manner, they were acquitted, to the scandal of their accusers: yet orders were sent into all parts of England, to return an account to the lord-chancellor, of those that refused to read the declaration, that they might be proceeded against, for a contempt of what their consciences would not permit them to do; and for a time they were extremely hot upon it. Much about this time there was a considerable suit depending before him in chancery, between a great heiress and others, which was sufficiently talked of in the world, not without loud and deep reflection on his honesty and honour; for having given the cause for the young lady, he very speedily afterwards married her to his son; with this remarkable circumstance, she being a Papist, to make sure work, he married them both ways, both by a priest of the church of Rome, and a divine of the church of England. And here, I think, we may place the height of his honour and happiness, where he is not like to tarry long; for on the news of the great preparations in Holland, and that the prince of Orange was certainly designed for England, the determined councils cooled, and then quite ceased, so that the church of England men, whose cause the prince had espoused, were restored again to the commissions and trusts they had been lately deprived of; and amongst other charters that were on this occasion restored, was that of the city of London; and that which makes it more memorable, was, that it was brought to Guildhall by this person, though he was not attended by the shouts and acclamations he expected, nor seemed so florid or frolicksome as heretofore, which some looked upon as a bad omen; and it is reported, that soon after, he being asked by a courtier, What the heads of the prince's declaration were? he should answer, He was sure his was one, whatever the rest were.

As soon as the late king James was secured at Faversham, he desired to see his landlord, and demanded his name, who proved to be a person who had turned himself over to the King's-Bench, for a fine which fell upon him (and captain Stanbrooke, in Westminster) by the lord-chancellor's means at the board; when king James calling for a pen and ink, bid the gentleman write the discharge discharge as effectually as he would; which he signed: adding, that he was now sensible my lord-chancellor had been a very ill man, and done very ill things. If he was thus censured by his master for his former services, and he had a bad opinion of him; without prophecy any man might predict his service and interest was ceased; and his life would have been like the scape-goat, he must have borne all their crimes, and been beheaded for his own, for no less indignation than death was couched in the words. Thus may be seen what would have been his catastrophe.

By this time the court beginning to scatter, and the prince of Orange approaching, the king thought fit to withdraw himself; upon notice of which the lord-chancellor betook himself to Wapping, disguised like a seaman, in order to effect his escape to Hamburgh in a collier; but being discovered, he was brought before sir J. Chapman, lord-mayor of the city of London, in a strange disguise, very different from the habit in which he formerly appeared: and by reason of the lord mayor's indisposition, he not being able to commit him, he offered to go to the Tower, to be out of the hands of the rabble, who there in great numbers with clubs and staves, threatened him with present destruction; but having a guard of the trained-bands to conduct him, he got thence safe, and soon after was charged in custody, by a warrant of commitment from the lords at Whitehall, where he continued under much affliction and indisposition, having moved for his Habeas Corpus to be bailed, but was not able to attain it. He had not been in the Tower many days, but as it is said (whether or no, I cannot affirm) he had a barrel of oysters sent him, upon sight of which he said to the bearer, I see I have some friends left still; but upon opening the barrel, he found them to be only friends that were impatient till they gave him a prospect of his future destiny, for verily the mighty present was nothing but a good stout halter. Now as I said before, whether this passage be true or no, I cannot say, but this I am sure (if we consider his lordship's life and cruelties) the moral of it is most excellent.

In this manner he continued for some months in the Tower, his chronical indispositions, the stone, &c. increasing very fast upon him.

Dr. Laver (a very ingenious man) was his physician: but nature being now tired out by a tedious combat with his disease, and the guilt of his former bloody life, notoriously known, he contracted an ill habit of body, and at last very happily for himself, if not his relations too, died in the Tower, about nine o'clock in the morning, Anno Domini 1689.

A full Account of the direct Persecution of the Right Hon. Lord GEORGE GORDON, President of the Protestant Association and of the indirect Stigma thrown on that Body in General, through the Artifices of Romish Emiffaries.

THE better to trace this nefarious business to its original, it will be necessary to observe, that in the year 1778 a bill was brought into the House of Commons by sir George Savile, and afterwards passed into an act, for the repeal of certain provisions and penal laws, affecting the Roman-Catholics in this country; which said provisions and penal laws were contained in an act of parliament passed in the 11th and 12th years of the reign of king William the Third. This obnoxious act being now set aside by the late repeal, every Popish priest is consequently permitted to exercise any part of his function in this kingdom; Papists are allowed to keep schools, and take upon them the education, government, or boarding of youth, to purchase estates, with other indulgences and immunities.

It is further observable that it being proposed, the following winter, to bring a similar bill into parliament, to take off some penalties which were inflicted by the laws of Scotland upon the Roman Catholics of that country; this measure was so resented by the Scots, that on the 2d of February an insurrection happened in the city of Edinburgh; in consequence whereof, two Popish chapels were attacked and set on fire; the houses of the Roman-Catholics in different parts of the town were ransacked and demolished; and the tumult rose to such a height, that the utmost exertions of the civil magistrate, assisted by some of the senebibles, were not able to suppress it, till the provost of the city gave assurances, in the most public manner, that the scheme was dropped, and no act of parliament would be applied for, respecting the Roman-Catholics of Scotland. Such was the effectual opposition the proceedings of the then violent British minister and parliament met with in the North, on the very first appearance of countenancing the Papists there.

Affairs remained quiet for some time in England, but at length the fears and jealousies of the people were roused, from a belief (too justly founded) that the late repeal of the statute of king William would be attended with immediate danger to the state, and to the Protestant religion; whereupon an association, called THE PROTESTANT ASSOCIATION, was formed; whose main object was, to defend the Protestant religion, as by law established, against the encroachments of Popery; and also to prepare and present a petition to parliament, for a repeal of the late act in favour of the Roman-Catholics. The right honourable lord George Gordon was president of this association; and many respectable and pious ministers, with a great number of worthy private Christians, composed a considerable part of the assembly.

By means of previous notice given in the public prints, upwards of 40,000 persons, with the members of the Protestant Association of London, Westminster, Southwark, &c. assembled in St. George's Fields, on Friday, the 2d of June 1780, in the morning, from whence they proceeded peaceably, and in regular order, to the House of Commons with their petition, which was carried by Mr. Hodgkinson. They consisted of four divisions; namely, the London, the Scotch, the Westminster, and the Southwark. When they arrived at the Parliament-House, their petition, praying for a repeal of the acts lately passed in favour of the Roman-Catholics, was presented by lord George Gordon, the president; and, being received, the subject matter of it was referred to the consideration of the House.

On this, however, as on other occasions of the like nature, where a mixed multitude is collected together, many evil-minded persons, unknown to the association, began to be very riotous, and committed awful outrages, by attacking and setting fire to Newgate and other prisons, releasing the persons confined in them, and demolished the houses and destroyed the goods of several Roman-Catholics, and others, on pretence of a zeal for the Protestant religion, but in fact for the sole purpose of indulging themselves in rioting, excess, and robbery. These lawless miscreants continued their enormities till Tuesday evening; when a tremendous scene opened, and the whole city of London was thrown into the utmost consternation, on account of the many gaols and houses that were burning at one and the same time; and had not his majesty collected together a military force on the next day to protect the city, it was apprehended that the conflagration would have been universal.

During the perpetration of these horrid acts by an abandoned rabble, lord George Gordon, accompanied by one of the sheriffs, went in person to several places where the tumults were subsisting, to harangue the outrageous banditti, and exhort them to a peaceable deportment; but all without effect. Such, however, was the malice of his enemies, who were bent on his destruction, that notwithstanding he employed every effort in his power to suppress the rage, and prevent the mischievous designs of the rioters, they did not scruple to accuse him of being their ringleader and principal abettor.

In consequence of this unjust accusation, his lordship was apprehended on Friday, the 9th of June 1780, by a warrant under the hand of one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, and was the same day committed a close prisoner to the Tower, where he was debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper, and no person of his acquaintance was suffered to enter the room, or to speak to him; and a keeper was appointed to watch him night and day, to carry the above rigorous order into strict execution.

His lordship was treated and confined in this severe manner till Michaelmas term of the said year; on the first day of which he applied to the court of King's-Bench, by petition founded upon the Habeas-Corpus act, to be either tried or set at liberty: a few days after which, in the same term, an indictment for high-treason was framed against him, and presented to the gentlemen grand jurors for the county of Middlesex, who returned it into the court of King's-Bench A TRUE BILL.

We shall here, in order to shew the unreasonableness, not to say injustice and cruelty, of these proceedings against his lordship, who was desirous, throughout the whole affair, of preserving the utmost order and decorum, insert some of the resolutions of the Protestant Association, issued for that purpose, previous to the setting out of the procession.

"Resolved, for the sake of good order and regularity, that this Association, in coming to the ground, do separate themselves into four distinct divisions, viz. the London division, the Westminster division, the Southwark division, and the Scotch division.

"Resolved, that the London division do take place upon the right of the ground towards Southwark, the Westminster division second, the Southwark division third, and the Scotch division upon the left, all wearing blue cockades, to distinguish themselves from the Papists, and those who approve of the late act in favour of Popery.

"Resolved, that the magistrates of London, Westminster, and Southwark, be requested to attend, that their presence may over-awe and control any riotous or evil-minded persons, who may wish to disturb the legal and peaceable deportment of his Majesty's Protestant subjects.

"By order of the Association, signed G. Gordon, President. Dated London, May 29."

By authority we add to this, that on his lordship's arrival at St. George's-Fields, the people there assembled formed a ring around him; in which situation, he made a short speech to them, strongly recommending a peaceable deportment and behaviour, and that in this disposition they would proceed to the house with their petition. A hand-bill inculcating the same pacific temper and conduct was likewise distributed.

Furthermore, to make it evident that neither lord Gordon, nor any of his friends, could with any degree of justice or propriety be charged as the promoters or encouragers of the horrid enormities afterwards committed by a lawless and abandoned rabble (which atrocious practices they utterly abhorred); the Protestant Association thought fit to publish the following advertisement by order of the committee, and signed by Mr. Fisher, their secretary:

"The Protestant Association think it their duty, as loyal subjects and members of civil society, in the most public manner to disavow any connection with those lawless rioters, who have for several days past, under pretence of opposing Popery, and promoting the success of the Protestant petitions, committed the most flagrant and dreadful depredations in and about the metropolis. They cannot but feel the deepest concern for the distress that has been brought on many individuals by such unprecedented and illegal proceedings, and hereby publicly declare their abhorrence of such atrocious conduct."

This full and clear vindication of his lordship and his Protestant adherents, will, we humbly trust, to every unprejudiced mind, prove a sufficient testimony of their Christian moderation, and united desire to maintain the public tranquillity by every expedient possible.

But the persecuting rage exerted against lord George Gordon, the iniquity of which was manifested in his imprisonment and trial, will appear the more glaring, when we consider the characters of the evidence upon which the indictment was found. They are thus described, and their accounts represented as follow:

Mr. Chamberlayne, solicitor to the treasury, produced a paper, signed "G. Gordon," which had been given to a man, by way of certificate, of his being a Protestant, to prevent his house from being destroyed by the rioters. He swore that he had seen lord George Gordon's writing, and did believe that this letter was written by him.

William Hay swore, that he heard lord George Gordon say publicly, at a meeting at Coach-Makers-Hall, that the king had forfeited his crown, and therefore they had a right to take up arms to recover their religious liberties.

The Rev. Thomas Bowen swore, that he heard lord George Gordon (out of the house) say to the people, They must be firm, and stand by him, for that the Scotch did not obtain their religious liberty till they had pulled down the mass houses: and that he came a second time, and declared to the people, that alderman Bull and alderman Sawbridge were violent against their petition.

M'Ray (an Irish chairman) swore, that he heard lord George Gordon say, the petition should be granted, or else——. On being asked, What else? He answered, Else! else!——He was dismissed.

Mr. Justice Wright swore, that his house was destroyed by the rioters, but could not say whether at the instigation of lord George Gordon or not.

Jealous, Parrat, and M'Manus (three of sir John Fielding's runners) swore, that they saw lord George Gordon in St. George's-Fields, with a great number of people around him, and that he remained there some time, but they could not say how long.

The other witnesses were William Metcalf, John Anstruther, John Caler, Esq. Mr. Joseph Pearson, Sampson Rainsford, Thomas Baker, David Miles, Mr. Thomas Gates, William Hyde, Esq. right honourable lord Porchester, John Lucy, Barnard Turner (a sugar-refiner) Richard Pond, John Dingwell, &c.

His lordship's trial came on in the court of King's-Bench, on Monday, the 6th of February 1781. The council for the crown were, Mr. Attorney-General, Mr. Solicitor-General, Mr. Bearcroft, Mr. Lee, Mr. Howarth, Mr. Dunning, Mr. Norton. The council for the prisoner were Mr. Kenyon and Mr. Erskine.

Mr. Kenyon made a very able defence in behalf of the noble prisoner, and several gentlemen were called to the support of what he had urged in favour of his lordship, and in contradiction to every fact asserted for the prosecution.

The names of the witnesses on behalf of the prisoner were, the Rev. Erasmus Middleton, Mr. T. Evans, lord viscount Stormont, sir Philip Jennings Clerke, Bart. sir James Lowther, Bart. William Smith, Mrs. Whittingham, Alexander Johnstone, Alexander Frazer, John Humphries, Sampson Hodgkinson, John Robinson, Mrs. Yaud, and Mr. alderman Pugh.

Mr. Erskine then spoke, for he begged to be permitted to reserve what he had to say till after the evidence on their part should be examined, which was granted. This gentleman displayed both his eloquence and understanding on the occasion. The Solicitor-General replied, and lord Mansfield then summed up the evidence, but declined making any comments, and as soon as he had delivered his charge he left the court.

The jury withdrew, and in about twenty minutes returned. Just as they were taking their seats, Mr. Erskine fainted away. Some time was lost by this accident. The verdict was then pronounced—NOT GUILTY.

The burst of applause that took place on this was very great, and attended by circumstances that made it highly affecting; lord William Gordon fainted away, and the old faithful servant of lord George fell into fits.

After the tumult had subsided, lord George Gordon, being rescued from the numbers that pressed upon him with their congratulations, came forward and addressed the jury in the following words:

"Gentlemen of the jury, you have done perfectly right in the verdict you have given. I am not the person I was charged to be. I declare to God, that I am as innocent as any one of you, and never designed any thing of treason against my king or country. Gentlemen, it has been a wicked and infamous prosecution—

His lordship was interrupted by the jury, upon which he concluded, "Gentlemen, I beg your pardon; excuse my warmth. I heartily thank you, and God bless you."

Judge Willes then informed lord George that he was discharged, and of course at liberty to depart, and his lordship, at near six o'clock on Tuesday morning (the 6th) went from the hall, attended by his brothers, the duke of Gordon and lord William Gordon. The duke of Richmond, lord Derby, Mr. Fox, Mr. Sheridan, and many other public gentlemen, were also present.

The futility and contradictory nature of many of the evidence, collected together to procure the conviction and death of lord Gordon, for a crime of which he had always retained an utter detestation; together with the very able and clear justification of his conduct by his learned counsel, set his innocence in so conspicuous a point of view, as to bring about an honourable acquittal, to the confusion of his enemies, and the entire satisfaction of all real friends to civil and religious liberty, and the Protestant cause; and we have the pleasure to observe, that his lordship was much indebted to the very just and sensible description of the Protestant Association given by the Rev. Mr. Middleton, who was a member thereof.

And there never was a single person either convicted, tried, or even apprehended, on suspicion of being accessory to, or any ways promoting the riots, who was a member of that respectable body, the Protestant Association; this circumstance must therefore afford a satisfactory proof that the persecution of lord George Gordon was set on foot and carried on by unprincipled Protestants, and avowed Papists, in order to take away the life of this truly honourable man, who had always approved himself a hearty and zealous friend to his king and country, a warm defender of its civil and religious liberties, and a strenuous opposer and detester of the tenets and practices of the Roman-Catholics, as inimical to the best and dearest interests of mankind in general.

Such being the amiable disposition of mind possessed by his lordship, and so pure and well-directed were his views and intention respecting the important cause in which he engaged, that it is matter of astonishment such a spirit of persecution, nearly allied to that of a Popish inquisition, should go forth against him, were we not assured, from the sacred records, that the seed of the serpent will never cease to persecute and harass the seed of the woman. But as truth and innocence always have, and ever will, prove victorious over error and malevolence, so it happened in this instance.

As a further exculpation of his lordship, and the members of the Protestant Association, it may be necessary to observe, in general, that there was not one man of character or condition, of any description, who abetted the rioters in the commission of such dreadful enormities and excesses; nor was there any man among the Association who was either tried, or taken up on suspicion, except his lordship, whose too forward zeal might perhaps precipitate him into measures which he was far from imagining would be productive of those dreadful consequences by which the whole metropolis, and its environs, were thrown into a state of convulsion unparalleled in the annals of history. The horrid outrages committed by those abandoned wretches, the rioters, were so numerous and terrifying, and the further mischiefs dreaded from their menaces were so tremendous, that (as was remarked of one of the cruel Roman emperors) one would almost think the Divine Being had suffered those miscreants to run such shocking lengths, to shew what horrid excesses the human mind is capable of, when left without restraint to its own evil bias. But the punishment due to such heinous crimes soon overtook many of them, though it is to be feared not all of the most guilty; since several imprudent and over-curious persons, by mixing with the principal actors, had involved themselves in the same punishment. But, however, the sufferings of some of the most notorious offenders, at the same time that it may serve as an example of terror to evil doers, sufficiently proves, that how daringly soever wickedness may triumph for a season, it will draw after it the punishment justly due to the transgression of human laws, and, without repentance, an obnoxiousness to the Almighty's vengeance.

All persecutions, particularly those on the score of religion, are in themselves diabolical, and therefore diametrically opposite to the mild and benign spirit of the gospel of Jesus Christ, who, when he was reviled and maltreated, returned not evil for evil, but contrariwise blessing. In these enlightened days, persecution is considered as an abominable and detestable crime: its first principle was, to increase morality, by enforcing one opinion, and exterminating all others; but, like madness, its characteristic was, acting consistently upon wrong principles; it went on this grand error, that a man could judge of the opinion of another, better than he who entertained it: it might naturally have been imagined, that the philanthropic doctrines of Christianity would have proved a remedy for this error; but, through the depravity of the human heart, the reverse had turned out to be the fact, and torture and death had been introduced, to force men from their religious opinions into such as those in power entertained.

Persecution (if in the milder sense it may be so called) went originally upon a principle of kindness: its primary intention was, to promote unity of opinion with regard to the truth, as handed down to us by Christ and his apostles, and the extinction of those opinions which were conceived to be erroneous: but in process of time, persecution became a most cruel and insupportable tyrant, the very reverse of toleration, which is founded, and that successfully, on philosophy and reason. The language of persecution is arrogant, contracted, and haughty: it says, "I know the consequences of your opinions better than you know them yourself." The mild language of toleration is far different: that may indeed express a dislike of a certain opinion, but says, "Since you profess such and such an opinion, I will not believe that you think such dangerous inferences may be drawn from it, as I do." The latter mode of judging is less liable to error than the former, and far more adapted to promote the happiness and peace of the community. It is right to judge, by the fruit of the tree, from the effect of the cause: other modes of judging are liable to continual error; inasmuch as men must judge of acts, and not merely of opinions.

Impressed with these ideas, we may safely infer, that a persecuting Christian is a contradiction in terms; for the weapons of Christ's soldiers are not carnal, much less diabolical and infernal; such being injurious to a good cause, and scandalous to true religion. The word and Spirit of God are the most proper instruments for propagating and impressing the truth as it is in Jesus, who, being himself meek and lowly in heart, requires all that bear his name to be like-minded—not only to commit no evil themselves, but to bear it patiently from others, who will, by observing such a suitable conduct in real Christians, be convinced that they are governed by the dictates of scripture, right reason, good sense, and sound policy; thus rendering Christianity so amiable in the eyes even of its opposers and persecutors, that its enemies may be constrained to throw down their arms, and enlist under its banner.

A PARTICULAR ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS in the FIRST AGES of the WORLD.

SHORTLY after the creation the spirit of persecution began to shew itself in the world. Of this we have a lamentable account given by Moses. The righteous Abel was the first martyr who fell a sacrifice to the envy and cruelty of his brother Cain.

Afterwards commenced the persecution of Noah by his son Ham; the persecution of Lot at Sodom; of Joseph by his brethren, &c.

The first general persecution in these early ages, may be deemed that of the children of Israel by Pharaoh. This tyrant not only afflicted both sexes of all ages by means of the most cruel task-masters, but even ordered the new-born infants of the Hebrew women to be murdered. He was, however, punished for his persecutions; first by ten dreadful plagues, and afterwards by being swallowed up in the Red Sea, with all his people.

The children of Israel, after being freed from bondage, were successively persecuted by the Philistines, Ammonites, Egyptians, Ethiopians, Arabians, and Assyrians; and many of the prophets and chosen of God were persecuted by several of the kings of Judah and Israel.

Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, the three righteous children were thrown into the fiery furnace by Nebuchadnezzar; Daniel was cast into the lion's den by order of Darius; and Mordecai was persecuted by the malicious Haman: but these were all respectively saved by the Almighty, and their persecutors punished for their perfidy.

Likewise, the Jews were persecuted by the neighbouring idolators during the time of their building and fortifying Jerusalem, till that great work was finished by the care of Nehemiah; but after its completion they were frequently disturbed by the Persians, and the successors of Alexander the Great, though that monarch himself had granted favours the most unlimited.

About a little more than a century and a half before the birth of Christ, Antiochus seized upon and sacked the city of Jerusalem, plundered the temple, and murdered many of the Jews who refused to conform to his idolatry, by scourging, strangling, crucifying, and stifling them, and by closing up the mouths of the caves to which they fled for refuge.

However, Antiochus and the idolatrous tormentors were at length bravely opposed by Matthias a priest, and his valiant sons, the principal of whom was Judas Maccabeus. This able commander Judas, with his brave brothers, inspired the dispirited Jews with new courage, defeated the generals of Antiochus, freed their country from bondage, and afterwards turned their arms against the Edomites and Ammonites, over whom they were equally successful.

Antiochus at length died a terrible death, his flesh having been some time before quite putrid, and producing maggots; so that he became loathsome to himself, and nauseous to all about him. His successors, however, continued their enmity to the Jews; but they were opposed by the Maccabees with various success.

Now the Jews entered into a treaty offensive and defensive with the Romans; but soon after lost their worthy champion Judas Maccabeus, who was slain in a bloody battle battle fought with the Greeks, under the command of their general Bacchides.

While Antiochus Epiphanes reigned in Syria, having some success against the Jews, he went to Jerusalem, where he ordered Eleazer the priest to be put to death in the most cruel manner, for refusing to eat swine's flesh. Then seizing on a family of Maccabees, consisting of a matron named Salamona, and her seven sons, he carried them all to Antioch. Here he would fain have persuaded them to embrace his idolatry, which they nobly and unanimously refusing, he ordered them all to be put to death.

Accordingly Maccabeus, the eldest, was stripped, stretched on the rack, and severely beaten. He was next fastened to a wheel, and weights hung to his feet till his sinews cracked. Afterwards his tormentors threw him into a fire till he was dreadfully scorched; then they drew him out, cut out his tongue, and put him into a frying-pan, with a slow fire under it, till he died. As long as he had life, and power of expression, under these exquisite torments, he fervently called upon God, and exhorted his brothers to a similar perseverance.

When the second son had his hands fastened with chains, with which he was hung up, his skin was flayed off from the crown of his head to his knees. He was then cast to a leopard, but the beast refusing to touch him, he was suffered to languish till he expired with the excruciating pain, and loss of blood.

Machir, the third son, was bound to a globe till his bones were all dislocated; his head and face were then flayed, his tongue cut out, and being cast into a pan he was fried to death.

Judas, the fourth son, after having his tongue cut out, was beat with ropes, and then racked upon a wheel.

Achas, the fifth son, was pounded in a large brazen mortar.

Areth, the sixth son, was fastened to a pillar with his head downwards, slowly roasted by a fire kindled at some distance; his tongue was then cut out, and he was lastly fried in a pan.

Jacob, the seventh and youngest son, had his arms cut off, his tongue plucked out, and was then fried to death.

They all bore their fate with the same intrepidity as their elder brother, and called upon the Almighty to receive them into heaven.

Salamona, their mother, after having in a manner died seven deaths in beholding the martyrdom of her children, was, by the tyrant's order, stripped naked, severely scourged, her breasts cut off, and her body fried till she expired.

The inhuman tyrant who inflicted these cruelties, was afterwards struck with madness; and then his flesh became corrupted, and his bowels mortified, which put an end to himself and his wickedness.

Containing a full and particular Account of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and cruel MARTYRDOM of Our Blessed LORD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST; together with that of his APOSTLES, EVANGELISTS, &c. the TEN GREAT PERSECUTIONS in the PRIMITIVE CHURCH, &c. &c.

WHEN Herod the Great was informed that a king of the Jews should be born in Bethlehem, he sent a number of troops to destroy all the children under two years of age, in that place, and throughout the neighbouring coast. By this cruel order he hoped to have destroyed the child Jesus; but in this he was not only disappointed, but punished with such a spirit of lunacy, that he slew his own wife, children, relations, friends, &c. He was afterwards visited by the most grievous maladies, particularly an inward burning, slow, but unremitting; an uncommon appetite, continually craving, but ever unsatisfied; a cramp that racked him with pain; a flux that reduced him to weakness; worms that bred in him and gnawed him; vermin that engendered about him and devoured him; a general putrefaction that consumed him; and, in fine, all those complicated disorders which could possibly render him hateful to himself, and odious to others. His torments at length became so intolerable, that not having either the comforts of religion, or the support of a good conscience to sustain his sinking spirits, he attempted to lay violent hands upon himself. Being prevented in this attempt by those about him, he at last sunk under the oppression of his afflictions, and in the most miserable manner expired.

Now when Herod the Less married the daughter of the king of Arabia, he repudiated her, and espoused Herodias, his brother Philip's wife: for which marriage, full of incest and adultery, John the Baptist boldly and severely reprov'd him. This freedom greatly incensed Herodias; for we are informed by St. Matthew, in the xiv. chapter of his gospel, that "when Herod's birth-day was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased Herod: whereupon he promised with an oath, to give her whatsoever she would ask. And she being before instructed of her mother, said, Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger. And the king was sorry: nevertheless, for the oath's sake, and them which sat with him at meat, he commanded it to be given her; and he sent and beheaded John in the prison. And his head was brought in a charger, and given to the damsel: and she brought it to her mother." The authors of this cruelty were, however, all severely punished; for the daughter of Herodias being afterwards dancing upon the ice, it broke, and she falling in, had her head severed from her body by its again closing; and Herod, with the incestuous adulteress Herodias, falling under the displeasure of the Roman emperor, were banished, and died miserably in exile. As this martyr's nativity happened on the 24th of June, accordingly on that day the church celebrates his memory.

Let us now proceed with the history of our Blessed Redeemer. In the reign of Herod the Great already mentioned, the angel Gabriel was sent by the Almighty to a holy virgin, called Mary. This maiden was betrothed to a carpenter named Joseph, who resided at Nazareth, a city of Galilee, but the consummation had not then taken place; for it was the custom of the eastern nations to contract persons of each sex from their childhood, though the cohabitation was not permitted till years of maturity.

Upon this the angel informed Mary how highly she was favoured of God, and that she should conceive a son by the Holy Spirit, which happened accordingly: for travelling to Bethlehem to pay the capitation-tax then levied, the town was so crowded that they could only get lodgings in a stable, where the holy virgin brought forth our Blessed Redeemer, which was announced to the world by a star and an angel: the wise men of the East saw the first, and the shepherd's the latter. After Jesus had been circumcised, he was presented in the temple by the holy virgin; upon which occasion Simeon broke out into the celebrated words mentioned in in the Liturgy: "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Luke ii. 29, 30.

In his youth, Jesus disputed with the most learned doctors in the temple, and soon after was baptized in the river Jordan by John, when the Holy Ghost descended upon him in the form of a dove, and a voice was heard audibly to pronounce these words: "This is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased."

After this Christ fasted forty days and nights in the wilderness, when he was tempted by the Devil, but resisted all his allurements. He then performed his first miracle at Cana in Galilee; he likewise converted with the good Samaritan, and restored to life a nobleman's dead child. Travelling through Galilee, he restored the blind to sight, cured the lame, the lepers, &c. &c. &c. likewise among other benevolent actions, at the pool of Bethesda, he cured a paralytic man who had been lame thirty-eight years, bidding him take up his bed and walk; and he afterwards cured a man, whose right hand was shrunk up and withered.

When he had chosen his twelve apostles, he preached the celebrated sermon upon the Mount; after which he performed several miracles, particularly the feeding of the multitude, and the walking on the surface of the water.

When the passover was celebrated, Jesus supped with his disciples; informed them, that one of them would betray him, and another deny him, and preached his farewell sermon. Soon after, a multitude of armed men surrounded him, and Judas kissed him, in order to point him out to the soldiers who did not know him personally. In the scuffle occasioned by the apprehending of Jesus, Peter cut off the ear of Malchus the servant of the high-priest, for which Jesus reproved him, and healed the wound by touching it. Peter and John followed Jesus to the house of Annas, who refusing to judge him, sent him bound to Caiaphas, where Peter denied Christ, as the latter had predicted; but on Christ's reminding him of his perfidy, Peter went out and wept bitterly.

As soon as the council assembled in the morning, the Jews mocked Jesus, and the elders suborned false witnesses against him: the principal accusation against him being, that he had said, "I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands," Mark xiv. 58. Caiaphas then asked him if he was Christ, the Son of God, or no; being answered in the affirmative, he was accused of blasphemy, and condemned to death by Pontius Pilate, the Roman governor, who, though conscious of his innocence, yielded to the solicitations of the Jews, and condemned him to be crucified.

The Jews previous to the crucifixion, by way of derision, clothed Christ in a regal robe, put a crown of thorns upon his head, and a reed for a sceptre, in his hand: they then mocked him with ironical compliments, spit in his face, slapped his cheeks, and taking the reed out of his hand, they struck him with it upon the head. Pilate would fain have released him, but the general cry was, Crucify him, Crucify him; which occasioned the governor to call for a basin of water, and having washed his hands, he declared himself innocent of the blood of Christ, whom he justly termed a just person. The Jews, however, said, let his blood be upon us, and our children; which wish has manifestly taken place, as they have never since been a collected people.

While leading Christ to the place of crucifixion, they obliged him to bear the cross, which he being afterwards unable to sustain, they compelled one Simon, a native of Cyrenia, to carry the cross the rest of the way. Mount Calvary was the place of execution, where being arrived, the soldiers offered him a mixture of gall and vinegar to drink, which he refused. Having stripped him, they nailed him to the cross, and crucified him between two malefactors. After being fastened to the cross, he uttered this benevolent prayer for his enemies: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." The soldiers who crucified him being four in number, now cut his mantle to pieces, and divided it between them; but his coat being without seam, they cast lots for it. Whilst Christ remained in the agonies of death, the Jews mocked him, and said, "If thou art the Son of God, come down from the cross." The chief priests and scribes also reviled him, and said, "He saved others, but cannot save himself." Indeed, one of the malefactors who was crucified with him, cried out, and said, "If you are the Messiah, save yourself and us;" but the other malefactor, having the greatest reliance upon Jesus, exclaimed, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." To which Christ replied, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

When Christ was upon the cross, the earth was covered with darkness, and the stars appeared at noon-day; which struck even the Jews with terror. In the midst of his tortures Christ cried out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me;" and then expressed a desire to drink, when one of the soldiers gave him, upon the point of a reed, a sponge dipped in vinegar, which, however, Jesus refused. About three o'clock in the afternoon he gave up the ghost, and at the same time a violent earthquake happened, when the rocks were rent, the mountains trembled, and the graves gave up their dead. These were the signal prodigies that attended the death of Christ, and such was the mortal end of the Redeemer of mankind—Hominum Salvator!!!

I. ST. STEPHEN,

THE Proto, or first martyr, was elected, with six others, as a deacon, out of the Lord's seventy disciples. Stephen was an able and successful preacher. The principal persons belonging to five Jewish synagogues entered into many altercations with him; but he, by the soundness of his doctrine, and the strength of his arguments, overcame them all, which so much irritated them, that they suborned false witnesses to accuse him of blaspheming God and Moses. Being carried before the council, he made a noble defence, but that so much exasperated his judges, that they resolved to condemn him. At this instant Stephen saw a vision from heaven of Jesus, in his glorified state, sitting at the right hand of God. This vision so greatly rejoiced him, that he exclaimed in raptures, "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God." They then condemned him, and having dragged him out of the city, stoned him to death. On the spot where he was martyred, Eudocia, the empress of the emperor Theodosius, erected a superb church, and the memory of him is annually celebrated on the 26th day of December.

The death of Stephen was succeeded by a severe persecution in Jerusalem, in which 2000 Christians, with Nicarchus the deacon, were martyred; and many others obliged to leave that country.

II. ST. JAMES the GREAT, a Galilean, was the son of Zebedee, a fisherman, the elder brother of St. John, and a relation to Christ himself; for his mother Salome was cousin-german to the Virgin Mary. Being one day with his father fishing in the sea of Galilee, he and his brother John, were called by our Saviour to become his disciples. They cheerfully obeyed the mandate, and leaving their father, followed Jesus. It is to be observed, that Christ placed a greater confidence in them, than in any other of the apostles, Peter excepted.

Christ called these brothers Boanerges, or the sons of thunder, on account of their fiery spirits, and impetuous tempers.

When Herod Agrippa, was made governor of Judea by the emperor Caligula, he raised a persecution against the Christians, and particularly singled out James as an object of his vengeance.

When James was condemned to death, he shewed such an intrepidity of spirit, and constancy of mind, that his very accuser was struck with admiration, and became a convert to Christianity. This transition so enraged the the people in power, that they likewise condemned him to death; when James the apostle, and his penitent accuser, were both beheaded on the same day, and with the same sword. These events took place in the year of Christ 44; and the 25th of July was fixed by the church for the commemoration of this saint's martyrdom.

About the same period, Timon and Parmenas, two of the seven deacons, suffered martyrdom; the former at Corinth, and the latter at Philippi, in Macedonia.

III. ST. PHILIP. This apostle and martyr was born at Bethsaida, in Galilee, and was the first called by the name of Disciple. He was honoured with several important commissions by Christ, and being deputed to preach in Upper Asia, laboured very diligently in his apostleship. He then travelled into Phrygia, and arriving at Heliopolis, was greatly grieved to find the inhabitants so sunk in idolatry, as to worship a large serpent. St. Philip, however, converted many of them to Christianity, and even procured the death of the serpent. This so enraged the magistrates, that they committed him to prison, had him severely scourged, and afterwards crucified. His friend, St. Bartholomew, found an opportunity of taking down the body, and burying it; for which however, he was very near suffering the same fate. His martyrdom happened eight years after that of St. James the Great, A. D. 52; and his name, together with that of St. James the Less, is commemorated on the 1st of May.

IV. ST. MATTHEW. This evangelist, apostle, and martyr, was born at Nazareth in Galilee, but resided chiefly at Capernaum; on account of his business, which was that of a toll-gatherer, to collect tribute of such as had occasion to pass the sea of Galilee. On being called as a disciple, he immediately complied, and left every thing to follow Christ. After the ascension of his master, he continued preaching the gospel in Judea about nine years. Designing to leave Judea, in order to go and preach among the Gentiles, he wrote his gospel in Hebrew, for the use of the Jewish converts; but it was afterwards translated into Greek by St. James the Less. Going to Ethiopia he ordained preachers, settled churches, and made many converts. He then proceeded to Parthia, where he had the same success; but returning to Ethiopia, he was slain by a halbert in the city of Nadabar, about the year of Christ 60; and his festival is kept by the church on the 21st day of September. He was inoffensive in his conduct, and in his mode of living remarkably temperate.

V. ST. MARK. This evangelist and martyr was born of Jewish parents, of the tribe of Levi. It is imagined, that he was converted to Christianity by St. Peter, whom he served as an amanuensis, and whom he attended in all his travels. Being entreated by the converts at Rome to commit to writing the admirable discourses they had heard from St. Peter and himself: this request he complied with, and composed his gospel accordingly, in the Greek language. He then went to Egypt, and constituted a bishopric at Alexandria: afterwards he proceeded to Lybia, where he made many converts. Returning to Alexandria, some of the Egyptians, exasperated at his success, determined on his death. To accomplish this they tied his feet, dragged him through the streets, left him to remain bruised as he was, in a dungeon all night, and the next day burned his body. This happened on the 25th of April, on which day the church commemorates his martyrdom. His bones were carefully gathered up by the Christians, decently interred, and afterwards removed to Venice, where he is considered as the tutelar saint, and patron of the state.

VI. ST. JAMES the Less. This apostle and martyr was called so, to distinguish him from St. James the Great. He was the son, by a first wife, of Joseph, the reputed father of Christ: he was, after the Lord's ascension, elected bishop of Jerusalem: he wrote his general epistle to all Christians, and converts whatever, to suppress a dangerous error then propagating, viz. "That a faith in Christ was alone sufficient for salvation, without good works." The Jews, being at this time, greatly enraged that St. Paul had escaped their fury, by appealing to Rome, determined to wreak their vengeance on James, who was now ninety-four years of age: they accordingly threw him down, beat, bruised, and stoned him; and then dashed out his brains with a club, such as was used by fullers in dressing cloths. His festival, together with that of St. Philip, is kept on the first of May.

VII. ST. MATTHIAS. This apostle and martyr was called to the apostleship after the death of Christ, to supply the vacant place of Judas, who had betrayed his master, and was likewise one of the seventy disciples. He was martyred at Jerusalem, being first stoned, and then beheaded; and the 24th of February is observed for the celebration of his festival.

VIII. ST. ANDREW. This apostle and martyr was the brother of St. Peter, and preached the gospel to many Asiatic nations. Arriving at Edeffa, the governor of the country, named Egeas, threatened him very hard for preaching against the idols there worshipped. St. Andrew persisting in the propagation of his doctrines, he was ordered to be crucified on a cross, two ends of which were transversely fixed in the ground. He boldly told his accusers, that he would not have preached the glory of the cross, had he feared to die on it. And again, when they came to crucify him, he said, that he coveted the cross, and longed to embrace it. He was fastened to the cross, not with nails but cords, that his death might be more lingering. In this situation he continued two days, preaching the greatest part of the time to the people; and expired on the 30th of November, which is commemorated as his festival.

IX. ST. PETER. This great apostle and martyr was born at Bethsaida in Galilee, being the son of Jonah, a fisherman, which employment St. Peter himself followed. He was persuaded by his brother to turn Christian; when Christ gave him the name of Cephas, implying in the Syriac language, a rock. He was called, at the same time as his brother, to be an apostle; gave uncommon proofs of his zeal for the service of Christ, and always appeared as the principal speaker among the apostles. He had, however the weakness to deny his master, after his apprehension, though he defended him at the time; but the sincerity of his repentance made an atonement for the atrociousness of his crime.

After the death of Christ, the Jews still continued to persecute the Christians, and even went so far as to order several of the apostles, among whom was Peter, to be scourged. This punishment they bore with the greatest fortitude, and rejoiced that they were thought worthy to suffer for the sake of their Redeemer.

When Herod Agrippa caused St. James the Great to be put to death, and found that it pleased the Jews, he resolved in order to ingratiate himself further with the people, that Peter should fall the next sacrifice to his malice. He was accordingly apprehended, and thrown into prison; but an angel of the Lord released him, which so enraged Herod, that he ordered the centinels, who guarded the dungeon in which he had been confined, to be put to death. St. Peter after various other miracles, retired to Rome, where he defeated all the artifices, and confounded the magic of Simon, the magician, a great favourite of the emperor Nero: he likewise converted to Christianity one of the concubines of that monarch, which so exasperated the tyrant, that he ordered both St. Peter and St. Paul to be apprehended. During the time of their confinement, they converted two of the captains of the guard, and forty-seven other persons to Christianity. Having been nine months in prison, Peter was brought out from thence for execution, when after being severely scourged, he was crucified with his head downwards; which position, however, was at his own request. His festival is observed on the 29th of June, on which day he, as well as Paul, suffered. His body being taken down, embalmed, and buried in the vatican, a church was afterwards erected on the spot; but this being destroyed by the emperor Heliogabalus, the body was removed, till the 20th bishop of Rome, called Cornelius, conveyed it again to the vatican: afterwards Constantine the great erected one of the most stately churches in the universe over the place. Before we quit this article, it is requisite to observe, that previous to the death of St. Peter, his wife suffered martyrdom for the faith of Christ, and was exhorted, when going to be put to death, to remember her Saviour.

X. ST. PAUL, the apostle and martyr, was a Jew of the tribe of Benjamin, born at Tarsus, in Cilicia. He was at first a great enemy to, and persecutor of the Christians; but after his miraculous conversion, he became a strenuous preacher of Christ's gospel. At Iconium, St. Paul and St. Barnabas were near being stoned to death by the enraged Jews; wherefore they fled to Lycaonia. At Lystra, St. Paul was stoned, dragged out of the city, and left for dead. He, however, happily revived, and escaped to Derbe. At Philippi, Paul and Silas were imprisoned and whipped; and both were again persecuted at Thessalonica. Being afterwards taken at Jerusalem, he was sent to Cæsarea, but appealed to Cæsar at Rome. Here he continued prisoner at large for two years. Being released, he visited the churches of Greece and Rome, and preached in France and Spain. Returning to Rome, he was again apprehended, and, by the order of Nero, martyred, by being beheaded. Two days are dedicated to the commemoration of this apostle; the one for his conversion, which is on the 25th of January, and the other for his martyrdom, which is on the 29th of June.

XI. ST. JUDE, the apostle and martyr, the brother of James, was commonly called Thaddæus. Being sent to Edeſa, he wrought many miracles, and made many converts, which stirring up the resentment of people in power, he was crucified, A. D. 72; and the 28th of October is, by the church, dedicated to his memory.

XII. ST. BARTHOLOMEW the apostle and martyr, preached in several countries, performed many miracles, and healed various diseases. He translated St. Matthew's gospel into the Indian language, and propagated it in that country: but at length, the idolators growing impatient with his doctrines, severely beat, crucified, and flayed him, and then cut off his head. The anniversary of his martyrdom is on the 24th of August.

XIII. ST. THOMAS, as he was called in Syriac, but Didymus in Greek, was an apostle and martyr. He preached in Parthia and India, where displeasing the Pagan priests, he was martyred by being thrust through with a spear. His death is commemorated on the 21st of December.

XIV. ST. LUKE, the evangelist and martyr, was the author of a most excellent gospel. He travelled with St. Paul to Rome, and preached to divers barbarous nations, till the priests in Greece hanged him on an olive-tree. The anniversary of his martyrdom is on the 18th of October.

XV. ST. SIMON, the apostle and martyr, was distinguished by the name of Zelotes, from his zeal. He preached with great success in Mauritania, and other parts of Africa, and even in Britain, where, though he made many converts, he was crucified by the then barbarous inhabitants of this island, A. D. 74; and the church joining him with St. Jude, commemorates his festival on the 28th of October.

XVI. ST. JOHN was distinguished for being at once, a prophet, apostle, divine, evangelist, and martyr. He is called the beloved disciple, and was brother to James the great. He was previously a disciple of John the Baptist, and afterwards not only one of the twelve aposles, but one of the three to whom Christ communicated the most secret passages of his life. The churches in Asia founded by St. John were, Smyrna, Pergamus, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea, and Thyatira, to whom he directs his book of Revelations. Being at Ephesus, he was ordered by the emperor Domitian to be sent bound to Rome, where he was condemned to be cast into a cauldron of boiling oil. But here a miracle appeared in his favour; the oil did him no injury, and Domitian therefore not being able to put him to death, banished him to Patmos to work at the mines. He was however, recalled by Nerva, who succeeded Domitian after his decease, but was deemed a martyr on account of his having undergone the mode of an execution, though it did not take effect. He wrote his epistles, gospel, and revelations, all in a different style; but they are all equally admired. He was the only apostle who escaped a violent death: lived the longest of any of them, being near 100 years of age at the time of his death; and the church commemorates the 27th day of December to his memory.

XVII. ST. BARNABAS was a native of Cyprus, but of Jewish parents: the time of his death is uncertain, but supposed to be about the year of Christ 73; and his festival is kept on the 11th of June.

Particular Account of the FIRST PRIMITIVE PERSECUTION, which began in the Year 67, under the Reign of NERO, Emperor of Rome.

THE first persecution in the primitive ages of the church, was begun by that cruel tyrant Nero, the sixth emperor of Rome. This monarch reigned, for the space of five years, with tolerable credit to himself, but then gave way to the greatest extravagancy of temper, and to the most atrocious barbarities. Among other diabolical whims, he took it into his head to order, that the city of Rome should be set on fire, which was done by his officers, guards, and servants, accordingly. While the imperial city was in flames, he went up to the tower of Mæcenæ, played upon his harp, sung the song of the burning of Troy, and openly declared, "That he wished the ruin of all things before his death." Among the noble buildings burnt was the Circus, or place appropriated to horse-races: it was half a mile in length, of an oval form, with rows of seats rising above each other, and capable of receiving, with ease, upwards of 100,000 spectators. Besides this noble pile, many other palaces and houses were consumed; several thousands perished in the flames, were smothered in the smoke, or buried beneath the ruins.

Nine days this dreadful conflagration continued; when Nero, finding that his conduct was greatly blamed, and a severe odium cast upon him, determined to lay the whole upon the Christians, at once to excuse himself, and have an opportunity of glutting his sight with new cruelties. This was the occasion of the first persecution; and the barbarities exercised upon the Christians were such as even excited the commiseration of the Romans themselves. Nero even refined upon cruelty, and contrived all manner of punishments for the Christians that the most infernal imagination could design. In particular, he had some sewed up in the skins of wild beasts, and then worried by dogs till they expired; and others dressed in shirts made stiff with wax, fixed to axle-trees, and set on fire in his gardens in order to illuminate them. This persecution was general throughout the whole Roman empire; but it rather increased than diminished the spirit of Christianity. In the course of it, St. Paul and St. Peter were martyred (as we have already mentioned in our account of the lives, sufferings, and martyrdom of the apostles, evangelists, &c. in the foregoing order) and beside many others whose names have not been transmitted to posterity, were some of their converts and followers, the circumstances concerning the principal of whom shall be our present subject.

ERASTUS, the chamberlain of Corinth, was converted by St. Paul, and determined to follow the fortune of that apostle. For this reason he resigned his office, and accompanied St. Paul in his voyages and travels, till the latter left him in Macedonia, where he was first made bishop of that province by the Christians; and afterwards suffered martyrdom, being tortured to death by the Pagans at Philippi.

ARISTARCHUS, the Macedonian, was born in Thessalonica, and being converted by St. Paul became his constant companion.

He was with that apostle at Ephesus, during a commotion raised in that city by Demetrius the silversmith. They both received several insults upon the occasion from the populace, which they bore with a true Christian patience, giving good advice in return for ill usage, and not in the least resenting any indignity put upon them.

Aristarchus accompanied St. Paul from Ephesus into Greece, where they were very successful in propagating the gospel, and bringing over many from ignorance to a saving knowledge, and from Pagan darkness to the glorious light of Christianity.

Having left Greece they traversed a great part of Asia, and made a considerable stay in Judea, where they were so successful in making converts in those parts, that idolatry seemed to fly before them, and truth to diffuse its rays wherever they came.

After this Aristarchus went with St. Paul to Rome, where he suffered the same fate as the apostle; for being seized as a Christian, he was beheaded by the command of Nero.

TROPHIMUS, an Ephesian by birth, and a Gentile by religion, was converted by St. Paul to the Christian faith.

When converted he accompanied his master in his voyages and travels; and upon his account the Jews raised a great disturbance in the temple at Jerusalem, the last time St. Paul was in that city. They proceeded so far in their malice against the apostle, that they attempted to murder him, for having introduced a Greek into the temple; for Trophimus being a Greek, was looked upon by the Jews with detestation. Lyfias, the captain of the guard, however, interposed his authority, and by force rescued St. Paul from the hands of the Jews.

Upon quitting Jerusalem, Trophimus followed his master to Rome, and did him every essential service in his power. He then attended him to Spain, and passing through Gaul, the apostle made him bishop of that province, and left him behind in the city of Arles.

He paid a visit to St. Paul in Asia about a twelvemonth after, and went with him, for the last time, to Rome, where he was witness to the martyrdom of his master; which was but the fore-runner of his own; for being soon after seized on account of his faith, he was beheaded by the emperor Nero's express orders.

JOSEPH, commonly called BARSABAS, was a primitive disciple, and is usually deemed one of the Seventy. He was, in some degree, related to our blessed Redeemer, and became a candidate, together with Matthias, to fill the vacant place of Judas Iscariot, the traitor.

The gospel and ecclesiastical writers make very little other mention of him; but Papias informs us, that he was once compelled to drink poison, which did not do him the least injury, agreeable to the promise of the Lord to those who believe in him.

He was during his life a zealous preacher of the gospel; and having received many insults from the Jews, at length received the crown of martyrdom, being murdered by the Pagans in Judea.

ANANIAS, bishop of Damascus, is celebrated in the sacred writings for being the person who cured St. Paul of the blindness with which he was struck by the amazing brightness which happened at his conversion.

He was one of the Seventy, and martyred in the city of Damascus. After his death a Christian church was built over the place of his burial, which is now converted into a Turkish mosque.

Particular Account of the SECOND PRIMITIVE PERSECUTION, under the Emperor DOMITIAN.

THE emperor Domitian, being naturally inclined to cruelty, first slew his brother, and then raised the second persecution against the Christians. His rage was such, that he even put to death some of the Roman senators; some through malice, and others to confiscate their estates. He then commanded all the lineage of David to be put to death. Two Christians were brought before the emperor, and accused of being of the tribe of Judah, and line of David; but from their answers, he despised them as ideots and dismissed them accordingly. He, however, for his lenity here, was determined to be more secure upon other occasions: for he took away the substance of many Christians, put several to death and banished others.

In all which the numerous martyrs that suffered during this persecution was Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, who was crucified; and St. John, who was boiled in oil, and afterwards banished to Patmos. Flavia, the daughter of a Roman senator, was likewise banished to Pontus; and a law was made, "That no Christian, once brought before the tribunal, should be exempted from punishment without renouncing his religion."

There were a variety of fabricated tales during this reign, composed in order to injure the Christians. Among other falsehoods, they were accused of indecent nightly meetings, of a rebellious turbulent spirit, of being pernicious to the Roman empire, of murdering their children, and even of being cannibals. Such was the infatuation of the Pagans, that if famine, pestilence, or earthquakes, afflicted any of the Roman provinces, it was laid upon the Christians. These persecutions among the Christians increased the number of informers; and many, for the sake of gain, swore away the lives of the innocent.

Another hardship was, that when any Christians were brought before the magistrates, a test oath was proposed, when, if they refused to take it, death was pronounced against them; and if they confessed themselves Christians, the sentence was the same. The various kinds of punishments and inflicted cruelties were, during this persecution, imprisonment, racking, searing, broiling, burning, scourging, stoning, strangling, hanging, worrying.

Many indeed were torn piecemeal, with red hot pincers, and others were thrown upon the horns of wild bulls. After having suffered these cruelties, the friends of the deceased Christians were refused the privilege of burying their poor remains.

The following were the most remarkable among the numerous martyrs who suffered during this persecution.

DIONYSIUS, the Areopagite, was an Athenian by birth, and educated in all the useful and ornamental literature of Greece. He then travelled to Egypt to study astronomy, and made very particular observations on the great and supernatural eclipse, which happened at the time of our Saviour's crucifixion.

Upon his return to Athens, he was highly honoured by the people, and at length promoted to the dignity of senator of that celebrated city. Becoming a convert to the gospel, he changed from the worthy Pagan magistrate to the pious Christian pastor; for even while involved in the darkness of idolatry, he was as just as he possibly could be in the gross errors of Paganism.

It is easy to be imagined, that a soul which could appear with some lustre while loaded with original sin, and tainted with superstition, must, when illuminated with the light of the gospel, shine with the most splendid brilliancy.

The sanctity of his conversation, and purity of his manners, recommended him so strongly to the Christians in general, that he was appointed bishop of Athens. He discharged his duty with the utmost diligence till the second year of this persecution, viz. A. D. 69, when he was apprehended, and received the crown of martyrdom, by being beheaded.

NICOMEDES, a Christian of some distinction at Rome, during the rage of Domitian's persecution, did all he could to serve the afflicted; comforting the poor, visiting those confined, exhorting the wavering, and confirming the faithful. For those and other pious actions he was seized as a Christian, and being sentenced, was scourged to death.

PROTASIUS and GERVASIUS were martyred at Milan; but the particular circumstances of their deaths are not recorded.

TIMOTHY, the celebrated disciple of St. Paul, and bishop of Ephesus, was born at Lystra, in the province of Lycaonia, his father being a Gentile, and his mother a Jewess. But both his parents and his grandmother embraced Christianity, by which means young Timothy was taught the precepts of the gospel from his infancy.

Upon St. Paul's arrival at Lycaonia, he ordained Timothy, and then made him the companion of his pious labours. It appears, that while he attended the apostle, his zeal could be only equalled by his fidelity; for St. Paul mentions him with peculiar respect, and declares, that he could find none so truly united to him, both in heart and mind, as Timothy. Indeed, the apostle, upon various occasions, speaks of him in the most affectionate terms, which is a sufficient proof of his great merit, and evinces, that he was a disinterested and diligent servant of Christ.

Timothy attended St. Paul to Macedonia, and there with the apostle and Silas, he laboured with assiduity in the propagation of the gospel. When St. Paul went to Achaia, Timothy was left behind to strengthen the faith of those already converted, or to induce others to quit the darkness of ignorance for the light of gospel-knowledge.

St. Paul at length sent for Timothy to Athens, and then dispatched him to Thessalonica, to strengthen the suffering Christians there against the terrors of the persecution which then raged.

As soon as Timothy arrived at the place of his destination, he did all that a zealous Christian could for the service of his Redeemer. Having performed his mission, he returned to Athens, and there assisted St. Paul and Silas, in composing the two epistles to the Thessalonians. He then accompanied St. Paul to Corinth, Jerusalem, and Ephesus.

After performing several other commissions for St. Paul, and attending him upon various other journeys, the apostle constituted him bishop of Ephesus, though he was only thirty years of age; and in two admirable epistles gave him proper instructions for his conduct in so important a charge.

Timothy was so very temperate in his living, that St. Paul blames him for being too abstemious, and recommends to him the moderate use of wine to recruit his strength and spirits.

St. Paul sent to Timothy while he was in his last confinement at Rome to come to him; and, after that great apostle's martyrdom, he returned to Ephesus, where he zealously governed the church till A. D. 97. At this period the Pagans were about to celebrate a feast called Catagogion, the principal ceremonies of which were, that the people should carry battons in their hands, go masked, and bear about the streets the images of their gods.

When Timothy met the procession, he severely reprov'd them for their ridiculous idolatry, which so exasperated the people, that they fell upon him with their clubs, and beat him in so dreadful a manner, that he expired of the bruises two days after.

Particular Account of the THIRD PRIMITIVE PERSECUTION under the Roman Emperors.

UPON Nerva's succeeding Domitian, he gave a respite to the Christians; but reigning only thirteen months, his successor Trajan, in the tenth year of his reign, and in A. D. 108, began the third persecution against the Christians. While the persecution raged, Plinius Secundus, a heathen philosopher, wrote to the emperor in favour of the Christians; to whose epistle Trajan returned this indecisive answer, "The Christians ought not to be sought after, but when brought before the magistracy, they should be punished."

Provoked by this absurd reply, Tertullian exclaimed in the following words: "O confused sentence! he would not have them sought for as innocent, and yet would have them punished as guilty." The emperor's incoherent answer, however, occasioned the persecution in some measure to abate, as his officers were uncertain if they carried it on with severity, how he might chuse to wrest his own meaning. Trajan, however, soon after wrote to Jerusalem, and gave orders to his officers to exterminate the stock of David; in consequence of which, all that could be found of that race were put to death.

SYMPHOROSA, a widow, and her seven sons were commanded by the emperor to sacrifice to the heathen deities. Unanimously refusing to comply with such an impious request, the emperor, in a rage, told her, that for her obstinacy, herself and her sons should be slain, to appease the wrath of his offended deities: to which she answered, that if he murdered her and her children, the idols he adored would only be held in the greatest detestation and contempt.

Now the emperor, being greatly exasperated at this, ordered her to be carried to the Temple of Hercules, where she was scourged, and hung up, for some time, by the hair of her head; then being taken down, a large stone was fastened to her neck, and she was thrown into the river, where she expired. With respect to the sons, they were fastened to seven posts, and being drawn up by pulleys, their limbs were dislocated; these tortures, not affecting their resolution, they were thus martyred; Crescentius, the eldest, was stabbed in the throat; Julian, the second, in the breast; Nemefius, the third, in the heart; Primitius, the fourth, in the navel; Justice, the fifth, in the back; Staclus, the sixth, in the side; and Eugenius, the youngest, was sawed asunder.

PHOCAS, bishop of Pontus, refusing to sacrifice to Neptune, was, by the immediate order of Trajan, cast first into a hot lime-kiln, and being drawn from thence, was thrown into a scalding bath till he expired.

Trajan likewise commanded the martyrdom of Ignatius, bishop of Antioch. This holy man was the person whom, when an infant, Christ took into his arms, and shewed to his disciples, as one that would be a pattern of humility and innocence. He received the gospel afterwards from St. John the Evangelist, and was exceedingly zealous in his mission. He boldly vindicated the faith of Christ before the emperor, for which being cast into prison, he was tormented in a most cruel manner; for after being dreadfully scourged, he was compelled to hold fire in his hands, and at the same time, papers dipped in oil were put to his sides, and set on light. His flesh was then torn with red hot pincers, and at last he was dispatched by being torn to pieces by wild beasts.

Adrian having succeeded Trajan, he continued this third persecution with as much severity as his predecessor. About this time Alexander, bishop of Rome, with his two deacons, were martyred; as were Quirinus and Hermes, with their families; Zenon, a Roman nobleman, and about ten thousand other Christians.

Many were crucified in Mount Ararat, crowned with thorns, and spears run into their sides, in imitation of Christ's passion. Eustachius, a brave and successful Roman commander, was by the emperor ordered to join in an idolatrous sacrifice, to celebrate some of his own victories; but his faith (being a Christian in his heart) was so much greater than his vanity, that he nobly refused it. Enraged at the denial, the ungrateful emperor forgot the services of this skilful commander, and ordered him and his whole family to be martyred.

During the martyrdom of Faustines and Jovita, brothers and citizens of Bressia, their torments were so many, and their patience so great, that Calocerius, a Pagan, beholding them, was struck with admiration, and exclaimed in a kind of ecstasy, "Great is the God of the Christians!" for which he was apprehended, and suffered a fate similar to others.

Several other cruelties and rigours were exercised against the Christians, till Quadratus, bishop of Athens, made a learned apology in their favour before the emperor, who happened to be there; and Aristides, a philosopher of the same city, wrote an elegant epistle, which caused Adrian to relax in his severities, and relent in their favour. He indeed went so far as to command, that no Christian should be punished on the score of religion or opinion only; but this gave other handles against them to the Jews and Pagans, for then they began to employ and seditious false witnesses, to accuse them of crimes against the state, or civil authority.

Adrian dying in the year 138, was succeeded by Antoninus Pius, one of the most amiable monarchs that ever reigned; for his people gave him a title which he justly deserved, viz. The Father of Virtues. Immediately upon his accession to the imperial throne he published an edict, forbidding any further persecutions against the Christians, and concluded it in these words: "If any hereafter shall vex or trouble the Christians, having no other cause but that they are such, let the accused be released, and the accusers be punished." This stopped the persecution, and the Christians enjoyed a respite from their sufferings during this emperor's reign, though their enemies took every occasion to do them what injuries they could in an underhand manner.

Particular Account of the FOURTH PRIMITIVE PERSECUTION under the Roman Emperors, which commenced A. D. 162.

ANTONINUS PIUS was succeeded by Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Philosophus, who, being a strong Pagan, began the fourth persecution, in which many Christians were martyred, particularly in several parts of Asia, and in France.

Such were the cruelties used in this persecution, that many of the spectators shuddered with horror at the sight, and were astonished at the intrepidity of the sufferers. Some of the martyrs were obliged to pass with their already wounded feet, over thorns, nails, sharp shells, &c. with their points; others were scourged till their sinews and veins lay bare; and after suffering the most excruciating tortures that could be devised, they were destroyed by the most terrible deaths.

GERMANICUS, a young man, but true Christian, being delivered to the wild beasts on account of his faith, behaved with such astonishing courage, that several Pagans became converts to a faith which inspired such fortitude. This enraged others so much, that they cried he merited death, as they did also of Polycarp, the pious and venerable bishop of Smyrna.

POLYCARP, hearing that persons were after him to apprehend him, escaped, but was discovered by a child. From this circumstance, and having dreamed that his bed suddenly became on fire, and was consumed in a moment, he concluded that it was God's will that he should seal his faith with martyrdom. He therefore would not attempt to make a second escape when he had an opportunity of so doing. Those who apprehended him were amazed at his serene countenance, and comely gravity. After feasting them, he desired an hour in prayer, which being allowed, he prayed with such fervency, that his guards repented they had been instrumental in taking him. He was, however, carried before the proconsul, condemned, and conducted to the market-place. Wood being provided, the holy man earnestly prayed to heaven, after being bound to the stake; and as the flames grew vehement, the tormentors gave way on each side, the heat now becoming intolerable. In the mean time the bishop sung praises to God in the midst of the flames, but remained unconsumed therein, and the burning of the wood spreading a fragrance around, the guards were much surprised. Determined, however, to put an end to his life, they struck spears into his body, when the quantity of blood that issued from the wounds extinguished the flames. After considerable attempts, however, they put him to death, and burnt his body when dead, not being able to consume it while living. Twelve other Christians, who had been intimate with Polycarp, were soon after martyred.

METRODORUS, a minister, who preached boldly, and Pionius, who made some excellent apologies for the Christian faith, were likewise burnt. Carpus and Papilus, two worthy Christians, and Agathonica, a pious woman, suffered martyrdom at Pergamopolis, in Asia.

FELICITATIS, an illustrious Roman lady of a considerable family, and the most shining virtues, was a devout Christian. She had seven sons, whom she had educated with the most exemplary piety. The empire having been, about this time, grievously troubled with earthquakes, famine, inundations, &c. the Christians were accused as the cause, and Felicitatis was included in the accusation. The lady and her family being seized, the emperor gave orders to Publius, the Roman governor, to proceed against her.

Upon this Publius began with the mother, thinking that if he could prevail with her to change her religion, the example would have great influence with her sons. Finding her inflexible, he turned his entreaties to menaces, and threatened her with destruction to herself and family. She despised his threats as she had done his promises; on which he changed his battery, and began with the sons, whom he examined separately. They all, however, remained steadfast in their faith, and unanimous in their opinions, on which the whole family were ordered for execution.

Januarius, the eldest, was scourged, and pressed to death with weights; Felix and Philip, the two next, had their brains dashed out with clubs; Silvanus, the fourth, was murdered by being thrown from a precipice; and the three younger sons, viz. Alexander, Vitalis, and Martial, were all beheaded. With respect to the mother, she suffered the same fate, and was beheaded with the same sword as the three latter.

JUSTIN, the celebrated philosopher, fell a martyr in this persecution. He was a native of Neapolis, in Samaria, and was born A. D. 103. He had the best education those times could afford, and travelled into Egypt, the country where the polite tour of that age was made for improvement. At Alexandria he was informed of every thing relative to the seventy interpreters of the sacred writings, and shewn the rooms, or rather cells, in which their work was performed. Justin was a great lover of truth, and an universal scholar; he investigated the Stoic and Peripatetic philosophy, and attempted the Pythagorean; but the behaviour of one of its professors disgusting him, he applied himself to the Platonic, in which he took great delight. About the year 133, when he was thirty years of age, he became a convert to Christianity, and then, for the first time, perceived the real nature of truth.

Justin wrote an elegant epistle to the Gentiles, to convert them to the faith he had newly acquired, and lived in so pure and innocent a manner, that it was evident he merited the title of a Christian philosopher.

This man likewise employed his talents in convincing the Jews of the truth of the Christian rites, and spent a great deal of time in travelling, till he took up his abode in Rome, and fixed his habitation on the Viminal mount.

He kept a public school, taught many who afterwards became great men, and wrote a treatise to confute heresies of all kinds. As the Pagans began to treat the Christians with great severity, Justin wrote his first apology in their favour, and addressed it to the emperor, to two princes whom he had adopted as his sons, and to the senate and people of Rome in general. This piece, which occasioned the emperor to publish an edict in favour of the Christians, displays great learning and genius, and is written with manly elegance.

A short time after, he entered into frequent contests with Crescens, a person of a vitious life and conversation, but a celebrated cynic philosopher; and his arguments appeared so powerful, yet disgusting to the cynic, that he resolved on his destruction, which in the sequel he accomplished.

The second apology of Justin's was occasioned by the following circumstances: a man and his wife, who were both had lived, resided at Rome. The woman, however, becoming a convert to Christianity, attempted to reclaim her husband: but not succeeding, she sued for a divorce, which so exasperated him, that he accused her of being a Christian. Upon her petition, however, he dropped the prosecution, and levelled his malice at Ptolemeus, who had converted her. Ptolemeus was condemned to die; and one Lucius, with another person, for expressing themselves too freely upon the occasion, met with the same fate.

Justin's apology upon these severities, gave Crescens the cynic an opportunity of prejudicing the emperor against the writer of it: upon which Justin, and six of his companions, were apprehended. Being commanded as usual to deny their faith, and sacrifice to the Pagan idols, they absolutely refused to do either; on their refusal, they were condemned to be first scourged, and then beheaded; which sentence was with all imaginable severity executed.

Only seven pieces of the writings of this celebrated martyr, and great philosopher, are now extant, viz. The two Apologies; an Exhortation to the Gentiles; an Oration to the Greeks; a Treatise on Divine Monarchy; a Dialogue with Trypho the Jew; and an Epistle to Diognetus.

A great many were beheaded for refusing to sacrifice to the image of Jupiter; in particular Concordus, a deacon of the city of Spoleto, being carried before the image, and ordered to worship it, not only refused, but spit in it's face; for which he was severely tormented, and afterwards had his head cut off with a sword.

At this time, some of the northern nations being in arms against Rome, the emperor marched to encounter them. He was, however, drawn into an ambuscade, and dreaded the loss of his whole army. Enveloped with mountains, surrounded by enemies, and perishing with thirst, the troops were driven to the last extremities. All the Pagan deities were invoked in vain; when the men belonging to the militia, or thundering legion, who were all Christians, were commanded to call upon their God for succour: they immediately withdrew from the rest, prostrated themselves upon the earth, and prayed fervently. A miraculous deliverance immediately ensued; a prodigious quantity of rain fell, which being caught by the men, and filling the dykes, afforded a sudden and astonishing relief. The emperor, in his epistle to the Roman senate, wherein the expedition is described, after mentioning the difficulties to which he had been driven, speaks of the Christians in the following manner.

"When I saw myself not able to encounter with the enemies, I craved aid of our country gods; but finding no relief at their hands, and being cooped up by the enemy, I caused those men, whom we call Christians, to be sent for; who being mustered, I found a considerable number of them, against whom I was more incensed than I had just cause, as I found afterwards: for, by a marvellous power, they forthwith used their endeavours, not with ammunition, drums, and trumpets, abhorring such preparations and furniture, but only praying unto, and trusting in their God, whom they carry about with them in their consciences. It is therefore to be believed, although we call them wicked men, that they worship God in their hearts; for they, falling prostrate on the ground, prayed, not only for me, but for the army also which was with me, beseeching God to help me in that our extreme want of victuals and fresh water (for we had been five days without water, and in our enemies land, even in the midst of Germany); I say, falling upon their faces, they prayed to a God unknown to me, and immediately thereupon fell from heaven a most pleasant and cool shower; but amongst our enemies great store of hail, mixed with thunder and lightning: so that we soon perceived the invincible aid of the most mighty God to be with us; therefore we give these men leave to profess Christianity, lest, by their prayers, we be punished by the like: and I thereby make myself the author of all the evil that shall accrue by the persecution of the Christian religion."

It appears, that the storm which so miraculously flashed in the faces of the enemy, so intimidated them, that part deserted to the Roman army, the rest were with ease defeated, and the revolted provinces were entirely recovered. This affair occasioned the persecution to subside for some time, at least in those parts immediately under the inspection of the emperor; for we find that it soon after raged in France, particularly at Lyons, where the tortures, to which many of the Christians were put, almost exceed the powers of description. The aspersions, false accusations, taunts, threats, revilings, menacings, which were but forerunners to all manner of punishments, torments, and painful deaths; such as being banished, plundered, hanged, burnt, &c. and even the servants and slaves of opulent Christians were racked and tortured, to make them accuse their masters and employers. The following were the principal of these martyrs:

Vetius Agathus, a young man, who having boldly pleaded the Christian cause, was asked if he was a Christian? To which answering in the affirmative, he was condemned to death, and received the crown of martyrdom accordingly. Many, animated by this young man's intrepidity, boldly owned their faith, and suffered in like manner.

Blandinia, a Christian, but of a weak constitution, being seized and tortured upon the account of her religion, received so much strength from heaven, that her torturers became tired frequently, and were surprised at her being able to bear her torments for so great a length of time, and with such resolution.

Sanctus, a deacon of Vienna, was put to the torture, which he bore with great fortitude, and only cried, "I am a Christian." Red hot plates of brass were placed upon those parts of the body that were tenderest, which contracted the sinews; but he remaining inflexible, was re-conducted to prison. Being brought out from his place of confinement a few days afterwards, his tormentors were astonished to find his wounds healed, and his person as perfect as before they tormented him: they, however, again proceeded to torture him; but not being able, at that time, to take away a life which was miraculously preserved, they only remanded him to prison, where he remained for some time after; and having had this respite, received, by being beheaded, the crown of martyrdom.

Biblias, a weak woman, had been an apostate, but having returned to the faith was martyred, and bore her sufferings with great patience. Attalus, of Pergamus, was another sufferer; and Pothinus, the venerable bishop of Lyons, who was ninety years of age, was so unmercifully treated by the enraged Pagan mob, that he expired two days after in the prison.

The Christians, upon these occasions, having received martyrdom, were ornamented, and crowned with garlands of flowers; for which they received eternal crowns of glory in heaven.

Various were the torments; and, exclusive of those already mentioned, the martyrs of Lyons were compelled pelled to sit in red hot iron chairs till their flesh broiled. This was inflicted with peculiar severity on Sanctus already mentioned, and some others. Some were sewed up in nets, and thrown on the horns of wild bulls; and the carcases of those who died in prison, previous to the appointed time of execution, were thrown to dogs. Indeed, so far did the malice of the Pagans proceed, that they set guards over the bodies while the beasts were devouring them, lest the friends of the deceased should get them away by stealth; and the offals left by the dogs were ordered to be burnt.

The martyrs of Lyons, according to the best accounts we could obtain, who suffered for the gospel, were forty-eight in number, and their executions happened in the year of Christ 177. They all died with great fortitude and serenity of mind, evidently evincing, that they preferred the everlasting pleasures of an immortal and happy life, to the transitory scenes of one that was precarious, dashed with afflictions, and at best but short and transitory.

Others, besides the above martyrs of Lyons, who are usually enumerated together, suffered in that city, and in the different parts of the empire, soon after. Of these, the principal were as follows:

Epipodius and Alexander, celebrated for their great friendship, and their Christian union with each other. The first was born at Lyons, the latter in Greece; they were of mutual assistance to each other, and prepared themselves for receiving a crown of martyrdom in this world, and a crown of glory in the next, by the continual practice of all manner of Christian virtues and godliness.

At the time the persecution began first to rage at Lyons, they were in the prime of life, and to avoid the effects of its severities, they thought proper to withdraw to a neighbouring village. Here they were, for some time, concealed by a Christian widow, whose piety protected, while her obscurity gave a sanction to their concealment.

Being eminent persons, the malice of their persecutors sought after them with indefatigable industry, and pursued them to their place of concealment with unremitting assiduity. Dragged from their retirement, they were committed to prison without examination; but their misfortunes did not oppress their spirits; for, shielded by the gospel, they were secure against the woes to which this life is exposed.

At the expiration of three days, being brought before the governor, they were examined in the presence of a crowd of Pagans. They confessed the divinity of Christ, when the governor being enraged at what he termed their insolence, absurdly said, "What signifies all the former executions, if some yet remain who dare acknowledge Christ."

Being separated, that they should not console with, or fortify each other, he began to tamper with Epipodius, the youngest of the two. With a dissembled kindness, he pretended to pity his condition, and entreated him not to ruin himself by obstinacy. "Our deities (continued he) are worshipped by the greater part of the people in the universe, and their rulers; we adore them with feasting and mirth, while you adore a crucified man; we, to honour them, launch into pleasures; you, by your faith, are debarred from all that indulges the senses. Our religion enjoins feasting, your's fasting; our's the joys of licentious blandishments, your's the barren virtue of chastity. Can you expect protection from one, who could not secure himself from the persecutions of a contemptible people? Then quit a profession of such austerity, and enjoy those gratifications which the world affords, and which your youthful years demand."

In reply to this illusive harangue, Epipodius contemned his compassion, as a heart full of faith could not want it. "Your pretended tenderness, said he, is actual cruelty; and the agreeable life you describe, is replete with everlasting death. Christ suffered for us, that our pleasures should be immortal, and hath prepared for his followers an eternity of bliss. The frame of man being composed of two parts, body and soul; the first, as mean and perishable, should be rendered subservient to the interests of the last. Your idolatrous feasts may gratify the mortal, but they injure the immortal part: that cannot therefore be enjoying life, which destroys the most valuable moiety of your frame. Your pleasures lead to eternal death, and our pains to perpetual happiness."

Epipodius, for this manly and rational speech, was severely beaten, and then put to the rack, upon which being stretched, his flesh was torn with iron hooks. Having borne his torments with incredible patience, and unshaken fortitude, he was taken from the rack, and beheaded.

Alexander, the companion of Epipodius, was brought before the judge, two days after the execution of that excellent young man. On his absolute refusal to renounce Christianity, he was placed upon the rack, and beat by three executioners, who relieved each other alternately. He bore his sufferings with as much fortitude as his friend had done, and at length received the conclusion of his glorious martyrdom, by being crucified. These martyrs suffered A. D. 179; the first on the 20th of April, and the other in two days after.

Valerian and Marcellus, who were nearly related to each other, were imprisoned at Lyons, in the year 177, for being Christians. By some means, however, of which we are not informed, they made their escape, and travelled different roads.

The latter made several converts in the territories of Befançon and Chalons, but being apprehended, was carried before Priscus, the governor of those parts.

Priscus, the magistrate, knowing Marcellus to be a Christian, ordered him to be fastened to some branches of a tree, which were drawn down for that purpose. When he was tied to different branches, they were let go, with a design, to tear him to pieces by the suddenness of the jerks.

But this invention failing in its proposed end, he was conducted to Chalons, to be present at some idolatrous sacrifices, at which, refusing to assist, he was put to the torture, and afterwards fixed up to the waist in the ground; in which position he expired, A. D. 179, after remaining three days.

Soon after, Valerian was apprehended, and, by the order of Priscus, was first brought to the rack, and then beheaded in the same year as his friend and relation Marcellus.

About the same time the following martyrs suffered, but no circumstantial or particular accounts of their death have been ascertained.

Benignus, at Dijon; Speusippus, and others at Langres; Androches, Thyrsus, and Felix, at Salieu; Sympoviam and Florella, at Antun; Severinus, Felician, and Exuperus, at Vienna; Cecilia, the virgin, at Sicily; and Thraseus, bishop of Phrygia, at Smyrna.

The emperor Antoninus dying, was succeeded A. D. 180, by his son Commodus, who did not seem to copy his father in any particular. He had neither his virtues nor his vices: he was without his learning and morality, and, at the same time without his prejudices against Christianity. His principal foible was pride, and to that we chiefly ascribe the errors of his reign; for having taken it into his head to fancy himself Hercules, he sacrificed those to his vanity, who refused to subscribe to his absurd imagination.

In this reign Apollonius, a Roman senator, became a martyr. This eminent person was, at once, skilled in all the polite literature of those times, and in all the purest precepts taught by our blessed Redeemer. He was, indeed, a sincere Christian and an accomplished gentleman.

This just person was accused by his own slave Severus, upon an unjust and contradictory, but unrepealed edict, of the emperor Trajan's. This inconsistent law condemned condemned the accused to die, unless he recanted his opinion; and at the same time ordered the execution of the accuser for slander.

Apollonius upon this ridiculous statute was accused; for though his slave Severus knew he must die for the accusation, yet such was his diabolical malice, and desire of revenge, that he courted death in order to involve his master in the same destruction.

As the accused Apollonius refused to recant his opinions, he was, by order of his peers, the Roman senators, to whom he had appealed, condemned to be beheaded. The sentence was executed on the 18th day of April, A. D. 186, his accuser having previously had his legs broken, and been put to death.

Eusebius, Vincentius, Potentianus, and Peregrinus, for refusing to worship Commodus as Hercules, were likewise martyred.

Julius, a Roman senator, becoming a convert to Christianity, was ordered by the emperor, to sacrifice to him as Hercules. This Julius absolutely refused, and publicly professed himself a Christian. On this account, after remaining in prison a considerable time, he was in the year 190, pursuant to his sentence, beat to death with cudgels. Virtue, whose essence is religion, supported him, however, to the last, and he became a glorious martyr to the truth with fortitude and patience.

A full and particular Account of the FIFTH GENERAL PERSECUTION under the Roman Emperors.

THE emperor Commodus dying in the year 191, was succeeded by the short-reigned Pertinax; and he was again succeeded by the still shorter-reigned Julianus. On the death of the last, Severus became emperor in the year 192.

When Severus was recovered from a severe fit of sickness by a Christian, he became a great favourer of Christians in general; and even permitted his son Caracalla to be nursed by a female Christian. Hence, during the reigns of the two emperors already mentioned, who successively succeeded Commodus, and some years of the latter's reign, the Christians had a respite of several years, and consequently suffered no persecution.

But at length the prejudice and fury of the ignorant multitude prevailed, and obsolete laws were revived, and put in execution against the Christians.

The Pagans were alarmed at the progress of Christianity, and they revived the state calumny of placing accidental misfortunes to the account of its professors: Fire, sword, scourges, wild beasts, and cruel imprisonments, were now used; and even the dead bodies of Christians were torn from their graves with Pagan prejudice, to be mangled by popular rage.

Yet, though persecuting malice raged, the gospel shone with resplendent brightness; and, firm as an impregnable rock, withstood the attacks of its boisterous enemies with success. Tertullian, who lived in this age, informs us, that if the Christians had collectively withdrawn themselves from the Roman territories, the empire would have been greatly depopulated.

Victor, bishop of Rome, suffered martyrdom in the first year of the third century, viz. A. D. 201, though the circumstances are not ascertained.

Leonidas, the father of the celebrated Origen, was beheaded for being a Christian. Previous to the execution, the son, in order to encourage him, wrote to him in these remarkable words: "Beware, sir, that your care for us does not make you change your resolution." Many of Origen's hearers likewise suffered martyrdom; particularly two brothers, named Plutarchus, and Serenus: another Serenus, Heron, and Heraclides, were beheaded; Rhais had boiling pitch poured upon her head, and was then burnt, as was Marcella her mother.

Potamiena, the sister of Rhais, was executed in the same manner as Rhais had been; but Basilides, an officer belonging to the army, and one ordered to attend her execution, became her convert.

When Basilides, as an officer, was required to take a certain oath, he refused, saying, that he could not swear by the Roman idols, as he was a Christian. Struck with surprise, the people could not, at first, believe what they heard; but he had no sooner confirmed the same, than he was dragged before the judge, committed to prison, and beheaded immediately afterwards.

Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, was born in Greece, and received both a polite and a Christian education. It is generally supposed, that the account of the persecutions at Lyons was written by himself. He succeeded the martyr Pothinus as bishop of Lyons, and ruled his diocese with great propriety: he was a zealous opposer of heresies in general, and wrote a celebrated tract against heresy about A. D. 187.

Victor, the bishop of Rome, wanting to impose the mode of keeping Easter there, above all other places, it occasioned some disorders among the Christians. In particular, Irenæus wrote him a synodical epistle, in the name of the Gallic churches. This zeal, in favour of Christianity, pointed him out as an object of resentment to the emperor; and he was accordingly beheaded in A. D. 202.

Now the persecutions extending to Africa, many were martyred in that quarter of the globe; the most particular of whom we shall mention.

Perpetua, a married lady, of about twenty-two years of age, with a young sucking child at her breast, was seized upon for being a Christian.

Her father, who tenderly loved her, went to console with her during her confinement; and at the same time would fain have persuaded her to renounce Christianity. Perpetua, however, preserving all the respect due to a parent, maintained the character of a Christian.

This her resolution so much incensed her father, that he beat her unmercifully, and did not visit her for some days after. This gave her, and some others who were confined at the same time, an opportunity of being baptized, as they were only Catechumens before.

When carried before the pro-consul Minutius, she was commanded to sacrifice to idols; but refusing, she was ordered to a dark dungeon. The gloom of this place was of itself disagreeable, but the being deprived of her child was much more so. Two deacons, however, Tertius and Pomponius, who had the care of persecuted Christians, procured her some few hours daily to breathe the fresh air, during which time she had the satisfaction of being allowed to suckle her child. Foreseeing, however, that she should not long be permitted to take care of it, she recommended it strongly to her mother's attention.

Perpetua's father paid her a second visit, and again besought her to renounce Christianity. His behaviour now was all paternal tenderness, and endearing humanity. If any thing worldly could have softened her, this would; but inflexible to all things but Christ, she knew she must leave every thing for his sake; and she only said to him, "God's will must be done." With an heart almost bursting he left her, and only in tears found consolation.

Perpetua gave the strongest proofs of fortitude on her trial, though of a sex naturally timorous; and exhibited to her friends, as well as a great number of spectators, an amazing strength of mind.

At the same time the judge entreated her to consider her father's tears, her infant's helplessness, and her own life; but triumphing over the softer sentiments of nature, she forgot the ideas of both mental and corporeal pain; and determined to sacrifice all the feelings of human sensibility, to that immortality offered by Christ. In vain did they attempt to persuade her, that their offers were gentle, and her own religion otherwise.

Perceiving

Perceiving that she must die, the father's parental tenderness returned, and in the fury of his anxiety, he attempted to carry her off; on which account he received a severe blow from one of the officers. Irritated at this, the daughter shewed that she had not lost all natural sentiments of filial duty; for she immediately declared, that she felt that blow more severely, than if she had received it herself. Being conducted back to prison, she remained for the day of execution, when several other persons were to be executed with her, of whom we must give an account as follows:

Felicitas, a married Christian lady, was big with child at the time of her being apprehended. The procurator, when he examined her, begged that she would have some pity upon herself, and the child within her, and consider the condition she was in; but she replied, that his compassion was thrown away, for no thought of self-preservation could ever induce her to submit to any idolatrous terms. She was delivered in prison of a girl, which was adopted by a Christian woman as her own, and also brought up by her as such.

Revocatus was a Catechumen of Carthage, and a slave. The names of the other prisoners, who were to suffer upon this occasion, were Satur, Saturninus, and Secundulus.

When the day appointed for the execution arrived, they were led to the amphitheatre. Satur, Saturninus, and Revocatus, being bold enough to denounce God's judgments upon their persecutors, they were ordered to run the gantelope between the hunters, or such as had the care of the wild beasts. The hunters being drawn up in two ranks, they ran between, and as they passed were severely lashed.

Felicitas and Perpetua were stripped, in order to be thrown to a mad bull: but some of the spectators, through decency, desired that they might be permitted to put on their clothes, which request was granted.

The bull made his first attack upon Perpetua, and stunned her: he then attacked Felicitas, and wounded her much; but not killing them, the executioner did that office with a sword. Revocatus and Satur were destroyed by wild beasts; Saturninus was beheaded; and Secundulus died in prison. These executions were on the 8th day of March, A. D. 205.

Speratus, and twelve others, were likewise beheaded; as was Andoclus in France. Asclepiades, bishop of antioch, suffered many tortures, but they spared his life.

Cecilia, a young lady of a good family in Rome, was married to a gentleman named Valerian. Being a Christian herself, she soon persuaded her husband to embrace the same faith; and his conversion was speedily followed by that of Tiburtius his brother.

This information drew upon them all the vengeance of the civil magistrate: the two brothers were beheaded; and the maximus, or officer, who led them to execution, becoming their convert, suffered in like manner.

When the lady was apprehended, she was doomed to death; the manner of which was thus: she was placed naked in a scalding bath, and having continued there a considerable time, her head was struck off with a sword, A. D. 222.

Calistus, bishop of Rome, was martyred A. D. 224; but the manner of his death is not recorded: and A. D. 232, Urban, bishop of Rome, met the same fate.

Agapetus, a boy of Præneste, in Italy, who was only fifteen years of age, absolutely refusing to sacrifice to the idols, was severely scourged, and then hanged up by the feet, and boiling water poured over him. He was afterwards worried by wild beasts, and at last beheaded. The officer, named Antiochus, who superintended this execution, while it was performing, fell suddenly from his judicial seat, cried out that his bowels burnt him, and expired; feeling, miraculously, in this world, a sample of the torments due to such cruelty in the next: while the martyr patiently suffered, in hopes of a glorious reward.

A full and particular Account of the SIXTH GENERAL PERSECUTION, under the Roman Emperors.

IN A. D. 235, Maximinus being emperor, he raised a persecution against the Christians. In Cappadocia, the president, Seremianus, did all he could to exterminate the Christians from that kingdom.

A Roman soldier, refusing to wear a laurel crown bestowed on him by the emperor, and confessing himself a Christian, was scourged, imprisoned, and put to death afterwards.

Pontianus, bishop of Rome, for preaching against idolatry, was banished to Sardinia, and there destroyed.

Anteros, a Grecian, who succeeded the last-mentioned bishop in the see of Rome, gave so much offence to the government, by collecting the acts of the martyrs, that, after having held his dignity only forty days, he suffered martyrdom himself.

Pammachius, a Roman senator, with his family and other Christians, to the number of forty-two, were, on account of their religion, all beheaded in one day, and their heads set up on the city gates.

Simplicius, another senator, suffered martyrdom in a similar way.

Calepodius, a Christian minister, after being inhumanly treated, and barbarously dragged about the streets, was thrown into the river Tyber with a millstone fastened about his neck.

Quiritus, a Roman nobleman, with his family and domestics, were, on account of being all Christians, put to the most excruciating tortures, and then to the most painful deaths. Thus this nobleman suffered the confiscation of his effects, poverty, revilings, imprisonment, scourging, tortures, and loss of his life, for the sake of his blessed Redeemer and Mediator.

Martina, a noble and beautiful virgin, likewise suffered martyrdom for the sake of Christ, being variously tortured, and afterwards beheaded.

Hippolitus, a Christian prelate, was tied to a wild horse, and dragged through fields, stony places, bushes, &c. till he died.

While this persecution, raised by Maximinus, lasted, numberless Christians were slain without trial, and buried indiscriminately in heaps; sometimes fifty or sixty being cast into a pit together, without the least decency.

When the tyrant Maximinus died, A. D. 238, he was succeeded by Gordian, during whose reign, and that of his successor Philip, the church was free from persecution for the space of more than ten years; but A. D. 249, a violent persecution broke out in Alexandria. It is to be observed, however, that this was done at the instigation of a Pagan priest, without the emperor's knowledge.

The fury of the people being let loose against the Christians, the mob broke open their houses, stole away the best of their property, destroyed the rest, and murdered the owners: the universal cry being, "Burn them, burn them; Kill them, kill them." The names of the martyrs (three excepted) and the particulars of this affair, however, have not been recorded.

The three martyrs alluded to were as follow:
Metus, an aged and venerable Christian, refusing to blaspheme his Saviour, was beaten with clubs, pricked with sharp reeds, and at length stoned to death.

Flaying PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANS alive, and cutting out their Tongues during the 10th fiery Persecution.

Another mode of Torture inflicted on the Primitive Martyrs, by the Emperor Dioclesian, Vinegar & Salt being poured on the most tender parts while roasting.

ST. LAWRENCE Burnt on a GRIDIRON, by order of the Emperor Valerianus, in the 8th Roman Persecution of the Christian Church.

Two Primitive Martyrs put into a Copper of Boiling Oil, by order of the Proconsul of Ephesus during the Reign of Nero, A.D. 69.

Quinta, a Christian woman, being carried to the temple, and refusing to worship the idols there, was dragged by her feet over sharp flint stones, scourged with whips, and at last dispatched in the same manner as Metrus was.

Apollonia, an ancient maiden lady, confessing herself a Christian, the mob dashed out her teeth with their fists, and threatened to burn her alive. A fire was accordingly prepared for the purpose, and she fastened to a stake; but requesting to be unloosed, it was granted on a supposition that she meant to recant, when to their great surprise, she immediately threw herself into the flames, and was there consumed, which plainly evinced that she contemned the fears of death, and trusted to a lasting future reward, for a temporary punishment in this world.

A full and particular Account of the SEVENTH GENERAL PERSECUTION, under the Roman Emperors.

NOW Decius, being emperor of Rome, began a dreadful persecution against the Christians, A. D. 249. This was occasioned, partly by the hatred he bore to his predecessor Philip, who was deemed a Christian, and partly to his jealousy concerning the amazing increase of Christianity; for the heathen temples began to be forsaken, and the Christian churches crowded.

Provoked at this, Decius attempted the very extirpation of the name of Christian; and it was unfortunate for the cause of the gospel, that many errors had, about this time, crept into the church: the Christians were at variance with each other; self-interest divided those whom social love ought to have united; and the virulence of pride occasioned a variety of contentions.

The heathens in general were ambitious to enforce the imperial decrees upon this occasion, and looked upon the murder of a Christian as a merit in themselves. The martyrs, upon this occasion, were innumerable; but the principal we shall give some account of in rotation.

Fabian, the bishop of Rome, was the first person of eminence who felt the severity of this persecution. The deceased emperor Philip had, on account of his integrity, committed his treasure to the care of this good man. But Decius, not finding as much as his avarice made him expect, determined to wreak his vengeance on the good prelate. He was accordingly seized; and on the 20th of January, A. D. 250, suffered martyrdom, by losing his head.

Abdon and Semen, two Persians, were seized on as strangers; but being found Christians, were put to death, on account of their faith; and Moyse, a priest, was beheaded on the same account.

Julian, a native of Cilicia, as we are informed by St. Chrysostom, was seized upon for being a Christian. He was frequently tortured, but still remained inflexible; and though often brought from prison for execution, was again remanded, to be the object of greater cruelties. He, at length, was obliged to travel for twelve months together, from town to town, in order to be exposed to the insults of the ignorant people.

Perceiving all endeavours to make him recant his religion ineffectual, he was brought before his judge, stripped, and whipped in a most dreadful manner. He was put into a leather bag, together with a number of serpents and scorpions, and in that condition thrown into the sea.

Peter, a young man, amiable for the superior qualities of his body and mind, was apprehended for being a Christian at Lampascus, or the Hellepont, and carried before Optimus, pro-consul of Asia.

When commanded to sacrifice to Venus, he said, "I am astonished that you should wish me to sacrifice to an infamous woman, whose debaucheries even your own historians record, and whose life consisted of such actions, as your laws would punish.—No! I shall offer the true God the acceptable sacrifice of praise and prayers."

When Optimus heard this he ordered the prisoner to be stretched upon a wheel, by which all his bones were broken in a shocking manner.

Notwithstanding, his torments inspired him with fresh courage; he smiled on his persecutors, and seemed, by the serenity of his countenance, not to upbraid, but to applaud his tormentors for his sufferings.

At length the pro-consul, tired with tormenting him, ordered him to be beheaded; which command was immediately executed.

Nichomachus, being brought before the pro-consul as a Christian, was ordered to sacrifice to the pagan idols. Nichomachus replied, "I cannot pay that respect to devils, which is only due to the Almighty." This speech so much enraged the pro-consul, that Nichomachus was put to the rack. He bore the torments, for some time, with patience and great resolution; but, at length, when ready to expire with pain, he forfeited all the advantages he had gained in his former sufferings, by abjuring his faith, and becoming an apostate. He had no sooner given this proof of his frailty, than he fell into the greatest agonies, dropped down on the ground, and immediately expired.

Denisa, a young woman of only sixteen years of age, who beheld this terrible judgment, suddenly exclaimed; "O, unhappy wretch, why would you buy a moment's ease, at the expence of a miserable eternity?" Optimus hearing this, called to her, and asked if she was a Christian? She replied in the affirmative; and being commanded to sacrifice to the idols, refused to comply.

Enraged at her resolution, Optimus gave her up to two libertines, to become the object of their lust. These took her to their own home, and made many attempts upon her chastity, but without effect. At midnight they were deterred from further attempts by a frightful vision, which so amazed them, that they fell at the feet of Denisa, and implored her prayers, that they might not feel the effects of divine vengeance for their brutality. This deliverance, however, did not soften the heart of Optimus; for the damsel was beheaded soon after by his order.

Andrew and Paul, two companions of Nichomachus the martyr, on confessing themselves Christians, were condemned to die, and delivered to the multitude to be stoned. Accordingly, A. D. 251, they suffered martyrdom by stoning, and expired, calling on their blessed Redeemer and Mediator.

Alexander and Epimachus, of Alexandria, were apprehended for being Christians; and confessing the accusation, were beat with staves, torn with hooks, and at length burnt in the fire; and we are informed, in a fragment preserved by Eusebius, that four female martyrs suffered on the same day, and at the same place, but not in the same manner; for these were beheaded.

Lucian and Marcian, two wicked Pagans, though skilful magicians, becoming converts to Christianity, to make amends for their former errors, lived the lives of hermits, and subsisted upon bread and water only. After some time spent in this manner, they reflected that their lives were inefficacious, and determined to leave their solitude in order to bring others to Christianity. Pursuant to this pious and laudable resolution they became zealous preachers, and made many converts. The persecution, however, raging at this time, they were seized upon, and carried immediately before Sabinus, the governor of Bithynia. On being asked by what authority they took upon themselves to preach, Lucian answered, "That the laws of charity and humanity obliged all men to endeavour the conversion of their neighbours, and to do every thing in their power to rescue them from the snares of the devil."

Lucian having spoken in this manner, Marcian also said, that "Their conversion was by the same grace which was given to St. Paul, who, from a zealous persecutor of the church, became a preacher of the gospel."

When the pro-conful found that he could not prevail with them to renounce their faith, he condemned them to be burnt alive, which sentence was executed soon after:

Trypho and Respicius, two eminent men, were seized as Christians, and imprisoned at Nice. They were soon after put to the rack, which they bore with admirable patience for three hours, and uttered the praises of the Almighty the whole time. They were then exposed naked to the severity of the open air, which benumbed all their limbs, as it was the very depth of the cold season.

When remanded to prison, they remained there for a considerable time; and then the cruelties of their persecutors were again evinced. Their feet were pierced with nails; they were dragged through the streets, scourged, torn with iron hooks, scorched with lighted torches, and at length beheaded, A. D. 251, on the first day of Feb.

Agtha, a Sicilian lady, was not more remarkable for her personal and acquired endowments, than her piety: her beauty was such that Quintain, governor of Sicily, became enamoured of her, and made many attempts upon her virtue.

The governor being reputed to be a great libertine, and a bigotted Pagan, the lady very discreetly thought proper to withdraw from two such dangerous enemies, as lust and superstition. She accordingly retired from the town, but being discovered in her retreat, she was apprehended and brought to Catana immediately.

Now finding herself in the power of an enemy, both to her soul and body, she recommended herself to the protection of the Almighty, and prayed for death, as a relief from her afflictions.

In order to gratify his passions with the greater convenience, the governor put the virtuous lady into the hands of Aphrodica, a very infamous and licentious woman. This wretch tried every artifice to win her to the desired prostitution; but found all her efforts were vain; for her chastity was impregnable, and she well knew that virtue alone could procure true felicity.

Aphrodica acquainted Quintain with the inefficacy of her endeavours, who, enraged to be foiled in his designs, changed his lust into resentment. On her confessing that she was a Christian, he determined to gratify his revenge, since he could not his base love.

Agreeable to his orders she was scourged, burnt with red hot irons, and torn with sharp hooks. Having borne these torments with admirable fortitude, she was next laid naked upon live coals, intermingled with glass, and then being carried back to prison, she there expired on the 5th of February, A. D. 251.

Cyril, bishop of Gortyna, was seized by order of Lucius, the governor of that place, who, nevertheless, exhorted him to obey the imperial mandate, perform the sacrifices, and save his venerable person from destruction; for he was now eighty-four years of age. The good prelate replied, that he could not agree to any such requisitions. But as he had long taught others to save their souls, that now he should only think of his own salvation and everlasting welfare.

When the governor found all his persuasions in vain, he pronounced sentence against the venerable Christian, in words to the following effect.

"I order and appoint, that Cyril, who has lost his senses, and is a declared enemy of our gods, shall be burnt alive."

The good worthy prelate heard this sentence without emotion, walked cheerfully to the place of execution, and underwent his martyrdom with great resolution.

The persecution raged in no place more than in the island of Crete; for the governor being exceedingly active in executing the imperial decrees, that place streamed with the pious blood of many.

The principal Cretan martyrs, whose names have been transmitted to us, are as follow:

Theodulus, Saturnius, and Europus, were inhabitants of Gortyna, who had been grounded in their faith by Cyril, bishop of that city; and Eunicianus, Zeticus, Cleomenes, Agathopas, Bastides, and Euaristus, were brought from different parts of the island on accusations relative to their professing Christianity.

When brought into court, they were commanded to sacrifice to Jupiter, which declining, the judge threatened them with the severest tortures imaginable. To these menaces they unanimously answered, "That to suffer, for the sake of the Supreme Being, would to them be the sublimest of pleasures."

The judge's threats failing, he attempted to gain their veneration for the heathen deities, by discanting on their merits, and recounting some of their mythological histories. This gave the prisoners an opportunity of remarking on the absurdity of such fictions, and of pointing out the folly of paying adoration to ideal deities, and real images.

Provoked to hear his favourite idols ridiculed, the governor ordered them all to be put to the rack; the tortures of which they sustained with surprising fortitude. They at length suffered the period of their martyrdom, A. D. 251: being all beheaded at the same time.

Babylas, a Christian of a liberal education, became bishop of Antioch, A. D. 237, on the demise of Zebinus. He acted with inimitable zeal, and governed the church during the most tempestuous times with admirable prudence.

The first misfortune that happened to Antioch during his mission, was the siege of it by Sapor, king of Persia; who having over-run all Syria, took and plundered this city among others, and used the Christian inhabitants with greater severity than the rest.

However, his cruelties were not lasting; for Gordian, the emperor, appearing at the head of a powerful army, Antioch was retaken, the Persians driven entirely out of Syria, pursued into their own country, and several places in the Persian territories fell into the hands of the emperor.

On Gordian's death, in the reign of Decius, that emperor came to Antioch, where, having a desire to visit an assembly of Christians, Babylas opposed him, and absolutely refused to let him come in. The emperor dissembled his anger at that time; but soon sending for the bishop, he sharply reprovved him for his insolence, and then ordered him to sacrifice to the Pagan deities as an expiation for his supposed crime.

Having refused this, he was committed to prison, loaded with chains, treated with great severities, and then beheaded, together with three young men who had been his pupils.

When they went to the place of execution, the bishop exclaimed, "Behold me, and the children that the Lord hath given me." They were martyred, A. D. 251; and the chains worn by the bishop in prison were buried with him.

Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, about this time was cast into prison on account of his religion, where he died through the severity of his confinement.

When Serapian was apprehended at Alexandria, he had all his bones broken, and was then thrown from a high loft, when he was killed by the fall.

Julianus, an old man, lame with the gout, and Cronion, another Christian, were bound on the backs of camels, severely scourged, and then thrown into a fire and consumed. A person who stood by, and seemed to commiserate them, was ordered to be beheaded, as a punishment for entertaining sentiments of tenderness and lenity.

Macar, a Lybian Christian, was burnt: Heron-Ater, and Isidorus, Egyptians; with Dioschorus, a boy of fifteen, after suffering many other torments, met with a similar fate; and Nemefion, another Egyptian, was first tried as a thief; but being acquitted, was accused of Christianity, which confessing, he was scourged, tortured, and finally burnt.

Ishyrian, the Christian servant of an Egyptian nobleman, and magistrate, was run through with a pike by his own master, for refusing to sacrifice to idols; Venatius, a youth of fifteen, was martyred in Italy; and forty virgins, at Antioch, after being imprisoned and scourged, were destroyed by fire.

The emperor Decius having erected a Pagan temple at Ephesus, in the year of our Lord 251, he commanded all who were in that city to sacrifice to the idols. This order was nobly refused by seven of his own soldiers, viz. Maximianus, Martianus, Joannes, Malchus, Dionysius, Constantinus, and Seraion.

The emperor, wishing to win these soldiers to renounce their fate by his entreaties and lenity, gave them a considerable respite till he returned from a journey.

While the emperor was absent, they escaped, and hid themselves in a cavern; which the emperor being informed of at his return, the mouth of the cavern was closed up, and they all perished with hunger.

Theodora, a beautiful young lady of Antioch, on refusing to sacrifice to the Roman idols, was condemned to the stews, that her virtue might be sacrificed to the brutality of lust. Didymus, a Christian, disguised himself in the habit of a Roman soldier, went to the house, informed Theodora who he was, and advised her to make her escape in his dress.

Having effected this, and a man found in the brothel instead of a beautiful lady, Didymus was taken before the president, to whom confessing the truth, and owning that he was a Christian, the sentence of death was immediately pronounced against him. In the mean time Theodora, hearing that her deliverer was likely to suffer, came to the judge, threw herself at his feet, and begged that the sentence might fall only on her as the guilty person; but deaf to the cries of the innocent, and insensible to the calls of justice, the inflexible judge condemned both; when they were executed accordingly, being first beheaded, and their bodies afterwards consumed with fire.

Secundianus having been accused as a Christian, was conveyed to prison by some soldiers. On the way, Verianus and Marcellinus said, "Where are you carrying the innocent?" This interrogatory occasioned them to be seized, and all three, after having been tortured, were hanged, and their heads were cut off when they were dead.

Origen, the celebrated presbyter and catechist of Alexandria, at the age of sixty-four, was seized, thrown into a loathsome prison, laden with heavy fetters, his feet placed in the stocks, and his legs extended to the utmost for several successive days. He was threatened with fire, and tormented by every means that the most infernal imaginations could suggest. But unappalled with dangers, and unshaken by sufferings, his Christian fortitude bore him through all. Indeed, such was the rigour of his judge, that his tortures were ordered to be lingering, that death might not too soon put a period to his miseries. During this cruel temporising, the emperor Decius died, and Gallus, who succeeded him, engaging in a war with the Goths, the Christians met with a respite. In this interim Origen obtained his enlargement, and retiring to Tyre, he there remained till his death, which happened when he was in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

The emperor Gallus having concluded his wars, a plague broke out in the empire: sacrifices to the Pagan deities were ordered by the emperor, and superstition immediately bowed the knee to false gods.

On the Christians refusing to comply with these rites, they were charged with being the authors of the calamity. Hence the storm of persecution spread, from the interior to the extreme parts of the empire, and many fell martyrs to the impetuosity of the rabble, as well as the prejudice of the magistrates.

Cornelius, the Christian bishop of Rome, was, among others, seized upon this occasion. He was first banished to Centum-Cellæ, Civita Vecchia, as it is now called; and after having been cruelly scourged, was, on the 14th of September, A. D. 252, beheaded, after having been bishop fifteen months and ten days.

Lucius, who succeeded Cornelius as bishop of Rome, was the son of Porphyrius, and a Roman by birth. His vigilance, as a pastor, rendered him obnoxious to the foes of Christianity, which occasioned him to be banished: but in a short time, he was permitted to return from banishment.

He was, not long after, however, apprehended, after having been bishop about six months, and beheaded March the 4th, A. D. 253. This bishop was succeeded by Stephanus, a man of a fiery temper, who held the dignity a few years, and might probably have fallen a martyr, had not the emperor been murdered by his general Æmilian, when a profound peace succeeded throughout the whole empire, and the persecution of course terminated.

Several of the errors which crept into the church at this time arose from placing human reason in competition with revelation; but the fallacy of such arguments being proved by the most able divines, the opinions they had created vanished away like stars before the sun.

A full and particular Account of the EIGHTH GENERAL PERSECUTION under the Roman Emperors.

ÆMILIAN, the general, not being properly supported by the army, was slain, and Valerian elected to the empire.

This emperor, for the space of four years, governed with moderation, and treated the Christians with peculiar lenity and respect. But A. D. 257, an Egyptian magician, named Macrianus, gained a great ascendancy over him, and persuaded him to persecute the Christians.

Accordingly edicts were published, and the ungovernable rage of ignorance and superstition was let loose against the Christians. The persecution began in the month of April, and continued for three years and six months.

Innumerable were the martyrs that fell in this persecution, and their tortures and deaths as various and painful. The most eminent martyrs were the following, though neither rank, sex, nor age met with respect.

Rufina and Secunda were two beautiful and accomplished ladies, daughters of Asterius, a gentleman of eminence in Rome. Rufina, the elder, was designed in marriage for Armentarius, a young nobleman; and Secunda, the younger, for Verinus, a person of rank and immense wealth.

These suitors, at the time of the persecution's commencing, were both Christians; but when danger appeared, to save their fortunes, they renounced their faith. They took great pains to persuade the ladies to do the same, but failed in their purpose. Rufina and Secunda, though too just to change their religious sentiments, were too diffident of their own strength to remain longer the objects of such solicitations; on which account they left the kingdom.

The lovers disappointed in their purpose, were base enough to inform against the ladies, who being apprehended as Christians, were brought before Junius Donatus, governor of Rome.

Now being inflexible to all remonstrances; and having passed through several tortures, they sealed their martyrdom with their blood, by being beheaded A. D. 257.

Stephen, bishop of Rome, was beheaded in the same year; and about that time Saturnius, bishop of Thoulouse, was set upon and seized by the rabble of that place, for preventing as they alleged, their oracles from speaking. On refusing to sacrifice to the idols, he was treated with all the barbarous indignities imaginable, and then fastened by the feet to the tail of a bull. Upon a signal given, the enraged animal was driven down the steps of the temple, by which the worthy martyr's brains were dashed out. The small number of Christians in Thoulouse had not courage sufficient to carry off the dead body, till two women conveyed it away, and deposited it in a deep ditch.

This martyr was a most orthodox and worthy primitive Christian, and his doctrines are to be firmly depended upon.

Stephen was succeeded by Sextus as bishop of Rome. He is supposed to have been a Greek by birth, or by extraction, and had for some time served in the capacity of a deacon under Stephen. His great fidelity, singular wisdom, and uncommon courage, distinguished him upon upon many occasions; and the happy conclusion of a controversy with some heretics, is generally ascribed to his prudence.

Marcianus, who had the management of the Roman government in the year 258, procured an order from the emperor Valerian, to put to death all the Christian clergy in Rome.

The senate having testified their obedience to the imperial mandate, Sextus was one of the first who felt the severity of the rescript. Cyprian tells us, that he was beheaded August 6, A. D. 258. We are likewise informed, that six of his deacons suffered with him.

Laurentius, generally called St. Laurence, the principal of the deacons, who taught and preached under Sextus, followed him to the place of execution; when Sextus predicted; that he should meet him in heaven three days after.

Laurentius looking upon this as a certain indication of his own approaching martyrdom, at his return gathered together all the Christian poor, and distributed the treasures of the church, which had been committed to his care, among them; thinking the money could not be better disposed of, or less liable to fall into the hands of the Heathens.

Such liberality alarmed the persecutors, who seized on him to make a discovery from whence it arose, and commanded him to give an immediate account to the emperor, of the church treasures.

Laurentius promised he would do this, but begged a short respite to put things in proper order; when three days being granted him, he was suffered to depart; whereupon, with great diligence, he collected together a great number of aged, helpless, and impotent poor, and repaired to the magistrate, presenting them to him, saying, "These are the true treasures of the church."

Provoked at the disappointment, and fancying the matter meant in ridicule, the governor ordered him to be immediately scourged. He was then beat with iron rods, set upon a wooden horse, and had his limbs dislocated.

He endured these tortures with fortitude and perseverance; when he was ordered to be fastened to a large gridiron, with a slow fire under it, that his death might be the more tedious.

But his astonishing constancy during these trials, and serenity of countenance while under such excruciating torments, gave the spectators so exalted an idea of the dignity and truth of the Christian religion, that many became converts at the same time.

Having lain, for some time, upon this burning bed, the martyr called out to the emperor, who was present, in a kind of jocular distich, made extempore, which may be translated thus:

"This side enough is roasted,
"Then turn me, tyrant, and eat;
"And see, whether raw or roasted,
"I seem the better meat."

Accordingly the executioner turned him, and after having lain a considerable time longer, he had still strength and spirits sufficient left to triumph over the tyrant, by telling him, with great serenity, that he was dressed enough, and only wanted serving up. He then cheerfully lifted up his eyes to heaven, and with calmness yielded his spirit to the Almighty, on August 10, A. D. 258.

Romanus, a soldier, who attended the martyrdom of Laurentius, was one of the converts to his sufferings and fortitude; for he could not help feeling the greatest veneration for a God, who inspired his votaries with such courage, and rendered his martyrs superior to all the cruelties of their enemies.

When the martyr Laurentius was remanded to prison, the brave Romanus took that opportunity of fully inquiring into the nature of the Christian faith; and being entirely satisfied by Laurentius, became firmly a Christian, received his baptism from the captive, and seemed to have his mind impressed with a lively idea of the kingdom of Christ; a kingdom replete with eternal joys, and everlasting felicity.

Romanus's sudden change was soon known, when he was apprehended, scourged severely, and afterwards beheaded.

Hypolitus was another, who, for the same crime, was seized in like manner, and suffered a similar fate.

The persecution raged in Africa with peculiar violence; many thousands received the crown of martyrdom, among whom the following were the most distinguished characters:

Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, was an eminent prelate, and a pious ornament of the church. The brightness of his genius was tempered by the solidity of his judgment; and with all the accomplishments of the gentleman he blended the virtues of the Christian. His doctrines were orthodox and pure; his language easy and elegant; and his manners graceful and winning: in fine, he was both the pious and polite preacher. Indeed, an easy delivery, and polished manner, are requisite in every preacher, who would make an impression on the hearts of his audience. This was the practice of St. Paul, and this was the accomplishment of Cyprian.

It is said, the latter was so perfectly a master of the rules of rhetoric, and the precepts of logic, and so complete in the practice of elocution, and the principles of philosophy, that he was made professor of those sciences in his native city of Carthage, where he became so popular, and taught with such success, that many of his students afterwards became shining ornaments of polite erudition.

He was educated in his youth in the principles of Gentilism, and having a considerable fortune, he lived in the very extravagance of splendour, and all the dignity of pomp. Gorgeous in attire, luxurious in feasting, vain of a numerous retinue, and fond of every kind of fashionable parade, he seemed to fancy that man was born to gratify all his appetites, and created for pleasure only.

In or about the year 246, Cœlius, a Christian minister of Carthage, became the happy instrument of Cyprian's conversion; on which account, and for the great love that he always afterwards bore for the author of his conversion, he was termed Cœcilius Cyprian.

Before his baptism he studied the scriptures with care, and being struck with the beauties of the truths they contained, he determined to practise the virtues therein recommended. After his baptism he sold his estate, distributed the money among the poor, dressed himself in plain attire, and commenced a life of austerity and solitude.

Soon after he was made a presbyter; and being greatly admired for his virtues, and his works, on the death of Donatus, in A. D. 248, he was almost unanimously elected bishop of Carthage.

The care of Cyprian not only extended over Carthage, but to Numidia and Mauritania. In all his transactions he took great care to ask the advice of his clergy, knowing, that unanimity alone could be of service to the church: this being one of his maxims, "That the bishop was in the church, and the church in the bishop; so that unity can only be preserved by a close connection between the pastor and his flock."

Cyprian was publicly proscribed A. D. 250, by the emperor Decius, under the appellation of Cœcilius Cyprian, bishop of the Christians: and the universal cry of the Pagans, was, "Cyprian to the lions, Cyprian to the beasts."

However, the bishop withdrew himself from the rage of the populace, and his effects were immediately confiscated thereupon.

In his retirement he wrote thirty pious and elegant letters to his flock; but several schisms that then crept into the church gave him great uneasiness. The rigour of the persecution abating, he returned to Carthage, and did every thing in his power to expunge erroneous opinions and false doctrines.

A terrible plague breaking out at Carthage, it was, as usual, laid to the charge of the Christians; and the magistrates, gistrates began to persecute accordingly, which occasioned an epistle from them to Cyprian, in answer to which he vindicates the cause of Christianity.

Cyprian was brought before the pro-consul Aspasius Paternus, A. D. 257, when being commanded to conform to the religion of the empire, he boldly made a confession of his faith, and owned himself a Christian. This confession, however, did not occasion his death, but an order for his banishment, which exiled him to a little city on the Lybian sea. On the death of the pro-consul who banished him, he returned to Carthage, but was soon after seized, and carried before the new governor, who condemned him to be beheaded; on the 14th of September, A. D. 258, this sentence was executed.

Certainly this bishop was a most valuable pastor of the church, a pious Christian, an excellent philosopher, and an accurate preacher. Before we quit this article, we think it necessary to insert his own account of his conversion, which is as follows:

"While I laid in darkness and uncertainty, I thought on what I had heard of, a second birth, proposed by the divine goodness; but could not comprehend how a man could receive a new life from his being sprinkled with water; cease to be what he was before, and still remain the same body. How, said I, can such a change be possible? How can he, who is grown old in a worldly way of living, strip himself of his former inclinations, and inveterate habits? Can he, who has spent his whole time in plenty, and indulged his appetite without restraint, ever be transformed into an example of frugality and sobriety? Or he who has always appeared in splendid apparel, stoop to the plain, simple, and unornamented dress of the common people? It is impossible for a man, who has borne the most honourable posts, ever to submit to lead a private and an obscure life: or that he who was never seen in public without a crowd of attendants, and persons who endeavoured to make their fortunes by attending him, should ever bear to be alone. This (continues he) was my way of arguing; I thought it was impossible for me to leave my former course of life, and the habits I was then engaged in, and accustomed to: but no sooner did the life-giving water wash the spots of my soul, than my heart received the heavenly light of the Holy Spirit, which transformed me into a new creature; all my difficulties were cleared, my doubts dissolved, and my darkness dispelled. I was then able to do what before seemed impossible; could discern that my former life was earthly and sinful, according to the impurity of my birth; but that my spiritual birth gave me new ideas and inclinations, and directed all my views to God."

Cyprian's disciples who were martyred in this persecution were, Lucius, Flavian, Victorinus, Remus, Montanus, Donatian, Julian, Primolus.

A most terrible tragedy was exhibited at Utica, 300 Christians were, by the orders of the pro-consul, placed round a burning lime-kiln. A pan of coals and incense being prepared, they were commanded either to sacrifice to Jupiter, or to be thrown into the kiln. Unanimously refusing, they bravely jumped into the pit, and were suffocated immediately.

Fructuosus, bishop of Tarragon, in Spain, and his two deacons, Augurius and Eulogius, for avowing themselves Christians, were consumed by fire.

Malchus, Alexander, and Priscus, three Christians of Palestine, with a woman of the same place, voluntarily accused themselves of being Christians; on which account they were sentenced to be devoured by tygers, which sentence was accordingly executed.

Donatilla, Maxima, and Secunda, three virgins of Tuburga, had gall and vinegar given them to drink, were then severely scourged, tormented on a gibbet, rubbed with lime, scorched on a gridiron, worried by wild beasts, and beheaded at last.

Pontius a native of the city of Simela, near the Alps, being apprehended as a Christian, was tortured on the rack, worried by wild beasts, half burnt, then beheaded, and lastly thrown into the river; and Protus and Hyacinthus likewise suffered martyrdom for the sake of their blessed Redeemer.

Here it is proper to take notice of the singular but miserable fate of the emperor Valerian, who had so long and so terribly persecuted the Christians.

At length this tyrant, by a stratagem, was taken prisoner by Saphores, emperor of Persia, who carried him into his own country, and there treated him with the most unexampled indignity, making him kneel down, as the meanest slave, and treading upon him as a footstool when he mounted his horse, saying, in a vaunting manner, "This posture is a greater proof which way the victory went, than all the pictures the Roman artists can draw."

Having kept him, for the space of seven years, in this abject state of slavery, he at last caused his eyes to be put out, though he was then eighty-three years of age.

His desire of revenge being not yet satisfied, he soon after ordered his body to be flayed alive, and rubbed with salt, under which torments he expired; and thus fell one of the most tyrannical emperors of Rome, and one of the greatest persecutors of the Christians.

Gallienus, the son of Valerian, succeeded him A. D. 260, and, during his reign, the empire suffered many commotions, particularly earthquakes, pestilence, inundations, intestine broils, and incursions of barbarians.

Gallienus upon this reflecting, that when his father favoured the Christians he prospered, and that when he persecuted them he was unsuccessful, he determined to relax the persecution; so that (a few martyrs excepted) the church enjoyed peace for some years. The chief of the few martyrs alluded to, is as follows:

Marnius, a centurion, who being apprehended as a Christian, had but three hours allowed him to deliberate, whether he would sacrifice to the Pagan deities, or become a martyr? Being wavering during this interval, a Christian prelate placed the gospel and a sword before him, and demanding which he would chuse, Marnius took the sword without hesitation.

Again meeting with the governor, he made a noble confession of his faith, and was speedily after beheaded, in the year 262.

A full and particular Account of the NINTH GENERAL PERSECUTION under the Roman Emperors.

A. D. 274, the emperor Aurelian commenced a persecution against the Christians; the principal sufferers are as follow:

Felix, bishop of Rome. This prelate was advanced to the Roman see in 274. He was the first martyr to Aurelian's petulancy, being beheaded in the same year on the 22d of December.

Agapetus, a young gentleman, who sold his estate, and gave the money to the poor, was seized as a Christian, tortured, and then brought to Præneste, a city within a days journey of Rome, where he was beheaded.

These are the only martyrs left upon record during this reign, as it was soon put a stop to by the emperor's being murdered by his own domestics, at Byzantium.

Aurelian was succeeded by Tacitus, who was followed by Probus, as the latter was by Carus: this emperor being killed by a thunder storm, his sons, Carnius and Numerian, succeeded him; and during all these reigns the church enjoyed rest.

Dioclesian mounting the imperial throne, A. D. 284, at first shewed great favour to the Christians. In the year 286, he associated Maximian with him, in the empire; and the following Christians were put to death before any general persecution broke out.

Felician and Primus, two brothers. These Christians were seized by an order from the imperial court: they owned themselves Christians, and were accordingly scourged, tortured, and finally beheaded.

Marcus and Marcellianus were twins, natives of Rome, and of noble descent. Their parents were heathens, but the tutors, to whom the education of the children were intrusted, brought them up as Christians. Being apprehended on account of their faith, they were severely tortured and then condemned to be beheaded.

A respite of a month was obtained for them by their friends, friends, when their father, mother, and all their relations, attempted to bring them back to Paganism, but in vain; the calls of nature were overcome by piety, and religion got the better of worldly feelings.

At last their constancy subdued their persuaders, and their parents and whole family became converts to a faith they had just before satirized.

Tranquillinus, the father of the two young men, was sent for by the præfect to give him an account of the success of his endeavours. Appearing before the magistrate he confessed, that so far from having persuaded his sons to forsake the faith they had embraced, he was become a Christian himself.

This said, he stopped till the magistrate had overcome his surprise, and then resuming his discourse, he used such powerful arguments that he made a convert of the præfect, who soon after sold his estate, resigned his command, and spent the remainder of his days in a pious retirement.

The præfect, who succeeded the above-mentioned convert, had nothing of the disposition of his predecessor: he was morose and severe, and soon seized upon the whole of this Christian race, who were accordingly martyred by being tied to posts, and having their feet pierced with nails. After remaining in this situation for a day and night, their sufferings were put an end to by thrusting lances through their bodies.

Zoe, the wife of the gaoler, who had the care of the before-mentioned martyrs, being greatly edified by their discourses, had a desire to become a Christian: this, as she was dumb with a palsy, she could only express by gestures.

Lamenting her condition, they gave her full instructions in the faith, and told her to pray in her heart to God to relieve her from her disorder. She complied with their request, and was at length relieved; for her paralytic disorder by degrees left her, and her speech returned again.

This enforced her belief, and confirmed her a Christian; and her husband, finding her cured, soon became a convert to Christianity. These conversions made a great noise, and the converts were soon apprehended. Zoe, was commanded to sacrifice to Mars, which refusing, she was hanged upon a tree, and a fire of straw lighted under her. When her body was taken down it was thrown into a river, with a large stone tied to it, in order to sink it.

Tibertius, a native of Rome, was descended from a family of rank and distinction. Being accused as a Christian, he was commanded either to sacrifice to idols, or to walk upon burning coals. He chose the latter, and passed over them without damage, when Fabian passed sentence upon him that he should be beheaded: which sentence was performed in the month of August, A. D. 286, and his body was afterwards buried by some pious Christians.

A most remarkable affair occurred in A. D. 286, a legion of soldiers, consisting of 6666 men, contained none but Christians. This legion was called the Theban legion, because the men had been raised in Thebaus: they were quartered in the East till the emperor Maximian ordered them to march to Gaul, to assist him against the rebels of Burgundy.

They passed the Alps into Gaul, under the command of Mauritius, Candidus, and Exuperis, their worthy commanders, and at length joined the emperor.

About this time, Maximian ordered a general sacrifice, at which the whole army were to assist; and likewise he commanded, that they should take oaths of allegiance, and swear, at the same time, to assist him in the extirpation of Christianity in Gaul.

Terrified at these orders, each individual of the Theban legion, absolutely refused either to sacrifice, or take the oaths prescribed. This so greatly enraged Maximian, that he ordered the legion to be decimated, that is, every tenth man to be selected from the rest, and put to the sword.

This cruel order having been put into execution, those who remained alive were still inflexible, when a second decimation took place, and every tenth man of those living were again put to the sword.

But this second severity made no more impression than the first had done; the soldiers preserved their fortitude and their principles, but by the advice of their officers, drew up a remonstrance to the emperor, in which they told him, "that they were his subjects and his soldiers, but could not at the same time forget the Almighty; that they received their pay from him, and their existence from God. While your commands (said they) are not contradictory to those of our common master, we shall always be ready to obey, as we have been hitherto; but when the orders of our prince and those of the Almighty differ, we must always obey the latter. Our arms are devoted to the emperor's use, and shall be directed against his enemies; but we cannot submit to stain our hands with effusion of Christian blood; and how, indeed, could you, O emperor! be sure of our allegiance and fidelity, should we violate our obligation to our God, in whose service we were solemnly engaged before we entered the army? You command us to search out and to destroy the Christians: it is not necessary to look any further for persons of that denomination, we ourselves are such, and we glory in the name. We saw our companions fall without the least opposition or murmuring, and thought them happy in dying for the sake of Christ. Nothing shall make us lift up our hands against our sovereign; we had rather die wrongfully, and by that means preserve our innocence, than live under a load of guilt: whatever you command we are ready to suffer; we confess ourselves to be Christians, and therefore cannot persecute Christians, nor sacrifice to idols."

It might be presumed, a declaration like this, would have softened the emperor, but it had the contrary effect: for, enraged at their perseverance and unanimity, he commanded that the whole legion should be put to death, which was accordingly executed by the other troops, who cut them to pieces with their swords.

This inhuman affair happened on the 22d of September, A. D. 286; and such was the inveterate malice of Maximian, that he sent to destroy every man of a few detachments, that had been drafted from the Theban legion, and dispatched to Italy.

An old veteran soldier of another legion, whose name was Victor, met the executioners of this bloody business. As they appeared rather merry, he inquired into the cause of their jocularity, and being informed of the whole affair, he sharply reproved them for their barbarity. This excited their curiosity to ask him if he was of the same faith as those who had suffered? On answering in the affirmative, several of the soldiers fell upon him, and dispatched him in a very short time.

Alban, from whom St. Alban's, in Hertfordshire, received its name, was the first British martyr. This island had received the gospel of Christ from Lucius, the first Christian king, but did not suffer by the rage of persecution for many years after.

This man was originally a Pagan, but being naturally of a very humane and tender disposition, he sheltered a Christian ecclesiastic, named Amphibalus, when some officers were in pursuit of him on account of his religion. The pious example, and edifying discourses of the refugee, made a great impression on the mind of Alban; he longed to become a member of a religion which charmed him, and to imitate what he admired. The fugitive minister, happy in the opportunity, took great pains to instruct him; and, before his discovery, perfected Alban's conversion, which afforded him no little satisfaction.

Alban now took a firm resolution to preserve the sentiments of a Christian, or to die the death of a martyr. The enemies of Amphibalus having intelligence of the place where he was secreted, came to the house of Alban, in order to apprehend him. The noble host desirous of protecting his guest and convert, changed clothes with him, in order to facilitate his escape; and when the soldiers came, offered himself up as the person for whom they were seeking. Being accordingly carried before the governor, the deceit was immediately discovered; and Amphibalus being absent, that officer determined to wreak all his vengeance upon Alban:

with this view he sternly commanded the prisoner to advance to the altar, and to sacrifice to the Pagan deities; or threatened, in case of refusal, with the vengeance intended to be exercised against the person who had escaped by his contrivance. The brave Alban however unterrified by these menaces, declared that he would not comply with such idolatrous injunctions, but freely professed himself to be a Christian. Hereupon the governor ordered him to be scourged, which he bore with great fortitude, and seemed to acquire new resolution from his sufferings: he then was sentenced to be beheaded.

The venerable Bede assures us, that, upon this occasion, the executioner suddenly became a convert to Christianity, and entreated permission either to die for Alban, or with him. Obtaining the latter request, they were beheaded by a soldier, who voluntarily undertook the task of executioner. This happened on the 22d of June, A. D. 287, at Verulam, now St. Alban's, in Hertfordshire, where a magnificent church was erected to his memory, about the time of Constantine the Great. This edifice being destroyed in the Saxon wars, was rebuilt by Offa, king of Mercia, and a monastery erected adjoining to it, some remains of which are still visible, and the church is a noble Gothic structure.

Faith was a Christian female, of Aquitaine, in France. Dacian, the Roman governor of Gaul, in the time of Maximian, resided at Agen, in Aquitaine, and was very active in persecuting the Christians.

Faith being informed that there was a design to seize her, forestalled the intention, by surrendering herself up as a prisoner; and being inflexible in her faith, was ordered to be broiled upon a gridiron, and then beheaded; which sentence was executed A. D. 287.

Capacius was one who had concealed himself from the persecutors of Christianity, but being informed of the fortitude of Faith, he openly avowed his religion, and delivered himself up to the governor, who had him first tortured, and then beheaded.

Quintin was a Christian, and a native of Rome, but determined to attempt the propagation of the gospel in Gaul. He accordingly went to Picardy, attended by one Lucian: they preached together at Amiens; after which Lucian went to Beawaris, where he suffered martyrdom for the truth.

Quintin remained in Picardy, and was very zealous in his ministry. His continual prayers to the Almighty were, to increase his faith, and strengthen his faculties to propagate the gospel. Being seized upon as a Christian, he was stretched with pulleys till his joints were dislocated: his body was then torn with wire scourges, and boiling oil and pitch poured on his naked flesh: lighted torches were applied to his sides and arm-pits; and after he had been thus tortured, he was remanded back to prison.

Varus, the governor, being obliged to repair to Vermandois, ordered Quintin to be conducted thither under a strong guard, where he died of the barbarities he had suffered, on the 31st of October, A. D. 287; and his body was sunk in the Somme.

A full and particular Account of the TENTH GENERAL PERSECUTION under the Roman Emperors, commonly called the ÆRA of the MARTYRS.

VARIOUS reasons have been assigned for the occasion of this persecution, particularly the great increase of the Christians, whose numbers rendered them formidable; many of them having lost their humility, and given themselves up to vanity, by dressing gay, living sumptuously, building stately edifices for churches, &c. which created envy; and the hatred of Galerius, the adopted son of Dioclesian, who being stimulated by his mother, a bigotted Pagan, never ceased persuading the emperor to enter upon the persecution, till he had accomplished his determination.

The fatal day fixed upon to commence the bloody work, was the 23d of February, A. D. 303, that being the day in which the Terminalia were celebrated, and on which, as the Pagans boasted, they hoped to put a termination to Christianity and faith.

When the day appointed arrived, the persecution began in Nicomedia, on the morning of which the præfect of that city repaired, with a great number of officers and assistants, to the church of the Christians, where having forced open the doors, they seized upon all the sacred books, and committed them to the flames.

The whole of this transaction was in the presence of Dioclesian and Galerius, who not contented with burning the books, had the church levelled with the ground. This was followed by a severe edict commanding the destruction of all other Christian churches and books; and an order soon succeeded to render Christians of all denominations outlaws, and consequently to make them incapable of holding any place of trust, profit, or dignity, or of receiving any protection from the legal institutions of the realm.

An immediate martyrdom was the consequence of the publication of this edict; for a bold Christian not only tore it down from the place to which it was affixed, but execrated the name of the emperor for his injustice and cruelty. A provocation like this was sufficient to call down Pagan vengeance upon his head; he was accordingly seized, very severely tortured, and then burnt alive.

After this, all the Christian prelates were apprehended and imprisoned; and Galerius privately ordered the imperial palace to be set on fire, that the Christians might be charged as the incendiaries, and a plausible pretence given for carrying on the persecution with the greatest severity and rigour.

Now a general sacrifice was commanded, which occasioned various martyrdoms. Among others, a Christian, named Peter, was tortured, broiled, and then burnt; several deacons and presbyters were seized upon, and executed by various means; and the bishop of Nicomedia, named Anthimus, was beheaded.

There was no distinction made of age, or sex; the name of Christian was so obnoxious to the Pagans, that all fell indiscriminately sacrifices to their opinions. Many houses were set on fire, and whole Christian families perished in the flames; and others had stones fastened about their necks, and being tied together were driven into the sea. The persecution became general in all the Roman provinces, but more particularly in the East; and as it lasted ten years, it is impossible to ascertain the numbers martyred, or to enumerate the various modes of martyrdom: some were beheaded in Arabia; many devoured by wild beasts in Phœnicia; great numbers were broiled on gridirons in Syria; others had their bones broken, and in that manner were left to expire in Cappadocia; and several in Mesopotamia were hung with their heads downwards over slow fires, and suffocated.

A variety of tortures were used in Pontus, in particular, pins were thrust under the nails of the prisoners, melted lead was poured upon them; and various modes were adopted in tormenting the Christians, the indecency of which could be only equalled by the savage barbarities practised in their execution.

In Egypt, the Christians were martyred by means of the four elements, some were buried alive in the earth, others were drowned in the waters of the Nile, many were hung up in the air till they perished, and great numbers received their death by being thrown into large fires, &c. &c.

Scourges, racks, daggers, swords, poison, crosses, and famine, were made use of in various parts to dispatch the Christians; and invention was exhausted to devise tortures against such as had no crime, but thinking differently from the votaries of superstition.

A city of Phrygia, consisting entirely of Christians, was surrounded by a number of Pagan soldiers to prevent any from escaping; who setting it on fire, all the inhabitants perished in the flames. But though the sufferings of the Christians were many, their souls were serene: a perfect resignation to the chastisements of heaven being one of the greatest Christian duties.

At

At last tired with slaughter, several governors of provinces represented to the imperial court, that "it was unfit to pollute the cities with the blood of the inhabitants, or to defame the government of the emperors with the death of so many subjects." Hence many were respited from execution, but though they did not put them to death, as much as possible was done to render their lives miserable.

Many of the Christians had their ears cut off as marks of infamy, their noses slit, their right eyes put out, their limbs rendered useless by dreadful dislocations, and their flesh seared in conspicuous places with red hot irons.

Now it is necessary to particularize the most conspicuous persons, who laid down their lives in martyrdom during this bloody persecution.

Sebastian, a celebrated martyr, was born at Narbonne in Gaul, instructed in the principles of Christianity at Milan, and afterwards became an officer of the emperor's guard at Rome. He remained a true Christian in the midst of idolatry; unallured by the splendors of a court, untainted by evil examples, and uncontaminated by the hopes of preferment. Esteemed by the most eminent, beloved by his equals, and admired by his inferiors, he lived happily, and kept his faith and place, till the rigour of the persecution deprived him of the latter with his life, though not of the former.

This hero was informed against, and betrayed to Fabian the Roman prætor, by Torquatus a pretended Christian; but being of a rank too considerable to be put to death without the emperor's express orders, Dioclesian was acquainted with the whole business.

The emperor, on hearing the accusation, sent for Sebastian, and charged him with ingratitude in betraying the confidence reposed in him, and being an enemy to the gods of the empire and to himself.

To this Sebastian replied, that his religion was of a good, not a pernicious tendency, and that it did not stimulate him to any thing against the welfare of the empire in general, or the emperor in particular, and that the greatest proof he could give of his fidelity, was the praying to the only true God for the health and prosperity of his imperial person. Incensed at this reply, the emperor ordered him to be taken to a field near the city, termed the Campus Martius, and there to be shot to death with arrows; which sentence was accordingly executed.

A few pious Christians coming to the place of execution, in order to give his body burial, perceived signs of life in him, and immediately moving him to a place of security, they in a short time effected his recovery, and prepared him for a second martyrdom; for as soon as he was able to go out, he placed himself intentionally in the emperor's way as he was going to the temple. The unexpected appearance of a person supposed to be effectually dead, greatly astonished the emperor, nor did the words of the martyr less surprise him; for he began with great severity to reprehend him for his various cruelties, and for his unreasonable prejudices against Christianity.

When Dioclesian had overcome his surprise, he ordered Sebastian to be seized, carried to a place near the palace, and beat to death; and that the Christians should not either use means again to recover, or bury his body, he ordered that it should be thrown into the common sewer. Nevertheless, a Christian lady, named Lucina, found means to remove it from the sewer, and bury it in the catacombs, or repositories of the dead.

At this time the Christians, upon mature consideration, thought it unlawful to bear arms under an heathen emperor. Their reasons were many and substantial; the principal were as follow:

1. That they thereby were frequently under the necessity of profaning the Christian sabbath.
2. That they were obliged, with the rest of the army, frequently to be present at idolatrous sacrifices, before the temples of idols.
3. That they were compelled to follow the imperial standards, which were dedicated to heathen deities, and bore their representations.

Such reasons induced many to refuse to enter into the imperial army, when called upon so to do; for the Roman constitution obliged all young men, of such a certain stature, to make several campaigns.

Maximilian, the son of Fabius Victor, being pointed out as a proper person to bear arms, was ordered by Dion, the pro-consul, to be measured, in order to be enlisted in the service. Maximilian, however, boldly declared himself a Christian, and consequently absolutely refused to be enlisted.

Being found of the standard height, Dion gave directions that he should be marked as a soldier, according to the usual custom. He, however, strenuously opposed this, and told Dion that he could not possibly engage in the service.

The pro-consul, incensed at his conduct, plainly told him, that he should either serve as a soldier, or die for disobedience. "Do as you please with me (replied Maximilian); behead me if you think proper; I am already a soldier of Christ, and cannot serve any other power."

Dion, perceiving the inflexibility of the young man, commanded his father to use his authority over him, in order to persuade him to comply; but Victor coolly replied, "My son knows best what he has to do."

Dion again demanded of Maximilian, with some acrimony, if he was yet disposed to receive the mark? To which the young man replied, he had already received the mark of Christ. "Have you!" (exclaimed the pro-consul in a rage) then I shall quickly send you to Christ. "As soon as you please (answered Maximilian) that is all I wish or desire."

The pro-consul then seeming to soften, represented to him that it was a great pity he should be lost in the prime of his years. Maximilian replied, that he might die, but should not be lost; for though he left the world, his immortal soul would reside eternally with the Almighty. On which the pro-consul pronounced this sentence upon him, "That for disobedience in refusing to bear arms, and for professing the Christian faith, he should lose his head." This sentence he heard with great intrepidity, and exclaimed, with apparent rapture, "God be praised!"

When at the place of execution, he exhorted those that were Christians to remain so; and such as were not, to embrace a faith which led to eternal salvation.

Addressing his father then, with a cheerful countenance, he desired that the military habit intended for his wearing, might be given to the executioner; and, after taking leave of him, said, he hoped they should meet again in the other world, and be happy to all eternity. He then received, at once, the fatal stroke, and the crown of martyrdom.

The worthy father beheld the execution with amazing fortitude, and saw the head of his heroic son severed from his body, without any visible emotions, but such as seemed to proceed from a conscious pleasure, in being the parent of one whose piety and courage rendered him so shining an example for Christians to imitate in future ages.

Vitus, a Sicilian of a considerable family, was brought up a Christian; when his virtues increased with his years, his constancy supported him under all afflictions, and his faith was superior to the most dangerous perils and misfortunes.

Hylas, his father, who was a Pagan, finding that he had been instructed in the principles of Christianity by the nurse who brought him up, did all his endeavours to bring him back to Paganism; but finding his efforts in vain, he forgot all the feelings of a parent, and informed against his son to Valerian, governor of Sicily, who was very active in persecuting the Christians at this period.

The young man, at the time of his being apprehended upon the information of his father, was little more than twelve years of age; Valerian therefore, on account of his tender age, thought to frighten him out of his faith. He was accordingly threatened with great anger, and ordered to be severely scourged.

Having

Having received this punishment, the governor sent him back to his father, thinking that what he had suffered would certainly make him change his principles: but in this he was mistaken; and Hylas, finding his son inflexible, suffered nature to sink under superstition, and determined to sacrifice his son to the idols.

On being apprized of his design, Vitus escaped to Lucania, where being seized, he was by order of Valerian put to death, June 14, A. D. 303; but we are not informed in what manner.

His nurse, Crescentia, who brought him up as a Christian, and Modestus, a person who escaped with him, were martyred at the same time, but the manner unknown.

There was one Victor, a Christian of a good family at Marseilles, in France, who spent a great part of the night in visiting the afflicted, and confirming the weak; which pious work he could not, consistent with his own safety, perform in the day-time; and his fortune he spent in relieving the distresses of poor Christians, thinking that riches were useless unless subservient to works of charity, and if otherwise employed, a bane to all possessors.

At length, however, he was seized by the emperor's orders, and being carried before two præfects, they advised him to embrace Paganism, and not forfeit the favour of his prince, on account of a dead man, as he styled Christ. In answer to which he replied, "That he preferred the services of that dead man, who was in reality the Son of God, and was risen from the grave, to all the advantages he could receive from the emperor's favour: that he was a soldier of Christ, and would therefore take care that the post he held under an earthly prince, should never interfere with his duty to the King of heaven; and that as for the gods, whose worship they recommended to him, he could not think them any better than evil spirits."

Victor was loaded with reproaches for this reply, but being a man of rank, he was sent to the emperor to receive his final sentence. When brought before him, the emperor, under the severest penalties, commanded him to sacrifice to the Roman idols. On his absolute refusal to comply, Maximian ordered him to be bound, and dragged through the streets. During the execution of this order, he was treated by the enraged populace with all manner of cruelties and indignities.

Still remaining inflexible, his courage was deemed obstinacy, and Christian confidence called ill-grounded and irrational: to which he replied, "That the ready disposition of the disciples of Christ to undergo any sufferings on that score, and the joy with which they met the most ignominious and painful deaths, were a sufficient proof of their assurance of the object of that hope." And added, "That he was ready to give an example of what he had said in his own person."

When by the emperor's order stretched upon the rack, he turned his eyes towards heaven, and prayed to God to endue him with patience; after which he underwent the tortures with most admirable fortitude. After the executioners were tired with inflicting torments on him, he was taken from the rack, and conveyed to a dungeon.

However, his confinement became a fortunate circumstance, for he converted the gaolers, named Alexander, Felician, and Longinus. This affair coming to the ears of the emperor, he ordered them immediately to be put to death, and the gaolers were beheaded accordingly.

Now Victor was again put to the rack, and unmercifully beaten with battoons, and then again sent to his dungeon. Being a third time examined concerning his religion, he persevered in his principles; a small altar was then brought, and he was commanded to offer incense upon it immediately. Fired with indignation at the request, he boldly stepped forward, and with his foot overthrew both altar and idol.

The emperor Maximian, who was present, was so enraged at this, that he ordered the foot with which he had kicked the altar, to be immediately cut off; and Victor was afterwards sentenced to be thrown into a mill, and crushed to pieces with the stones thereof.

In some measure, this cruel sentence was put into execution; Victor was thrown into the mill, but part of the apparatus breaking, he was drawn from it terribly bruised; and the emperor not having patience to stay till it was mended, ordered his head to be struck off, which, A. D. 303, was executed accordingly.

While Maximus, governor of Cilicia, was at Tarsus, three Christians were brought before him by Demetrius, a military officer. Tarachus being the eldest, and first in rank, was accordingly the first addressed by Maximus, who asked him what he was? The prisoner replied, "A Christian." This reply offending the governor, he again made the same demand, and was answered in a similar manner. Hereupon the governor told him, that he ought to sacrifice to the gods, as that was the only way to promotion, riches, and honours; and that the emperors themselves did what he recommended to him now to perform: but to this Tarachus replied, that avarice was a sin, and gold itself an idol as abominable as any other; for it promoted frauds, treacheries, robberies, and murders; it induced men to deceive each other, by which in time they deceived themselves, and bribed the weak to their own eternal destruction. As for promotion, he desired it not, as he could not in conscience accept of any place, office, or post, which would subject him to pay adoration to idols; and with regard to honours, he desired not greater than the honourable title of Christian. As to the emperors themselves being Pagans, he added with the same undaunted and determined spirit, that they were superstitiously deceived in adoring senseless idols, and evidently misled by the machinations of the Devil himself.

For the boldness of this speech, his jaws were ordered to be broken, that the parts which uttered the words should suffer for their supposed impropriety. He was then stripped, scourged, loaded with chains, and thrown into a dismal dungeon, to remain there till the trials of the other two prisoners.

Then Probus was brought before Maximus, who, as usual, asked him his name?

Undauntedly the prisoner replied, the most valuable name he could boast of was that of a Christian; but that the usual appellation by which he was distinguished was Probus; that his father was a Thracian, and that himself was born at Sida, in Pamphylia.

To this Maximus replied in the following words: "Your name of Christian will be of little service to you, be therefore guided by me; sacrifice to the gods, engage my friendship, and the favour of the emperor."

But Probus nobly answered, "That as he had relinquished a considerable fortune to become a soldier of Christ, it might appear evident, that he neither cared for his friendship, or the favour of the emperor."

By the governor's order Probus was then scourged; and Demetrius, the officer, observing to him how his blood flowed, advised him to comply; but his only answer was, that those severities were agreeable to him. What! cries Maximus, does he still persist in his madness? To which Probus rejoined, "That character is badly bestowed on one who refuses to worship idols, or what is worse, devils."

After being scourged on the back, he was then scourged on the belly, which he suffered with as much intrepidity as before, still repeating, "The more my body suffers, and loses blood, the more my soul will grow vigorous, and be a gainer." He was then committed to gaol, loaded with irons, and his hands and feet stretched upon the stocks.

Andronicus was next brought up for examination, when being asked the usual questions, he said, "I am a Christian, a native of Ephesus, and descended from one of the first families in that city." After a great deal of altercation, in which the governor was unsuccessful in endeavouring to dissuade him from his fate, he was ordered to undergo punishments similar to those of Tarachus and Probus, and then to be remanded to prison.

Having been confined some days, the three prisoners were brought before Maximus again, who began first to reason with Tarachus, saying, that as old age was honoured from the supposition of it's being accompanied by wisdom, he was in hopes that what had already passed, upon deliberation, have caused a change in his sentiments.

sentiments. Finding himself, however, mistaken, he ordered him to be tortured by various means; particularly, fire was placed in the palms of his hands; he was hung up by his feet, and smoked with wet straw; a mixture of salt and vinegar was poured into his nostrils; and he was then again remanded to his dungeon.

Then Probus being called for, and asked if he would sacrifice, replied, "I come better prepared than before; for what I have already suffered, has only confirmed and strengthened me in my resolution. Employ your whole power upon me, and you will find, that neither you, nor your masters, the emperors, nor the gods whom you serve, nor the Devil who is your father, shall oblige me to adore gods whom I know not."

Now the governor attempted to reason with him on religious subjects; for having a slender education, he was proud of shewing his talents; for those who know little are fond of talking much, and by mistaking casuistry for reason, would fain deceive others as they do themselves. He launched forth into the most extravagant praises of the Pagan deities, and as he enumerated them, described their respective powers, and separate virtues; and inferred, from what himself had said, that such deities, possessed of such admirable qualities, ought to be worshipped. However, continues he, as your chief objection is against a plurality of deities, I will not press you to sacrifice to all of them; sacrifice only to Jupiter, the chief, the most powerful, and most invincible of our gods.

But Probus, easily confuted his arguments, turned his casuistry into ridicule, and in particular said, "Shall I pay divine honours to Jupiter, to one who married his own sister to an infamous debauchee, as is even acknowledged by your own priests and poets."

Provoked at this speech, the governor ordered him to be struck upon the mouth, for uttering what he called blasphemy: his body was then seared with hot irons; he was put to the rack, and afterwards scourged; his head was then shaved, and hot coals placed upon the crown; and after all these tortures, he was again sent to prison.

When Andronicus was again brought before Maximus, the latter attempted to deceive him, by pretending that Tarachus and Probus had repented of their obstinacy, and owned the gods of the empire. To this the prisoner answered; "Lay not, O governor, such a weakness to the charge of those, who have appeared here before me in this cause, nor imagine it to be in your power to shake my fixed resolution with artful speeches. I cannot believe that they have disobeyed the laws of their fathers, renounced their hopes in our God, and obeyed your extravagant orders: nor will I ever fall short of them in faith and dependance upon our common Saviour: thus armed, I neither know your gods, nor fear your authority; fulfil your threats, execute your most sanguinary inventions, and employ every cruel art in your power on me; I am prepared to bear it for the sake of Christ."

On account of this answer he was cruelly scourged, and his wounds were afterwards rubbed with salt. Being perfectly well again in a short time, the governor reproached the gaoler for having suffered some physician to attend him. The gaoler in his own defence, declared, that no person whatever had been near him, or the other prisoners, and that he would willingly forfeit his head if any allegation of the kind could be proved against him. Andronicus corroborated the testimony of the gaoler, and added, that the God whom he served was the most powerful of physicians, and the plant of grace the most salutary of vegetables.

Afterwards, these three worthy Christians were brought to a third examination, when they retained their constancy, were again tortured, and at length ordered for final execution.

When brought to the amphitheatre, several beasts were let loose upon them; but none of the animals, though hungry, would touch them. This so greatly irritated Maximus, that he severely reprehended the keeper, and ordered him to produce a beast that would execute the business for which he was wanted. The keeper then brought out a large bear, that had that very day destroyed three men; but this voracious creature, and a fierce lioness, both refused to touch the prisoners.

Perceiving the design of destroying them by the means of wild beasts ineffectual, Maximus ordered them to be slain by a sword, which was accordingly executed on the 11th of October, A. D. 303. They all declared, previous to their martyrdom, that as death was the common lot of all men, they wished to meet that for the sake of Christ, which they must of course fall a victim to on account of nature; and to resign that life to faith, which must otherwise be the prey of disease. These sentiments are noble, Christian-like, and philosophical; for as death is certain, the time and mode is not of that importance commonly supposed.

Romanus, a native of Palestine, was deacon of the church of Cæsarea, at the time of the commencement of Dioclesian's persecution. Being at Antioch when the imperial order arrived for sacrificing to idols, he was greatly afflicted to see many Christians, through fear, submit to the idolatrous mandate, and deny their faith to preserve their existence.

While censuring some of the recreant Christians for their conduct, he was informed against to the emperor, and soon after apprehended. Being brought to the tribunal, he boldly confessed himself a Christian, and said he was ready and willing to suffer any thing which he was pleased to inflict upon him for his confession.

When condemned for his faith, he was scourged, put to the rack, his body torn with hooks, his flesh cut with knives, his face scarified, his teeth beat from their sockets, and his hair plucked up by the roots. Thus cruelly mangled, he turned to the governor, and very calmly thanked him for what he had done, and for having opened him so many mouths to preach the doctrines of Christianity; for, says he, every wound is a mouth, to sing the praises of Jehovah.

The following circumstance, which happened upon this occasion, is related by Prudentius, and other writers.

Romanus offered to stand to the decision of a young child, whose age must be free from malice, or any other vices; and to put the truth of the Christian upon that test. Asclepiades (they add) accepted of the proposal, and agreed to put the merits of the cause to that issue; accordingly, a child of about seven years of age was called out of the crowd, and being asked whether he thought it to be true, that men ought to worship but one God in Christ, or to worship many gods? He answered, that certainly, whatsoever men affirm to be God, must be but one, and as this one is Christ, he must of necessity be God; for that there are many gods, continued the boy, we children cannot believe. The governor amazed at this, was highly enraged with the child, and calling him little villain, and young traitor, asked him who taught him that lesson? To which the child replied, "My mother, with whose milk I sucked in this lesson, that I must believe in Christ." This so incensed the governor, that he ordered the infant to be horfed and most severely whipt; insomuch that the beholders could not refrain from tears, the mother of the child only excepted, who chid him for asking for a draught of water to be given to him, charging him to thirst for that cup which the infants of Bethlehem had drank of, and bidding him remember Isaac, who willingly offered his neck for the sacrifice to his father's sword. Whilst the woman was giving her son this lesson, the merciless executioner plucked the skin and hair from the crown of his head; his mother at the same time saying to him, "Though you suffer here, my child, you shall shortly be with him, who shall adorn thy naked head with a crown of eternal glory." Upon which the child smiled upon her and his executioners, and bore their stripes with man-like fortitude.

Romanus soon after was ordered to be strangled, and the child to be beheaded; which sentences were executed on the 17th of November, A. D. 303.

Marcellinus was an ecclesiastic at Rome: being apprehended on account of his religion, he was ordered to be privately executed in the forest, and was accordingly beheaded there.

Peter,

Peter, a Christian, apprehended for the same cause, was executed at the same time and place.

Also about this period Smaragdus, Largus, and Cyriacus, a deacon of the Christian church, were martyred; but the mode of their deaths is not specified by our authors.

Sufanna, the niece of Caius, bishop of Rome, was pressed by the emperor Dioclesian to marry a noble Pagan, who was nearly related to him: but this noble lady refused the honour intended her, on account of her religion, which was that of a Christian, which so greatly enraged the emperor, that she was immediately afterwards beheaded by his order.

Dorotheus, the high chamberlain of the household to Dioclesian, was a Christian, and took great pains to make converts. In his religious labours, he was joined by Gorgonius, another Christian, and one belonging to the palace. They were both high in the emperor's favour, but they soon had an opportunity of evincing, that worldly honours and temporary pleasures, were nothing when set in competition with the joys of immortality; for being informed against, they were first tortured and then strangled.

One Peter, an eunuch belonging to the emperor, was a Christian of singular modesty and humility. His humility caused him to undertake any menial office to serve the afflicted; and his benevolence occasioned him to give whatever he possessed, to those who needed assistance; convinced that riches did not constitute happiness, and that want could give instructions which wealth could never bestow.

Having been informed against as a Christian, and confessing the charge, he was scourged till his flesh was torn in a most terrible manner; and then salt and vinegar were thrown upon the wounds to render them more grievous. Having endured these tortures with the utmost tranquillity, he was laid on a gridiron, and broiled over a slow fire till he expired in the greatest agony.

Cyprian, known by the title of the magician, to distinguish him from Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, was a native of Antioch. He received a liberal education in his youth, and particularly applied himself to astrology; after which he travelled for improvement through India, Egypt, Greece, &c.

When he had finished his studies he settled near Babylon, and being skilled in the Chaldean mysteries, he employed his talents in endeavouring to draw women from chastity and conjugal faith, and in persecuting the Christians, and ridiculing Christianity.

He became, in the course of time, acquainted with Justina, a young lady of Antioch, whose birth, beauty, and accomplishments, rendered her the admiration of all who knew her.

Justina had been educated in idolatry, but being happily converted to Christianity, she induced her father and mother to embrace the same faith. Her modesty was remarkable, and her prudence in avoiding the carnal conversation of men was extremely commendable. A Pagan gentleman falling in love with her, and not being able to obtain a favourable return to his addresses, applied for assistance to Cyprian.

Cyprian undertook the design, but with a treacherous intent; for under the pretence of acting for his friend, he determined, if possible, to possess the lady himself. To effect this, he employed all his skill, and essayed a variety of infernal contrivances; but his endeavours proving ineffectual, he was fully convinced that a superior power protected her from his evil intentions.

His serious reflections, on this account, awakened him to search into the truths of Christianity, and his research became so beneficial, that he renounced the errors of Paganism, and embraced a faith, of the excellency of which he could not fail to be assured.

Cyprian's repentance was truly sincere; he determined to reform his conduct, and to make every amends in his power for the crimes he had committed. Eusebius, a Christian, confirmed him in this resolution, and prevented him from falling into despair for his past follies and wicked intentions.

Now Cyprian burnt his books of astrology and magic, received baptism, and became animated with a powerful spirit of grace. The conversion of Cyprian had a great effect on the Pagan gentleman who paid his addresses to Justina, and he in a short time embraced Christianity in like manner.

During the persecution of Dioclesian, Cyprian and Justina were seized upon as Christians, when the former was torn with pincers, and the latter chastised; and after suffering other torments, both were decapitated.

Sergius was an officer in the Roman army, and attended the emperor Maximian into Syria. Being accused as a Christian, he was ordered to sacrifice to Jupiter. Refusing to perform any such idolatrous command, he was stripped of his military habit, and, by way of derision, dressed in woman's clothes. He then was forced to walk a considerable way with nails in his sandals, and had a conclusion put to his sufferings by being at last beheaded.

Bacchus, an officer of the same rank as Sergius, being apprehended at the same time, underwent similar sufferings, and was beheaded A. D. 303, on the same day.

A Spanish lady of a Christian family, named Eulalia, who was remarkable in her youth for a sweetness of temper and solidity of understanding, seldom found in the capriciousness of juvenile years, was apprehended as a Christian. The magistrate attempted, by the mildest means, to bring her over to Paganism, but she answered him in so ironical a manner, and ridiculed the Pagan deities with such asperity, that the judge, incensed at her behaviour, ordered her to be tortured.

Accordingly her sides were torn by hooks, and her breasts burnt in the most shocking manner, till the fire catching her head and face, she expired, in December A. D. 303, by the violence of the flame.

The emperor Dioclesian falling ill, in the year 304, the persecution was carried on by Galerius, and the governors of the several provinces, when many fell victims to the infatuated zeal, or infernal malice of the persecutors; among whom the following persons are enumerated.

Vincent, a Spanish Christian, was brought up by Valerius, bishop of Saragossa, who, on account of his great merits, ordained him a deacon. When the persecution reached Spain, Dacian, the governor of Terragona, ordered Valerius the bishop, and Vincent the deacon, to be seized, loaded with irons, and imprisoned.

Some short time after Dacian examined them with great asperity, and threatened them with death, unless they renounced their principles. Vincent undertaking to speak for both, as Valerius had an impediment in his speech, delivered himself with great freedom, and avowed their full determination to persist in the faith.

Hereupon, Dacian, in a rage at his freedom of speech, declared, that unless he immediately burnt incense to the gods he despised, he should fall a sacrifice to the contempt he expressed.

But the prisoners being firm in their resolutions, Valerius was banished, and the whole of Dacian's rage directed against Vincent, who was racked, had his limbs dislocated, his flesh torn with hooks, and was laid on a gridiron, which had not only a fire placed under it, but spikes at the top, which run into his flesh. In this situation, while one side was broiling over the fire, the other was tormented with red hot irons, or salamanders; and then salt was thrown over the wounds.

All these torments neither destroying him, nor changing his resolutions, he was remanded to prison, and confined in a small loathsome dark dungeon, which, to make it the more disagreeable, was strewed with sharp flints, and pieces of broken glass. Orders were given not to suffer him to have any provisions whatever, and that the news of his death should be carried to Dacian as soon as known.

By the time the keepers thought him famished, they entered the dungeon, when, instead of seeing only a corpse as they expected, they beheld, to their great astonishment, Vincent at prayers, his wounds healed, and his body in tolerable health.

Now

Now this speedy recovery and preservation had such an effect upon the keepers, that it became the happy means of their conversion.

However Dacian, abandoned to the hardness of his heart, and impenetrable to conviction, instead of being softened by these uncommon circumstances, was enraged at the triumph of Vincent over his cruelties; and gave order for new tortures to be prepared for him of so severe a nature, as to make him sink under their load and oppression.

But fortunately, his malice was again disappointed, for before the instruments could be prepared, God took him to himself, and he died with all the serenity of a good conscience, and as much calmness as if he had only sunk into a gentle repose.

The extreme hatred conceived by Dacian against Vincent did not conclude with his death, for he ordered that his body should be exposed in the open fields to the birds of prey; but they not offering to touch it, he commanded that it should be thrown into the river, which was done accordingly, A. D. 304, his death happening on the 22d of January, in that year.

It was in this year the persecution of Dioclesian began particularly to rage, when many Christians were put to cruel tortures, and the most painful and ignominious deaths; the most eminent and particular of whom we shall here give an account of.

Saturninus, a priest of Albitina, a town of Africa, used to officiate in his clerical capacity, preach, and administer the sacrament to a society of Christians, who privately assembled at the house of Octavius Felix: for the severity of the times was such, that they could not publicly perform their religious duties.

Having been informed against, Saturninus, with four of his children, and several other persons, were apprehended; and that their punishment might be the more exemplary and public, they were sent to Carthage, the capital of all Africa, where they were examined before Anulinus, the pro-consul of that quarter of the globe.

Saturninus, on the examination, gave such spirited answers, and vindicated the Christian religion with such force of eloquence, as shewed that he was worthy to preside over an assembly that professed a faith of purity and truth. Anulinus, enraged at his superior arguments, which he could not confute, ordered him to be stopped from saying any more by being put to a variety of tortures, such as scourging, tearing his flesh with hooks, burning with hot irons, &c. Having been thus inhumanely tortured, he was remanded to prison, and there starved to death.

His four children notwithstanding they were variously tormented, remained steady in their faith, on which they were sent back to the dungeon in which their father was confined, and were also starved to death in the same manner.

There were eight other Christians tortured on the same day as Saturninus, and much in the same manner. Two expired on the spot through the severity of their sufferings, and the other six being sent back to prison, were suffocated by means of the closeness of the prison.

Thelico, a pious Christian; Dativus, a noble Roman senator; Victoria, a young lady of considerable family and fortune, with some others of less consideration, had been all auditors of Saturninus, were seized at the time he was, tortured in a similar manner, and perished by the same means; sealing their testimony with their lives, and receiving the glorious crown of martyrdom as a reward for their sufferings in this transitory life.

Three sisters, Chionia, Agape, and Irene, were seized upon at Thessalonica, when Dioclesian's persecution reached Greece. They had been educated in the Christian faith, but had taken great precautions not to be seized on that account, being, from the softness of their natures, unwilling to meet the rage of the times.

They now retired to a solitary place, and spent their hours in performing religious duties. Being, however, discovered and seized, they renounced their former timidity, blamed themselves for being so fearful, and begged of God to strengthen them against the great trial they had to undergo.

When Agape was examined before Duleatius, the governor, was asked whether she was disposed to comply with the laws of the land, and obey the mandates of the emperor? She answered, "That being a Christian, she could not comply with any laws which recommended the worship of idols and devils; that her resolution was fixed, and nothing should deter her from continuing in it to the last moment of her life."

Her sister Chionia being next examined, replied in the same manner as Agape had done, when the governor not being able to draw them from their faith, pronounced sentence of condemnation on them; pursuant to which they were burnt, and March 25, A. D. 304, received a crown of martyrdom in the flames.

After this Irene was brought before the governor, who fancied that the death of her sisters would have an effect upon her fears, and that the dread of similar sufferings would engage her to comply with his proposals. He therefore exhorted her to acknowledge the heathen deities, to sacrifice to them, to partake of the victims, and to deliver up her books relative to Christianity.

These propositions she heard with indignation, and positively refused to comply with any of them; the governor asked her, Who it was that persuaded her, and her sisters, to keep those books and writings? She answered, "It was that God who commanded them to love him to the last; for which reason she was resolved to submit to be burned alive rather than give them up into the hands of his professed enemies."

When the governor found that he could make no impression on her, he ordered her to be exposed naked in the streets, which shameful order having been executed, she was burnt, April 1, A. D. 304, at the same place where her sisters suffered before her.

One Agatho, a man of a pious turn of mind, with Cassice, Philippa, and Eutychia, were martyred about the same time; but the particulars have never been ascertained.

Also Marcellinus, bishop of Rome, who succeeded Caius in that see, was greatly perplexed during this persecution; and having strongly opposed paying divine honours to Dioclesian, who wished to exact them from the people, and to appear as a god, he was at length seized and committed to a dungeon.

Notwithstanding, his conduct was steady, his constancy immoveable, and his patience great. He suffered martyrdom, by a variety of tortures, in the year 304, comforting his soul till he expired with the prospect of those glorious rewards it would receive by the tortures suffered in the body.

Theodotus, a Dalmatian, kept an inn at Ancyra: Being a Christian, and of a very humane disposition, he devoted a great part of his time to visit the afflicted, and a great part of his property to relieve the poor; he assisted the sick in body, and converted the sick in soul, so that he was in every capacity a true servant of Christ his Redeemer.

Theotecnus, the governor of these parts, whose cruelty could be equalled by nothing but his bigotry, received the mandate for persecuting the Christians with great satisfaction, and wrote the emperor word that he would do his utmost endeavours to root out Christianity from every place where he had any sway.

Thus encouraged by the governor, the Pagans began to inform against, abuse, and persecute the Christians. Great numbers were seized upon, and imprisoned; their goods were destroyed, and their estates confiscated. Many fled into the woods, or retired to caves, where some supported themselves by feeding upon such roots as they could casually find, and others perished by famine. Indeed many were starved in the city, by means of the following singular stratagem: the governor gave strict orders, that no provisions whatever should be exposed to sale in the markets, without having been first consecrated to the idols; hence the Christians were compelled to eat what had been offered to the Devil, or to refrain from food and perish. The latter dreadful alternative was chosen by many, who, to preserve the purity of their faith, heroically gave up their lives.

During these critical times, Theodotus did all that he could could to comfort the imprisoned, and buried the bodies of several who had been martyred, though it was forbidden on pain of death. He likewise privately assisted many with such food as they might use with a safe conscience, for having laid in a great stock of corn and wine, he sold it out at prime cost.

One Polychronicus, a Christian, being seized, forfeited his faith, in order to preserve his life, and compounded for a frail existence, by informing against his friend Theodotus, who hearing of this treachery, surrendered himself to the governor of his own accord.

Upon his arrival in the court, he surveyed the divers instruments of torture with a smile, and seemed totally regardless of their power.

When placed at the bar, the governor informed him, that it was still in his power to save himself, and to escape the torments prepared for disobedience, by sacrificing to the gods of the empire; "and (continued he) if you renounce your faith in Christ, I promise you my friendship, and the emperor's protection, and will constitute you one of the magistrates of the town."

In his answer, Theodotus discovered great courage and eloquence; he absolutely refused to renounce his faith, declined the friendship of the governor, and protection of the emperor, upon the terms proposed, and treated the Pagan idols with the greatest contempt.

The Pagans on hearing this, were in general extremely clamorous for the prisoner to be immediately punished; and the priests in particular rent their clothes, and tore their chaplets, the badges of their offices, through rage. The governor, without hesitation, complied with their desire, when Theodotus was scourged, torn with hooks, and then placed upon the rack. After this, vinegar was poured into his wounds, his flesh was seared with burning torches, and his teeth were knocked out of their sockets. He was then remanded to prison, and by the way, pointing to his mangled body, he said to the people, "it was but just that Christians should suffer for him who suffered for us all."

After the expiration of five days, he was brought from prison, A. D. 304, tortured, and then beheaded.

There was one Victor, a native of Ancyra, accused by the priests of Diana, of having abused their goddesses. For this imputed crime he was seized upon, and committed to prison, his house plundered, his family turned out of doors, and his estate forfeited.

When put to the rack, his resolution failed him, and he began to waver in his faith, through the severity of his torments. Being carried back to prison, in order to make a full recantation, God punished him for his intended apostacy; for his wounds mortified, and put an end to his life in a short time.

There were seven aged women of Ancyra, apprehended for their faith; they were examined before the governor, who, on finding them steadfast in their religious principles, reviled their belief, ridiculed their age, and ordered them to be delivered over to some young libertines, that their virtue might be abused; this being done, one of the debauchees, more bold and forward than the rest, seized upon the eldest of the women, whose name was Tecusa, who thus addressed him: "What designs, child, can you have on us, who are worn out with age and infirmities. I am now more than three-score and ten years old, my companions are not much younger; you may look on us as so many rotten carcases, as we shall soon be, for the governor after death refuses us burial;" then lifting up her veil, she shewed him her grey hairs, and then went on: "You may, perhaps, have a mother-of nearly the same age as myself, this should give you some respect to us." The young men, though entire libertines, were so affected with this speech, that they desisted, and immediately returned to their homes.

Now the governor, upon the failure of his design of having them prostituted, determined to compel them to assist in the idolatrous rites of washing the goddesses Minerva and Diana; for it is to be understood, that in Ancyra, it was the custom annually to wash the images of those heathen goddesses, and that the washing was considered as a material part of the adoration of these idols.

Accordingly, these seven Christian women, whose names were Tecusa, Phamme, Claudia, Alexandria, Julitta, Euphrasia, and Matrona, were forced to the temple; but absolutely refusing to wash the idols, the governor was so enraged that he ordered them all to have stones tied about their necks, and to be pushed into the water intended for the washing, in which they gloriously suffered, being thereby drowned.

A worthy Christian, of the name of Timothy, being carried before Urban, governor of Palestine, was sentenced to be burnt to death by a slow fire; which sentence was executed at Gaza, on the 19th day of August, A. D. 304.

Philip, bishop of Heraclea, had, in every act of his life, appeared as a good Christian; the chief of his disciples were Severus, a priest; and Hermes, a deacon; and these three did all in their power to promote the cause of Christianity. This worthy bishop was advised to secrete himself, in order to avoid the storm of the persecution; but he reproved those who counselled him so to do, telling them that their merit would be enhanced by their sufferings, and that death had no terror for the virtuous. He therefore publicly performed his duty.

An officer named Aristomachus, being employed to shut up the Christian churches in Heraclea, Philip took great pains to convince him, that the shutting up buildings made by hands could not destroy Christianity, while the living temples of the Lord remained; for the true faith consisted not in the places where God is adored, but in the hearts of those who adore God.

However, being denied entrance into the church where he used to preach, Philip took up his station at the door, and there exhorted people to patience, perseverance, and godliness.

Such exhortations, of course, caused him to be seized and carried before the governor, who severely reprimanded him, and then continued to speak sternly in these words: "Bring all the vessels used in your worship, and the scriptures which you read and teach the people, and surrender them to me, before you are forced thereto by tortures." "If," replied the bishop, "you take any pleasure in seeing us suffer, we are prepared for the worst you can do. This infirm body is in your power; use it as you please. The vessels you demand shall be delivered up, for God is not honoured by gold and silver, but by the fear of his power; the ornaments of the souls of his servants are more pleasing to him, than the decorations of churches: but as to the sacred books, it is neither proper for me to part with them, nor for you to receive them." This answer so much incensed the governor, that he ordered one Mucassor, a person particularly distinguished for inhumanity, to torture the prelate. Hermes, expressing himself freely against such barbarities, was likewise ordered to be scourged at the same time.

The Pagans having proceeded to the place where the scriptures, and the church plate were kept, immediately seized them; they likewise, unroofed the church, walled up the doors, embezzled the plate, and burnt the sacred scriptures.

When Philip was taken to the market-place, he was ordered to sacrifice to the Roman deities in general, and to a very handsome image of Hercules in particular; to which command, "Alas!" replied the prelate, "how unhappy are you, who are thus grossly mistaken in the nature of the Deity, and so ignorant in the truth, as to worship your own workmanship: what value is there in gold, silver, brass, iron, or lead, which are dug out of the earth? You are unacquainted with the divinity of Christ, which is incomprehensible to human capacities; but what power can your idols boast, which are made by base mechanics, a drunken statuary, or a debauched carver, and tricked up by the arts of the taylor and the goldsmith? and yet these are your gods." And after some other observations on the absurdities of the Pagan religion, he concluded, that from what he had already said, it appeared that the heathens worshipped what might lawfully be trod on, and made gods of such things as Providence had designed for their service.

Now the governor tried the constancy of Hermes, but but finding him as inflexible as the bishop, he committed them both to prison. Soon after this, the governor's time of ruling those parts being expired, a new governor named Justin arrived; but he was to the full as cruel as his predecessor had proved.

Now Philip was dragged by the feet through the streets, severely scourged, and then brought again to the governor, who charged him with obstinate rashness, in continuing disobedient to the imperial decrees; but he boldly replied, "My present behaviour is not the effect of rashness, but proceeds from my love and fear of God, who made the world, and who will judge the living and the dead, whose commands I dare not transgress. I have hitherto done my duty to the emperors, and am always ready to comply with their just orders, according to the doctrine of our Lord Christ, who bids us give both to Cæsar and to God their due; but I am obliged to prefer heaven to earth, and to obey God rather than man."

On hearing this speech, the governor immediately passed sentence on him to be burnt, which was executed accordingly, and the martyr expired, singing praises to God in the midst of the fire.

Likewise Hermes, for behaving in a similar manner, and Severus, who had surrendered himself up in order to suffer with his friends, met with the same fate. Such were the effects of a diabolical zeal for the adoration of idols, and such the consequences of the blindness of Pagan idolatry.

We are informed by St. Ambrose, that Agricola, was a Christian of so very amiable a disposition, that he even gained the esteem and admiration of the Pagans. Being apprehended as a Christian, he was crucified in imitation of the death of our Saviour; and his body, together with the cross, were buried at Bologne, in Italy, in one grave.

Vitalis, the servant and convert of the above martyr, Agricola, was seized upon on the same account as his master, and being put to the torture, died under the hands of his tormentors, through the severity of his sufferings.

Carpophorus, Victorius, Severus, and Severianus, were brothers, and all four employed in places of great trust and honour in the city of Rome. Having exclaimed against the worship of idols, they were apprehended, and scourged with the plumbetæ, or scourges, to the ends of which were fastened leaden balls. This punishment was exercised with such excess of cruelty, that the pious brothers fell martyrs to it's severity.

A worthy Christian of Aquileia, named Chrysogonus, was beheaded by order of Dioclesian, for having instructed Anastasia, a young lady of that city in the Christian faith. This young lady was descended from an illustrious Roman family. Her mother, named Flavia, was a Christian, and dying while her daughter was an infant, she bequeathed her to the care of Chrysogonus, with a strict injunction to instruct her in the principles of Christianity. This Chrysogonus punctually performed; but the father of the young lady, who was a Pagan, gave her in marriage to a person of his own persuasion, named Publius, who was of a good family, but bad morals, and having spent his wife's and his own patrimony, he had the baseness and inhumanity to inform against her as a Christian.

However, Publius dying soon after, his wife was released; but continuing to perform many charitable actions to distressed Christians, she was again apprehended, and delivered up to Florus, governor of Illyricum. Florus commanded that she should be put to the torture, when finding her constant in the faith, he ordered her to be burnt, which sentence was put in execution on December 25, A. D. 304. The event taking place about a month after the martyrdom of Chrysogonus, her instructor as already mentioned.

Some time in the same year, Mouris and Thea, two Christian women of Gaza, were martyred in that city. The former died under the hands of her tormentors, and the latter perished in prison of the wounds she had received when tortured.

Timothy, a deacon of Mauritania, and Maura his wife, had not been united together by the bands of wedlock above three weeks, when they were separated from each other by the persecution.

Being apprehended as a Christian, Timothy was carried before Arrianus, the governor of Thebais, who did all in his power to allure him from his faith, and induce him to embrace the Pagan superstition.

Perceiving his endeavours vain, and knowing that Timothy had the keeping of the Holy Scriptures, the governor commanded him to deliver them up, that they might be burnt: to which Timothy answered, "Had I children, I would sooner deliver them up to be sacrificed, than part from the word of God." The governor being much incensed at this reply, ordered his eyes to be put out with red-hot irons, saying, "The books shall at least be useless to you, for you shall not see to read them."

So great was his patience under the operation that the governor grew more exasperated; he, therefore, in order, if possible, to overcome his fortitude, ordered him to be hung up by the feet, with a weight tied about his neck, and a gag in his mouth.

This severity of treatment the worthy Christian underwent with the greatest courage, when some busy person acquainted the governor that he had been but newly married to a wife, of whom he was extremely fond. Arrianus was glad to hear this, as he thought that love might effect what menaces could not, and that an affection for his wife might prevail over that intrepid spirit which could sustain so many torments with such resolution and fortitude.

Accordingly Maura was sent for, and promised a handsome reward, with the life of her husband, if she could prevail upon him to sacrifice to the idols. This was a severe attack upon the principles of Maura: weak by nature, wavering in her faith, tempted by a bribe, and impelled by an unbounded affection for her husband, she undertook the impious business.

When conducted to him, she assailed his constancy with all the persuasive language of real affection. When the gag was taken out of his mouth, in order to give him an opportunity of replying, instead of consenting to his wife's entreaties, as they expected, he greatly blamed her mistaken love, and declared his resolution of dying for the faith. The consequence of which was, that Maura repeated her importunities, till the martyr, her husband, reproached her so strongly with her weakness, that she returned to his way of thinking, and resolved to imitate his courage and fidelity, and either to accompany, or follow him to glory. Timothy advised her to repair her fault by declaring that resolution to the governor, by whose order she had undertaken that shameful and sinful commission. Maura made some difficulty, at the first, to comply with his advice, to undertake this dangerous and arduous task. However, being further strengthened by his exhortations, and the grace of God, she went to Arrianus and told him, that she was united to her husband in opinion as well as love, and was ready to suffer any thing to atone for her late crime, in wishing to make him an apostate. After trying in vain to alter her resolution, the governor ordered her to be tortured, which was executed with great severity. After this Timothy and Maura were crucified near each other, A. D. 304, both receiving the crown of martyrdom with the greatest intrepidity and resolution.

A bishop of Assisium, named Sabinus, refusing to sacrifice to Jupiter, and pushing the idol from him, had his hands cut off by the order of the governor of Tuscan. After patiently suffering this barbarity, he was committed to prison, where he remained a considerable time without any assistance or relief but what he received from a Christian widow, whose blind grandfather had been by him restored to sight.

The governor, who was himself afflicted with sore eyes, on hearing this intelligence, revolved it's singularity in his mind, and began to consider the behaviour of the Christians, and the tenets of Christianity, in a more candid light than he had hitherto done. Sending for Sabinus, he informed him that he now entertained very different sentiments to what he had hitherto done, both with respect to him and his faith; then throwing himself at the feet of Sabinus, he entreated him to afford assistance both to his inward and outward ailments, and to undertake the cure of his body and soul.

The undissembled fervency with which he spoke, convinced Sabinus of his sincerity. Having received proper instructions concerning the principles of Christianity, he was baptized, and the disorder in his eyes immediately left them: this conversion of the governor was followed by that of his whole family, and some of his friends.

When the tyrant Maximian was informed of these circumstances, he immediately sent one of his principal officers, named Lucius, to Assisium, who, according to his instructions, ordered the governor and all his family to be beheaded.

Immediately after their execution, Sabinus himself was scourged to death, in the month of December, A. D. 304. In like manner two ecclesiastics, named Marcellus and Exuperantius, who officiated under Sabinus, were scourged in a most dreadful manner; but remaining constant in their faith, their flesh was torn with hooks till they expired.

Weary of the farce of state, and public business, the emperors Dioclesian and Maximian resigned the imperial diadem, and were succeeded by Constantius and Galerius; the former, a prince of the most mild and humane disposition, and the latter, equally remarkable for his tyranny and cruelty.

These divided the empire into two equal governments; Galerius ruling in the East, and Constantius in the West; and the people in the two governments felt the effects of the different dispositions of the two emperors; for those in the West were governed in the mildest manner, but such as resided in the East felt all the miseries of oppression and despotism.

In regard to the Christians, to whom Galerius bore a most prejudiced and implacable hatred, we are informed, that "he not only condemned them to tortures, but to be burnt in slow fires, after this horrible manner: they were first chained to a post, then a gentle fire put to the soles of their feet which contracted the callus till it fell off from the bone: then flambeaux just extinguished were put to all parts of their bodies, so that they might be tortured all over; and care was taken to keep them alive, by throwing cold water in their faces and giving them some to wash their mouths, lest their throats should be dried up with thirst, and choke them. Thus their miseries were lengthened out whole days, till, at last, their skins being consumed, and they just ready to expire, were thrown into a great fire, and had their bodies burnt to ashes; after which they were ground to powder, and thrown into some river."

Of the members martyred by the order of Galerius, the most eminent are as follow:

Amphianus was a gentleman of distinction in Lycia, and a scholar to Eusebius; pressing through the crowd while the proclamation for sacrificing to idols was read, he caught the governor Urbanus by the hand, and severely reprov'd him for his wickedness.

Hereupon, the governor incensed at this freedom, ordered him to be put to the torture, and then thrown into the sea, in the waves of which he was drowned.

Ædesius, brother to the above martyr, was, for nearly the same offence, much about the same time, martyred at Alexandria, in a singular manner.

Julitta, a Lyconian of royal descent, but more celebrated for her virtues than noble blood, was a Christian lady of great humility, constancy, and integrity. When the edict for sacrificing to idols was published at Iconium, she withdrew from that city to avoid the bigotted rage of Domitian the governor, taking with her only her young son Cyricus, and two women servants. She was, however, seized at Tarsus, and being carried before Alexander, the governor, she acknowledged that she was a Christian. For this confession her son was taken from her, and she was immediately put to the rack, and tortured with great severity; but she bore all her sufferings with a true Christian fortitude and patient resignation.

But young Cyricus cried bitterly to get at his mother; when the governor observing the beauty, and being melted at the tears of the child, took him upon his knee, and endeavoured to pacify him. Nothing, however, could quiet Cyricus, he still called upon the name of his mother, and at length, in imitation of her words, lisped out, "I am a Christian." This innocent expression turned the governor's compassion into rage; he lost the man in the bigot, and throwing the child furiously against the pavement, dashed out its brains. Now the mother, who from the rack beheld the whole transaction, thanked the Almighty that her child was gone before her; and she should be without any anxiety concerning his future welfare, certain that now no advantage could be taken of his tender years, to pervert his principles, and hinder him of his salvation.

To complete the execution, Julitta had boiling pitch poured on her feet, her sides torn with hooks, and received the conclusion of her martyrdom, by being beheaded, April 16, A. D. 305.

Pantaleon, a native of Nicomedia, was taught most branches of human learning by his father, who was a Pagan, and the precepts of the gospel by his mother, who was a Christian. Applying to the study of medicine, he became eminent in the knowledge of physic, and in process of time was appointed physician to the emperor Galerius. The name of this man in Greek signifies humane, and the appellation well-suited his nature, for he was one of the most benevolent men living. He assisted the poor, to the utmost of his fortune: and, by the help of God, his skill in physic was attended with the most astonishing success. However, his extraordinary and well-deserved reputation roused the jealousy of the Pagan physicians, who accused him to the emperor. Galerius, finding him a Christian, which he had not before known, ordered him to be tortured, and then beheaded, which sentence on July 27, A. D. 305, was accordingly executed.

Hermolaus, a venerable and pious Christian, of a great age, and an intimate acquaintance of Pantaleon's, suffered martyrdom for his faith on the same day, and in the same manner as Pantaleon.

Julitta, of Cappadocia, was a lady of distinguished capacity, great virtue, and uncommon courage: she was martyred on account of a law-suit, of which Basil, bishop of Cæsarea, gives an account to the following purport:

"She had a troublesome law-suit with one of the principal men in Cæsarea, who was unjustly possessed of a considerable part of her estate, and had seized both her servants and cattle. This oppressive usurper had found means to bribe the judges in his favour, and hired persons to swear, that the land and goods in dispute were his property: Julitta, supported by the justice of her cause, thought that she had nothing more to do, but to give the magistrates a plain and an ingenuous account of her title. When the cause came to be tried, the defendant, instead of supporting his claim, or giving any answer to the plaintiff's plea, urged that the law would not suffer him to engage at that bar, with one of a different religion; so that he could not proceed in his defence, unless the lady, who was the plaintiff, renounced Christianity.

"The judge was too well instructed not to second the motion, and gave it as his opinion, that what he insisted upon was according to the laws of the empire. He then ordered an altar to be brought in, and some fire to be put on it, and incense to be prepared, and then told the parties, that if they expected, either of them, to enjoy any benefit of the laws, they must both of them offer incense to the gods.

"The usurper, who was an heathen, immediately complied; but Julitta made it appear, that her faith was much dearer to her than her goods, or even than life itself. "No, said she, my affection to what is undoubtedly my own, shall never hinder me from sacrificing my all, and even my life, if required, rather than violate my fidelity to my God and Saviour." This declaration greatly incensed the judge, but Julitta went on with the same intrepidity, and thanked God for the the assurance she had of an eternal inheritance, while what was her own upon earth was disputed, and unjustly taken from her. The magistrate made several attempts to persuade her to renounce her faith, but was always answered that she was the servant of Christ, and as such she could not listen to his proposals without horror; upon this she was condemned to be burnt: which sentence, A. D. 305, was executed accordingly.

Eustratius, secretary to the governor of Arminia, was thrown into a fiery furnace, for exhorting some Christians, who had been apprehended, to persevere in their faith. Auxentius and Eugenius, two of Eustratius's adherents, were burnt at Nicopolis; Mardarius, another friend of his, expired under the hands of his tormentors; and Orestes, a military officer, was broiled to death on a gridiron, for wearing a golden cross at his breast.

Theodore, a Syrian by birth, a soldier by profession, and a Christian by faith, set fire to the temple of Cybele, in Amasia, through an honest indignation at the idolatrous worship practised therein: for which being apprehended, he was severely scourged, and February 18, A. D. 306, burnt to death.

Dorothy, a Christian of Cappadocia, was, by the governor's order, placed under the care of two women, who had become apostates to the faith, with a view that she might be induced to follow their example. However, this lady's discourses had such an effect upon the two apostates, that they became re-converted, and were put to death for not succeeding. Soon after which, Dorothy herself was tortured, and then beheaded.

Pancratius, or Pancrass, was a native of Phrygia, but being made a Christian and brought to Rome, by his uncle, he there suffered martyrdom, being beheaded after the decease of his uncle, who died a natural death a little time before.

Cyrinus, Nazarius, Nabor, and Basilides, four worthy Christian officers at Rome, were thrown into prison for their faith, and being condemned, were scourged with rods of wire, and then beheaded.

Two Roman military officers, Nicander and Marcian, being Christians, were apprehended on account of their faith. As they were both men of great abilities in their profession, the utmost endeavours were made to induce them to renounce Christianity; but these endeavours being found ineffectual, they were ordered to be beheaded. Crowds of people attended the execution, among whom were the wives of the two sufferers. The consort of Nicander was a Christian, and encouraged her husband to meet his fate with fortitude; but the wife of Marcian being a Pagan, entreated her husband to save himself, for the sake of her and her child. Marcian however reproved her for her idolatry and folly, but embraced her and the infant before the stroke was given. Nicander likewise took leave of his wife in the most affectionate manner, and then both, with great willingness and resolution, received the crown of martyrdom.

Besides these there were several others whose names and sufferings are not ascertained.

Likewise, in the kingdom of Naples, several martyrdoms took place: in particular, Januarius, bishop of Beneventum; Sofius, deacon of Misene; Proculus, another deacon; Etyches and Acutius, two laymen; Festus, a deacon; and Desiderius, a reader, were all, on account of being Christians, condemned, by the governor of Campania, to be devoured by wild beasts. The savage animals, however, not touching them, they were ordered to be beheaded, which sentence was immediately put into execution.

Marcellus, a centurion, of the Trajan legion, was posted at Tangier, and being a Christian, suffered martyrdom, of which the following account is recorded.

"It happened that while he was there, the emperor's birth-day was kept with great solemnity, and the sacrifices to the Pagan idols made a considerable part of that solemnity. All the subjects of the empire were expected on that occasion, to conform to the blind religion of their prince; but Marcellus, who had been well instructed in the duties of his profession, expressed his detestation of those profane practices, by throwing away his belt, the badge of his military character, at the head of his company, declaring aloud, that he was a soldier of Christ, the eternal king. He then quitted his arms, and added, that from that moment he ceased to serve the emperor; and that he thus expressed his contempt of the gods of the empire, which were no better than deaf and dumb idols. "If, continued he, their imperial majesties impose the obligation of sacrificing to them and their gods, as a necessary condition of their service, I here throw up my commission, and quit the army."

Marcellus's behaviour and speeches occasioned an order for his being beheaded, on a double score, viz, desertion from the army, and impiety against the gods of the empire. He heard the sentence with intrepidity, and received the crown of martyrdom with great willingness. Cassian, secretary to the court which tried Marcellus, expressing his disapprobation of such severe proceedings, was ordered into custody; when avowing himself a Christian, he met with the same fate, and suffered a similar martyrdom.

Quirinus, bishop of Siscia, being carried before Matenius, the governor, was ordered to sacrifice to the Pagan deities, agreeable to the edicts of various Roman emperors. To which he replied, "The emperors insist upon our sacrificing to their deities, against the express prohibition of God; to deities which we can by no means own, because they are, in reality, nothing: whereas the power that I serve is every where, above all things, supports, governs, and disposes of all things, as he pleases; for he is the sovereign master, and sole author of the universe." For this speech he was ordered to be severely scourged.

When under the hand of the executioner, the governor was urgent with him to sacrifice, and offered to make him a priest of Jupiter. To which Quirinus replied, That he was already engaged in the priestly office, while he thus offered a sacrifice to the true God. "I, continued he, scarce feel my torments, and am ready to suffer still greater, that my example may shew those whom God has committed to my care, the way to the glory we wish for."

Perceiving his constancy, the governor sent him to gaol, and ordered him to be heavily ironed; flattering himself, that the hardships of a gaol, and the weight of his chains, might overcome his resolutions.

But being deceived in his expectations, he was sent to Amantius, the principal governor of Parmonia, now Hungary, who loaded him with chains, and carried him through the principal towns of the Danube, exposing him to ridicule wherever he went.

At length arriving at Sabaria, and finding that Quirinus would not renounce his faith, he ordered him to be cast into a river, with a stone fastened to his neck. The sentence was accordingly put into execution, and Quirinus, floating about for some time, exhorted the people in the most pious terms, concluding his admonitions with this prayer:

"It is no new thing, O all-powerful Jesus! for thee to stop the course of rivers, or to cause a man to walk upon the water, as thou didst thy servant Peter: the people have already seen the proof of thy power in me; grant me now to lay down my life for thy sake, O my God!"

Having pronounced these last words, he immediately sunk and died, June 4, A. D. 308; and his body was afterwards taken up, and buried by some pious Christians.

There were five Egyptian Christians upon a visit to their afflicted brethren in Cæsaria, who were apprehended and carried before Firmilian, the governor of Palestine, who on questioning them concerning whence they came, and what they were, was answered by one, in the name of the rest, that they were Christians, and belonged to the glorious city of Jerusalem, speaking allegorically of the heavenly Jerusalem. The governor was surprised at the answer, as he knew Vespasian, and his son Titus, had destroyed the ancient Jerusalem; and that the considerable town erected by Adrian upon the spot, was called Ælia Capitolina: he therefore inquired more particularly cularly concerning it. The Christian who had spoken before, again replied, and pursuing the allegory, described, with great force of imagination, the great beauty, riches, and strength of the place. Firmilian still mistaking the Christian's meaning, by understanding his words in a literal sense, was dreadfully alarmed; for not dreaming that a heavenly city was alluded to, he fancied that the Christians were strengthening and fortifying some place, in order to revolt from their allegiance to the emperor. Full of this mistake, and enraged at the supposed disloyalty, he condemned the five prisoners to be cruelly tormented, and then beheaded; which sentence was executed A. D. 309, on the 16th of February.

Pamphilus, a native of Phœnicia, of a considerable family, was a man of such extensive learning, that he was called a second Origen. He was received into the body of the clergy at Cæsarea, where he established a public library, and spent his time in the practice of every Christian virtue. He copied the greatest part of the works of Origen with his own hand, and, assisted by Eusebius, gave a correct copy of the Old Testament, which had suffered greatly by the ignorance or negligence of former transcribers. He likewise gave public lectures on religious and literary subjects, in an academy which he had erected for that purpose, till the year 307, when he was apprehended, and carried before Urban, the governor of Palestine.

This governor, thinking that a man of his abilities must be of great importance to any party, did all he could to induce him to embrace Paganism. Finding his endeavours vain, he changed persuasions into menaces, and from entreating began to threaten him.

Still Pamphilus maintained his resolution, whereupon he was ordered to be tortured severely, and then sent to prison, which was immediately put into execution.

Immediately after, Urban, having displeased the emperor, was displaced and beheaded; but another was appointed in his room, who was equally prejudiced against the professors of Christianity.

Pamphilus suffered martyrdom under the new governor by being beheaded; together with Valens, a deacon of the church of Jerusalem; and Paul, a layman of Jamnia, in Palestine.

Porphyrius, the servant of Pamphilus, was martyred by means of a straw fire, for only requesting leave to bury the body of his master and other martyrs who suffered.

Theodulus, a venerable and faithful servant to Firmilian, the governor, being accused as a professor of the Christian faith, confessed the charge, and was, by order of his cruel master, crucified, on February 17, A. D. 309; and, on the same day, Julian, a Cappadocian, was burnt.

Marcellus, bishop of Rome, being banished on account of his faith, fell a martyr to the miseries he suffered in exile, A. D. 310, on the 16th of January.

Peter, the sixteenth bishop of Alexandria, by order of Maximus Cæsar, who reigned in the East, was martyred, November 25, A. D. 311.

Lucian, a learned and eloquent Syrian, was a man of so benevolent a temper, that he disposed of the greatest part of his fortune in charitable actions. Being advanced to the clerical character in Antioch, he became a true servant of Christ, and a zealous pastor of the church. At length he was apprehended as a Christian, imprisoned for the space of nine years, put to the rack, rolled upon sharp flints, nails, &c. and then being tortured to death, his body was thrown into the sea; but it was afterwards cast on shore, and received Christian interment.

A virgin of only thirteen years of age, of the name of Agnes, was beheaded for being a Christian; Valentine, a priest, suffered the same fate at Rome; and Erasmus, a bishop, was martyred in Campania. Cosmus and Damian, Arabians, and brothers, were martyred in Cilicia; Adrian, an imperial officer, was beheaded for being a Christian; Barbara, a young lady, was martyred at Nicomedia; Lucy, a Christian virgin, was put to death at Syracuse; and even Serena, the empress of Dioclesian, was beheaded for being and avowing herself a Christian.

Gordius, a native of Cæsarea, and a centurion in the Roman army, was first tormented, and then burnt; Menas, an Egyptian soldier, was beheaded; and Barlaam, a noble martyr, as we are informed by Basilus, having endured the torments of the executioners, even to the very point of death, the tormentors at last brought him, and laid him upon the altar, where they used to offer sacrifices to their idols, and put frankincense into his hand, which they lighted, imagining that the heat and force of the fire would oblige him to scatter the burning incense on the altar, that they might thereby say that he had sacrificed; but in this they were disappointed, for the flame went round his hand, which appeared as if it had been covered with red hot embers, while he uttered this exclamation of the psalmist: "Blessed is the Lord my God, who teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight." After which he surrendered his soul into the hands of his blessed Redeemer! The Pagans having full authority to use the Christians as bad as they thought proper, shut up the doors of a church, in which a Christian congregation were assembled, and having set fire to the building, every person perished in the flames. Many were severely beaten with sticks, cords, scourges, rods, whips, &c.

However, Constantine the Great determined to redress the grievances of the Christians, for which purpose he raised an army of 30,000 foot, and 8000 horse, with which he marched towards Rome, against Maxentius, the emperor. But previous to his entering upon this expedition, we are informed, that he considered that it was necessary to have some superior Being to confide in, besides his own strength; and as at that time there were many deities in the world, he was studious to learn which was the most worthy for him to fix upon as his protector, and tutelar guardian. He reflected on the fatal miscarriages of his predecessors, who had so violently maintained a multiplicity of gods, and reposed an entire confidence in their assistance. On the other hand he considered that while his own father adored only one God he continually prospered, and had peace of mind. Hence he rejected the adoration of idols, and implored the assistance of the only true God; who heard his prayers, and answered them in a manner so surprising and miraculous, that Eusebius, who relates this history, acknowledges it would not have been credible, had he not received it from the emperor's own mouth, who publicly and solemnly ratified the truth upon his oath. The extraordinary circumstances are as follow:

"The army being advanced near Rome, and the emperor employed in his devout ejaculations on the 27th day of October, about three o'clock in the afternoon, when the sun was declining, there suddenly appeared to him a pillar of light in the heavens, in the form of a cross with this plain inscription on or about it, ΤΟΤΩ ΝΙΚΑ, In this overcome. Constantine was greatly surprised at this strange sight, which was visible to the whole army, who equally wondered at it with himself. The officers and commanders, prompted by the augurs and auspices, or soothsayers, looked upon it as an inauspicious omen, portending an unfortunate expedition; the emperor himself did not understand it, till at length our blessed Saviour appeared to him in a vision, with the cross in his hand, which he had shewed him in the day before, commanding him to make a royal standard, like that he had seen in the heavens, and cause it to be continually carried before his army, as an ensign both of victory and safety. Early the next morning, Constantine informed his friends and officers of what he had seen in the night, and sending for proper workmen, sat down by them, and described to them the form of the standard, which he then ordered them to make with the greatest art and magnificence; and accordingly they made it after this manner: a long spear, plated over with gold, with a traverse piece at the top, in the form of a cross, to which was fastened a four square purple banner, embroidered with gold, and beset with precious stones, which reflected an amazing lustre: towards the top was depicted the emperor between his two sons: on the top of the shaft, above the cross, stood a crown, overlaid with gold and jewels, within which was placed the sacred symbol, namely the two first letters of Christ in Greek, X and P, struck one through the other: this device he afterwards bore not only upon his shields, but also upon his coins, many of which are still extant."

Afterwards engaging Maxentius, he defeated him, and entered the city of Rome in triumph. A law was now published in favour of the Christians, in which Licinius joined with Constantine, and a copy of it was sent to Maximus in the East. Maximus, who was a bigotted Pagan, greatly disliked the edict, but being afraid of Constantine, did not openly avow his disapprobation of it.

At length Maximus invaded the territories of Licinius, but being defeated, he was so mortified, that he put an end to his life by poison.

Licinius, as before observed, was not a real Christian in his heart, but rather affected to appear as such, through the dread of Constantine's power; for even after publishing several edicts in favour of the Christians, he took occasion to put to death Blase, bishop of Sebaste, several bishops and priests of Egypt and Lybia, who were cut to pieces, and thrown into the sea; and forty soldiers of the garrison of Sebaste, who suffered martyrdom by fire, and sealed their faith in the flames. These things offending Constantine the Great, he marched against Licinius, who was defeated by him, and afterwards slain by his own soldiers.

St. George, the tutelar saint and patron of England, was born in Cappadocia, of Christian parents, who brought him up according to the tenets of the gospel.

His father dying when he was young, he travelled with his mother into Palestine, which was her native country. Here she claimed a patrimonial estate, which afterwards descended to her son. St. George being strong, active, and of a great spirit, took up the profession of a soldier, and was made a tribune or colonel. In this post he exhibited great proofs of his courage, and was accordingly promoted in the army of the emperor Dioclesian. During the persecution, St. George threw up his command, went boldly to the senate-house, and avowed his being a Christian, taking occasion at the same time to remonstrate against Paganism, and point out the absurdity of worshipping idols. This freedom so greatly provoked the senate, that St. George was ordered to be tortured, which he underwent with great constancy, and without any change in his religious principles. Exasperated at his fortitude and resolution, he was by the emperor's orders dragged through the streets, and beheaded the next day.

The calendar commemorates his martyrdom on the 23d of April; many churches have been dedicated to him, and he is considered as the tutelar saint and patron of England. The order of the Garter, instituted by Edward the Third, is dedicated to the Holy Trinity, the Blessed Virgin, St. George, and St. Edward the Confessor. This saint is represented on horseback, tilting at a dragon, which is only allegorical, and implies that he had conquered the devil, or the dragon, by his faith in Christianity, and his fortitude in adhering thereto.

THE holy gospel having spread itself into Persia, the Pagan priests were greatly alarmed, and dreaded the loss of that influence they had hitherto maintained over the people's minds and properties. Hence they thought it expedient to complain to the emperor, that the Christians were enemies to the state, and held a treasonable correspondence with the Romans, the great enemies of Persia.

The emperor, who was naturally averse to Christianity, easily believed what was said against the Christians, and gave orders to persecute them in all parts of his empire. On account of this mandate many fell martyrs to the ignorance and ferocity of the Pagans, the sufferings of the most eminent of whom we shall here relate.

Simeon, archbishop of Seleucia, with many other ecclesiastics, to the number of an hundred and twenty-eight, were apprehended and accused of having betrayed the affairs of Persia to the Romans.

Now the emperor being greatly exasperated against them, ordered Simeon to be brought before him. The worthy archbishop coming into his presence, boldly acknowledged his faith, and nobly defended the cause of Christianity. The emperor, being offended at his freedom, not only reproved him for it, but ordered him to kneel before him, as he had always heretofore done.

To this Simeon answered, "That before, having the free admittance to his presence, he did not scruple to conform to the customary salutation of the country; but being now brought before him a prisoner, for the truth of his religion, and the sake of his God, it was not lawful for him to kneel, lest he should be thought to worship and to betray his faith, which he was fully resolved to defend with his last breath."

Whereupon the emperor told him; that if he did not kneel, he and all the Christians in his dominions, should be put to death; but Simeon rejected with disdain the proposal to kneel, and told him that he would abide the consequences. On this reply the emperor ordered him to be sent to prison till he had considered what punishment he should inflict.

Some short time after, Simeon, with his fellow-prisoners, was again examined, and commanded to worship the sun, agreeable to the Persian custom; but this they all unanimously refused. The emperor then sentenced them to be beheaded, and they were accordingly executed.

An aged eunuch, named Ustazares, who had been tutor to the emperor, and was in great estimation at court, on observing Simeon, the fore-mentioned martyr, leading to prison, saluted him. Simeon, however (as Ustazares had formerly been a Christian, and turned apostate from the faith to oblige the emperor) would not return his salute, but sharply reproved him for his apostacy. This so affected the eunuch, that he burst into tears, and exclaimed, "Ah! woe is me! how shall I hereafter look upon my God, whom I have denied, when Simeon, my old companion and familiar acquaintance, disdains to give me a gentle word, or to return my salute!"

When the emperor was told that his ancient tutor was greatly afflicted, he sent for him, and asked him whether he desired or wanted any thing which could be conferred upon, or procured for him. To which the eunuch replied, That there was nothing that he wanted, which this earth could afford; but that his grief was of another kind, and for which he justly mourned, namely, that that to oblige him he had denied his God, and had dissemblingly worshipped the sun, against his own conscience! for which, continued he, I am deserving of a double death, first, for denying of Christ, and secondly, for dissembling with my king; at the same time solemnly protesting, that he would never more forsake the Creator of the world, to worship the creatures which were made by him.

Upon this the emperor, greatly offended at the explanation of the cause of his grief, ordered Uthazares to be beheaded. While he was going to the place of execution, he desired that a messenger might be sent to the emperor, to request the favour that it might be proclaimed, "That Uthazares did not die a traitor for any crime against the king or the state; but only that being a Christian, he would not deny his God." This petition, we are informed, was granted, and accordingly performed; which was a great satisfaction to Uthazares, whose chief reason for desiring it was, because his falling off from Christ had caused many others to follow his example, who now hearing that he died for no crime but his religion, they might learn, like him, to return to Christ, and become fervent and constant in the faith. Uthazares, being thus satisfied, cheerfully yielded his neck to the stroke of the executioner, and received his crown of martyrdom with great joy!

After the above execution, on the Good Friday, an edict was published, to put to death all who confessed themselves Christians, on which occasion great multitudes suffered. About this time the empress of Persia falling sick, the sisters of Simeon, the archbishop, were accused by some of the magi, of being the occasion. This absurdity being believed, they were, by the emperor's order, sawed in quarters, and their quarters fixed upon poles, between which the empress passed as a charm to effect her recovery.

Acephimus, and many other clergymen were seized upon, and ordered to adore the sun; which refusing, they were scourged, and then tormented to death, or suffered to remain in prison till they expired.

Athalas, a priest, though not put to death, was so miserably racked, that his arms were rendered useless; and he was ever after obliged to be fed like a child. In fine, by this edict, above 16,000 either suffered miserably by torture, or lost their lives.

When Constantine the Great was informed of the persecutions in Persia, he was exceedingly concerned, and began to ruminate in what manner he should redress their grievances, when an ambassador arrived from the Persian emperor upon some political business.

This ambassador Constantine received civilly, granted his demands, and wrote a letter to the Persian monarch in favour of the Christians, in which he recounts the vengeance that had fallen on persecutors, and the great success that had attended those who had refrained from persecuting the Christians; and then referring to the tyrants and persecuting emperor of his own time, he said, "I subdued those solely by faith in Christ; for which God was my helper, who gave me victory in battle, and made me triumph over my enemies; and hath enlarged to me the bounds of the Romish empire, that it extends from the Western ocean, to almost the uttermost parts of the East: for which purpose I neither offered sacrifices to the ancient deities, nor made use of charm or divination, but only prayers to Almighty God, and followed the cross of Christ: and how glad should I be to hear that the throne of Persia flourished, by embracing the Christians! that so you with me, and they with you, may enjoy all the felicity your souls could desire, as no doubt but you would, as God, the Almighty Creator of all things, would become your protector and defender.

"These men I commend to your kingly honour; I commit them unto you, desiring you to embrace them according to your humanity; for in so doing, you shall procure to yourself grace through faith, and shall bestow on me a benefit worthy of my thanks."

By means of this the persecution ended during the life of Sapore; but it was again renewed under the lives of his successors; the following sufferers being the most principal.

Hormisdas, a Persian nobleman, on being convicted of professing Christianity, was ordered to attend the emperor's elephants naked. This ignominious task he performed for some time, when the emperor one day, looking out of a window which commanded the yard where the elephants were kept, saw Hormisdas, and perceived that he was prodigiously tamed. Determining to try him once more, he gave orders that a shirt should be put on him, and that he should be brought into his presence.

As soon as he came to the imperial throne, the emperor asked him if he would now deny Christ. On this question being put, Hormisdas tore off his shirt, and said, "If you think I will deny my faith for the sake of a shirt, take your gift again." The emperor, on hearing this expression, banished him from Persia; and he died in exile.

Suenes, a Christian nobleman, refusing to deny Christ, had his wife taken from him, and given to one of the meanest of the emperor's slaves; and what added to his mortification was, that he was ordered to wait upon his wife and the slave, which at length broke his heart, and he died.

Theodoret, a deacon, was imprisoned for the space of two years, and being released, was ordered not to preach the doctrine of Christ. Disregarding, however, the order, he did his utmost to propagate the gospel of Christ; for which being seized upon, he was miserably tormented, by having sharp reeds thrust under his nails; and then a knotty branch of a tree was forced up his body, and he expired in the most excruciating agony.

Bademus, a Christian of Mesopotamia, gave away his fortune to the poor, and determined to devote his life to religious retirement. This inoffensive Christian, together with seven others, were seized upon and cruelly tortured for being Christians, and above all for their charity. The seven Christians, who were apprehended with Bademus, received the crown of martyrdom, though the particular manner is not recorded: and Bademus himself, after having been four months in prison, was brought to the place of execution, and beheaded by Narses, an apostate Christian, who was ordered to act as the executioner of this worthy man, in order to convince the emperor that he was sincere in the renunciation of the truth.

ARIUS, a native of Lybia, and a priest of Alexandria, was the author of the Arian heresy, and in A. D. 318, began to publish his errors. He was condemned by a council of the Lybian and Egyptian bishops, and that sentence was confirmed by the council of Nice, A. D. 325. After the death of Constantine the Great, the Arians found means to ingratiate themselves into the favour of Constantius, his son and successor in the East; and hence a persecution was raised against the orthodox bishop and clergy. The celebrated Athanasius, and other bishops, were banished, and their sees filled with Arians.

Thirty bishops were martyred in Egypt and Lybia, and many other Christians cruelly tormented; and, A. D. 336, George, the Arian bishop of Alexandria, under the authority of the emperor, began a persecution in that city, and its environs, and carried it on with the most infernal severity. He was assisted in his diabolical malice by Catophonius, governor of Egypt; Sebastian, general of the Egyptian forces; Faustinus, the treasurer; and a Roman officer, named Heraclius.

So great was this persecution, that the clergy were driven from Alexandria, their churches were shut, and the severities practised by the Arian heretics were as great as those that had been practised by the Pagan idolaters. If a man accused of being a Christian, made his escape, then his whole family were massacred, and his effects forfeited.

Now the orthodox Christians, being deprived of all places places of public worship in the city of Alexandria, used to perform their devotions in a desert place at some distance from it. Assembling for this purpose on a Trinity-Sunday, George, the Arian bishop, engaged Sebastian, the general, to fall upon them with his soldiers, while they were at prayers. On this occasion several fell a sacrifice to the popular fury of the troops, and received the crown of martyrdom for no other offence than performing necessary acts of piety. The modes of cruelty were various, and the degrees different; for they were beaten over their faces till all their features were disfigured; then they were lashed with twigs of palm-trees newly cut, with such violence, that they expired under the blows, or by the mortification of the wounds and bruises.

Several, whose lives had been spared, were, however, banished to the deserts of Oasis, where they suffered unspeakable hardships; but their exile admitted of their indulgence of the most pious thoughts, and their sorrows were of a salutary nature.

Secundus, an orthodox priest, differing in point of doctrine from a prelate of the same name; the bishop, who had imbibed all the heretical opinions of Arianism, determined to put Secundus to death, for rejecting opinions which he had thought proper to embrace. Taking one Stephen with him, who was as much an Arian as himself, they sought out Secundus privately, and being unable to make him change his opinion, they fell upon and murdered him: when the holy martyr, just before he expired, called upon Christ to receive his soul, and to forgive his enemies.

Dissatisfied with the cruelties exercised upon the orthodox Christians in Alexandria, the principal persecutors applied to the emperor for an order to banish them from Egypt and Lybia, and to put their churches into possession of the Arians.

Having obtained their request, an order was sent for that purpose to Sebastian, the commander in chief of the Roman forces in those provinces.

When the general received the order, he signified the emperor's pleasure to all the sub-governors and officers, and commanded, that the mandate should be immediately put into execution. Hence a great number of the clergy were seized, and imprisoned for examination; when it appearing that they adopted the opinions of Athanasius, an order was signed for their banishment into the most wild, uncultivated, and desert places. Thus were the orthodox clergy used, and many of the laity were condemned to the mines, or compelled to work in the quarries. Some few indeed escaped to other countries, and several were weak enough to renounce their faith, in order to avoid the severities of the persecutors.

Paul, the bishop of Constantinople, was a Macedonian by birth, and was designed, from his birth, for a clerical life. When Alexander the predecessor of Paul was on his death bed, he was consulted by some of the clergy on the choice of a successor: when, we are informed, he told them, "That if they were disposed to choose a person of an exemplary life, unexceptionable character, and thoroughly capable of instructing the people, Paul was the man; who, though young, had all the prudence and gravity of more advanced age; but if they had rather have a person of a well-composed appearance, acquainted with worldly affairs, and fit for the conversation of a court, they might then choose Macedonius, who had all the proper qualifications." Macedonius was a deacon in the church of Constantinople, in which office he had spent many years, and gained great experience; and the dying prelate did both him and Paul justice in their different characters. Nevertheless the Arians, with their accustomed dissingenuousness, gave out, that Alexander had bestowed great commendations on Macedonius for sanctity, and had only given Paul the reputation of eloquence, and a capacity for business: it is true, indeed, he was a master in the art of speaking and persuading; but the sequel of his life and sufferings sufficiently evinced the absurdity of their deeming him a man formed for the world: for, after some struggle, the orthodox carried their point, and Paul was consecrated accordingly. However, Macedonius, being greatly offended at this preference, did his utmost to calumniate the new bishop, and was very severe upon his moral character; but not gaining any belief, he dropped the charge, and reconciled himself to Paul. This, however, was not the case with Eusebius of Nicomedia, who resumed the accusations under two heads, which were as follow:

1. "That he had led a disorderly life before his consecration.

2. "That he had been placed in the see of Constantinople without the consent of the bishops of Nicomedia and Heraclea, two metropolitans, who ought to have been consulted upon that occasion."

Eusebius, to support these accusations, procured the emperor's authority, by representing, that Paul having been chosen during the absence of Constantius, the imperial dignity had been insulted. This artifice succeeded, and Paul being deposed, Eusebius was placed in his stead.

Thus Paul having lost all his authority in the East, retired to the territories of Constantius, in the West, where he was well received by the orthodox prelates and clergy. At Rome he visited Athanasius, and assisted at a council held there, by Julius, the bishop of that see. Letters being written by this council to the eastern prelates, Paul returned to Constantinople, but was not restored to his bishopric till the death of Eusebius. The Arians, however, constituting Macedonius their bishop, by the title of bishop of Constantinople, a sedition, and a kind of civil war ensued, in which many were destroyed.

Constantius, the emperor, who was then at Antioch, hearing of these matters, laid the whole blame upon Paul, and ordered that he should be driven from Constantinople. Hermogenes, the officer who had received the emperor's order, attempted in vain to put it into execution; for the orthodox Christians rising in defence of Paul, Hermogenes was killed in a scuffle that consequently arose.

Now this transaction greatly exasperated the emperor, who left Antioch, though in the depth of winter, and immediately returned to Constantinople, with a design to punish the Christians severely. But their submission and entreaties softened him, and he contented himself with banishing Paul and suspending Macedonius.

Hereupon Paul retired again to the territories of Constantius, implored the protection of that emperor, and, by his intercession, was again vested in his see. On this occasion, we are informed, that "his re-establishment did but exasperate his enemies, who were at that time constantly employed, both in secret and open attempts against his life, against which the affections of his people were his only security; and being convinced that the emperor had no other motive for allowing his stay at Constantinople, but the dread of disobliging his brother, Paul could not think himself wholly restored to his bishopric, while things were in this situation; and being very much concerned at what the orthodox bishops suffered from the power and malice of the Arian faction, joined Athanasius, who was then in Italy, in soliciting a general council."

Accordingly a council was held at Sardica, in Illyrium, in the year 347, at which were present one hundred bishops of the western, and seventy-three of the eastern empire. But disagreeing in many points, the Arian bishops of the East retired to Philippolis, in Thrace; and forming a meeting there, they termed it the council of Sardica. From which place they pretended to issue out an excommunication against Julius, bishop of Rome; Paul, bishop of Constantinople; Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria; and several other prelates.

The emperor Constantius died, A. D. 350, which gave the Arians fresh courage, and they immediately applied to the emperor Constantius, who being an Arian in his heart, wrote an order to the præfect Philip, to remove Paul from the bishopric of Constantinople, and banish him again, to restore Macedonius.

Being

Being exiled to Cucucus, he was confined in a small, loathsome, dark dungeon, where he was kept six days without food, and then strangled. He met death with fortitude, as he was always perfectly resigned in misfortunes, and convinced of the vanity of this transitory world.

At this time, the Arian party prevailing, made Gregory of Cappadocia, a very obscure person, bishop of Alexandria, after having deposed Athanasius for his strict adherence to the orthodox faith. In the accomplishment of this affair, they were assisted by Philagerius, the governor of Egypt, who was an apostate, and who suffered them to commit all manner of outrages. Hence arming themselves with swords, clubs, &c. they broke into one of the principal churches of Alexandria, where great numbers of orthodox Christians were assembled at their devotions; and falling upon them in a most barbarous manner, without the least respect to sex or age, the principal part of them were destroyed.

A venerable bishop of Heraclea, named Potamo, who had formerly lost one of his eyes in Dioclesian's persecution, fell a martyr upon this occasion; being so cruelly scourged and beaten that his wounds occasioned his death.

Now the Arian mob broke into many places, public and private, under a pretence of searching for Athanasius, and committed innumerable butcheries and barbarities; robbing orphans, plundering the houses of widows, dragging devoted virgins to private places to be the sacrifices of lust; imprisoning the clergy, burning churches and dwelling-houses belonging to orthodox Christians, besides other enormous cruelties.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTION under JULIAN the Apostate.

JULIAN, the Apostate, as he was commonly called, was the son of Julius Constantius, and the nephew of Constantine the Great. He studied the rudiments of grammar under the inspection of Mardonius an eunuch, and an heathen of Constantinople. His father sent him some time after to Nicomedia, to be instructed in the Christian religion; by the bishop Eusebius, his kinsman; but his principles were corrupted by the pernicious doctrines of Maximus the magician, and Ecebolius the rhetorician.

In the year 361 Constantius died, and Julian succeeded him, and had no sooner attained the imperial dignity, than he renounced Christianity, and embraced Paganism, which had for some years fallen into great disrepute. He again restored idolatrous worship, by opening the several temples that had been shut up, rebuilding such as were destroyed, and ordering the magistrates and people to follow his example. He, however, made no public edicts against Christianity, but tried to do that privately which other emperors had done openly. He recalled all banished Pagans, allowed the free exercise of religion to every sect, but deprived all Christians of offices at court, in the magistracy, or in the army. He was chaste, temperate, vigilant, laborious, and seemingly pious, so that by his hypocrisy and pretended virtues he for a time did more mischief to Christianity, than the most profligate libertine of his predecessors. Thus he attempted to undermine Christianity by artifice instead of expelling it by force; and to make his measures the more effectual, he prohibited any Christian from keeping a school or public seminary of learning, and deprived all the Christian clergy of the privileges which Constantine the Great had granted them.

Accordingly, this persecution was more dangerous than any of the former, as Julian aimed to sap the foundations of Christianity, instead of attacking the superstructure; and under the mask of clemency, practised the greatest cruelty in wishing to delude many thousands of their true belief.

Thus the Christian faith was in more danger of being subverted than it ever had been before, by the means of a monarch, at once witty and wicked, learned and hypocritical; who, at first, made his attempts, not by the means of fire, sword, and poison, but by flattering gifts, and favours; not by using racks and tortures, but by bestowing offices and dignities; and then, by prohibiting Christian schools, he compelled the children of the gospel either to become idolators or remain illiterate.

Among other methods taken by Julian were, to order that Christians might be treated coldly upon all occasions, and in all parts of the empire, and to employ several witty persons to turn them, and their principles, into ridicule. Many were likewise martyred in his reign; for though he did not publicly persecute them himself, he connived at their being murdered by his governors and officers; and though he affected never to patronize them for their murders, he never offered to punish them for their delinquency. We shall recount the names, sufferings, and martyrdoms of such as have been transmitted to the present times, that their example may inspire fortitude, and their lives give to mankind in general a useful lesson.

First, by his opposition to Arianism, Basil made himself famous, which brought upon him the vengeance of the Arian bishop of Constantinople, who issued out an order to prevent his preaching. He continued, however, to perform his duty at Ancyra, the capital of Galatia. Enraged at his orthodox and manly proceeding, his enemies accused him of being an incendiary, and a disturber of the public peace; the monarch, however, was too intent on an expedition to Persia, to take notice of the accusation, and their malice at that time was wholly frustrated.

Now Basil continued to preach strenuously against the idolatry of Paganism on the one hand, and the errors of Arianism on the other: and earnestly exhorted the people to serve Christ, in the purity of faith, and fervency of truth. By this conduct, both heathens and Arians were exasperated against him, and appeared equally desirous of accomplishing his ruin.

One day meeting with a number of Pagans going in procession to a sacrifice, he boldly expressed his abhorrence of such idolatrous proceedings, and inveighed against such absurd worship, at once in a manly and decent manner. This freedom caused the people to seize him, and carry him before Saturninus, the governor, where they brought three accusations against him, viz. Reviling the gods, abusing the emperor, and disturbing the city's peace.

Having heard these accusations, which were equally malicious as groundless, Saturninus desired to know his sentiments from his own mouth; when finding him a strenuous Christian, he ordered him first to be put to the rack, and then committed to prison.

Hereupon the governor wrote an account of his proceedings to the emperor, who was at this time very busy in establishing the worship of Cybele, the fictitious mother of the fabulous deities. Julian, upon receiving the letter, sent Pagosus and Elpidius, two apostates, to Ancyra, the city where Basil was confined, to employ both promises and threats to engage him to renounce his faith, and in case of their failure, to give him up totally to the power of the governor; for it was the policy of Julian to appear all moderation and clemency, and to suffer others, as much as possible, to seem the ostensible persons in acts of cruelty. In this affair, however, a future circumstance made the emperor forego his usual policy, and sacrifice his affected mercy to his resentment and rage.

In vain the emperor's agents tampered with Basil by means of promises, threats, and racks; he was firm in the faith, and remained in prison to undergo some other sufferings when the emperor came to Ancyra by mere accident.

As soon as the people knew of Julian's approach, they met him in grand procession, and presented to him their idol, the goddess Hecate. The two agents then gave the emperor an account of what Basil had suffered, and how firm he had been. Julian, on this, determined to examine Basil himself, when that holy man being brought before him, the emperor did every thing thing in his power to dissuade him from persevering in the faith. Basil not only continued as firm as ever, but with a prophetic spirit, foretold the death of the emperor, and that he should be tormented in the other world.

Provoked at what he heard, Julian lost his usual affectation of clemency, and told Basil, in great anger, that though he had an inclination to pardon him at first, yet he had now put it out of his power to save his life, by the insolence of his behaviour. He then commanded, that the body of Basil should be torn every day in seven different parts, till his skin and flesh were entirely mangled. This inhuman sentence was executed with rigour, and the martyr expired under it's severities, A. D. 362, on the 28th day of June.

About the same time, Donatus, bishop of Arezzo, and Hilarinus, a hermit, suffered for the faith; the first being beheaded, and the latter scourged to death.

One Gordian, a Roman magistrate, having a Christian before him for examination, was so charmed with the confession of his faith, that he not only discharged the prisoner, but became himself a Christian. This so enraged the Roman præfect, that he ordered him to be scourged and beheaded; which sentence was in the year 362 executed.

Two brothers, named John and Paul, of a good family, and in high offices under the emperor; on being accused of professing Christianity, were deprived of their posts, and allowed ten days to consider, whether they would renounce their faith and be promoted, or retain their faith and be martyred? Making choice of the latter alternative, they were both, A. D. 362, beheaded.

Artemius, commander in chief of the Roman forces in Egypt, being a Christian, had two charges exhibited against him, by the Pagans, as follow:

1. That he had formerly demolished several idols in the reign of Constantine the Great.
2. That he had assisted the bishop of Alexandria in plundering the temples.

Julian, who was then at Antioch, on the exhibition of these charges, ordered the general to repair thither, in order to answer to them. On Artemius's arrival, he owned the charges, and his faith: when he was first deprived of his commission, then of his estate, and last of all beheaded.

One Cassian, a school-master of Imola, in the province of Romagna, for refusing to sacrifice to the idols, was hurried before the judge; who being apprized of his profession, and informed that many of the boys had an aversion to him on account of the strictness with which he kept them to their studies, determined that they should have permission to murder their master. He was accordingly delivered, with his hands tied behind him, to the boys, who fell upon him with rods, whips, sticks, and files, or the steel pencils which were then used in writing, and murdered him. This singular martyrdom happened A. D. 362, on the 13th of August.

Maximilian and Bonofus, two officers of the Herculean guards, upon Julian's taking away Constantine the Great's standard of the cross of Christ, threw up their commissions. Being apprehended on account of their faith, they were carried before the governor of the East, who commanded them to sacrifice to the gods, and obey the emperor's orders; but they replied, that as they were no longer his soldiers, but the soldiers of Christ, they would do neither. The governor then had them separately examined, and finding them as inflexible when asunder, as when together, he ordered Bonofus to be beaten with whips that had leaden bullets at the ends of the thongs, and Maximilian to be scourged also.

When remanded back to prison, they were allowed nothing but bread and water for subsistence, and the bread was marked with the seal of the emperor, the impression of which was an idol; on which account they refused to eat it. They were soon afterwards again examined, and then beheaded according to the sentence pronounced upon them.

Bibiana was the daughter of Flavian and Dafrosa, two Christians. Flavian, her father, held a considerable post under the government, but being banished for his faith, died in exile. Dafrosa, her mother, was, for the same reason, order to be starved; but Apronianus, governor of Rome, thinking her too long in dying, had her beheaded immediately.

Now Bibiana, and her sister Demetria, after the death of their parents, were stripped of all their effects, and being brought before the governor, were ordered to renounce their religion. Demetria suddenly dropped down dead in the governor's presence, and Bibiana resolutely refused to renounce her faith, on which account she was scourged to death, A. D. 362, on the 2d of Dec.

About the latter end of the year 363, the persecution raged dreadfully; but as many of the particulars have not been handed down to us, it is necessary to remark in general, that in Palestine many were burnt alive, others were dragged by their feet through the streets naked till they expired; some were scalded to death, many stoned, and great numbers had their brains beaten out with clubs. In Alexandria innumerable were the martyrs who suffered by the sword, burning, crucifixion, and being stoned. In Arethusa, several were ripped open, and corn being put into their bellies, swine were brought to feed therein, who, in devouring the grain, likewise devoured the entrails of the martyrs; and, in Thrace, Emilianus was burnt at a stake; and Domitius murdered in a cave, whither he had fled for concealment.

Likewise, Theodorus, for his faith, and singing the praises of God, was apprehended and put to the tortures of a martyr, though not to death. After being taken from the rack, he was asked how he could so patiently endure such exquisite tortures? To which he returned this remarkable reply: "At the first I felt some pain, but afterwards there appeared to stand by me a young man, who wiped the sweat from my face, and frequently refreshed me with cold water, which so delighted me, that I regretted being let down from the rack."

Marcus, bishop of Arethusa, having destroyed a Pagan temple in that city, erected a Christian church in it's room, on which account he was accused to Julian, the emperor, as a Christian. Being apprehended, his persecutors had no respect to his venerable person, but stripping him naked, most cruelly beat him. He was then thrust into a filthy jake, or sink, till he was almost suffocated; afterwards he was goaded with sharp pointed sticks; and lastly, he was hung up in a basket in the heat of the sun, after having been smeared all over with honey, in order to be tormented to death by wasps. As soon as he was hung up, they asked him if he would rebuild their temple? To which he answered, that he would neither rebuild it nor advance a single doit towards it's being rebuilt; upon which they left him, and he fell a martyr to the dreadful stings of those troublesome and tormenting insects.

Also Maxentius and Juventius, two Christian officers, were put to death for reproving the emperor, on account of his idolatries; but the manner of their deaths is not ascertained.

Now we shall enter upon some detached particulars necessary to be preserved, and finish this account with the conclusion of the persecutions under Julian the apostate.

When Julian intended an expedition against the Persians, he set a large fine upon every one who refused to sacrifice to the idols, and by that means got a great sum from the Christians towards defraying his expences.

Many of the officers in collecting these fines, exacted more than their due, and some of them tortured the Christians to make them pay what they demanded, at the same time telling them in derision, "that when they were injured, they ought to take it patiently, for so their God had commanded them."

The inhabitants of Cæsarea were fined three hundred weight of gold, and several of the clergy obliged to serve in the wars, as a punishment for having overthrown the temples of Jupiter, Fortune, and Apollo.

The governor at Meris, in Phrygia, having cleansed and opened a Pagan temple, the Christians in the night broke in, and demolished the idols. Next day the governor ordered all Christians that accidentally came in the way to be seized, that he might make examples of them, and by this means was going to execute several innocent innocent persons. But those who really perpetrated the fact, being too noble and just in their sentiments to suffer such an injustice, voluntarily delivered themselves up; when they were first of all scourged severely, and then put upon gridirons and broiled to death.

This wicked emperor, Julian the apostate, died of a wound which he received in his Persian expedition, A. D. 363, and even while expiring, uttered the most horrid blasphemies. He was succeeded by Jovian, who restored peace to the church.

Valentinian, after the decease of Jovian, succeeded to the empire, and associated to himself Valens, who had the command in the East.

This Valens was a great favourer of Arianism, and so censured against the Christians, that he ordered, on a certain day, all of them in Edessa to be slain, while they were at their devotions in their churches. The officers, however, being more compassionate than the emperor, privately gave notice to the Christians not to assemble on the day appointed, so that they might escape death, and themselves be excused for non-performance of duty.

Most gratefully the Christians thanked the officers for their advice, but disregarded both that and the emperor's menaces, sooner than they would neglect their duty. They accordingly repaired to church, and the troops being compelled, by the positiveness of the command, were put in motion to destroy them. As they marched along, a woman, with a child in her arms, broke through the ranks, when the officer ordered her to be brought before him, and asked her whither she was going? She replied, to church, whither others were making all the haste they could. "Have ye not heard, says the officer, of the emperor's order, to put to death all who are found there?" "I have, said she, and for that cause I make the more haste." "And whither, said the officer, do you lead that child?" "I take him, replied she, with me, that he also may be reckoned in the number of the martyrs." Upon this the humane officer returned to the emperor, and told him that all the Christians were prepared to die in defence of their faith, and represented to him how rash it would be to murder so great a multitude, and entreated the emperor to drop the design, at least for the present, with which he at length complied.

Urbanus, Menedemus, and Theodorus, with several other orthodox clergymen, to the number of fourscore, at Constantinople, petitioned the emperor, in a most humble manner, to relieve them from the oppressions, persecutions, and cruelties of the Arians. But the tyrant, instead of redressing their grievances, ordered them all to be embarked in a ship, and the ship set fire to; when this infernal and inhuman order being executed, they all perished in the flames.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS of the CHRISTIANS by the GOTHs, &c.

SEVERAL Scythian Goths having embraced Christianity about the time of Constantine the Great, the light of the gospel spread itself considerably in Scythia, though the two kings who ruled that country, and the majority of the people, continued Pagans. Fritigern, king of the West Goths, was an ally to the Romans; but Athanarick, king of the East Goths, was at war with them. The Christians, in the dominions of the former, lived unmolested, but the latter, having been defeated by the Romans, wreaked his vengeance on his Christian people.

One Sabas, a worthy Christian, upon this occasion, was one who felt the enraged king's misplaced resentment. Sabas was humble and humane, mild and modest, yet fervent in worship, and zealous for the advancement of the church. Remarkable for his contempt of riches, and singular in shunning every sensual enjoyment; the sanctity of his life, and the purity of his manners were such, as gave the greatest force to his doctrines. He convinced the rational, and confounded the obdurate: hence he became, at once, famous for his doctrines and piety.

In the year 370, Athanarick gave orders, that all persons in his dominions should sacrifice to the Pagan deities, and eat the meat which had been offered to the idols, or be put to death for disobedience. Some humane Pagans, who had Christian relations, endeavoured to save them by offering them meat which had not received the idolatrous consecration, while the magistrates were to be imposed on, and made to believe that all had been done according to their direction. But Sabas too well knew St. Paul's principles, to imagine that the sin lay in eating: he knew that scandalizing the weak, and giving the enemies of the faith an advantage over them, was all that made that action criminal in Christians, neither of which consequences would have been avoided by this disguise. He not only refused to comply with what was proposed to him, but publicly declared, that those who sheltered themselves under that artifice, were not true and faithful Christians.

Soon after, Sabas was apprehended on account of his faith, and carried before a magistrate, who inquired into his fortune and circumstances. Finding that what he had upon his back was the principal part of what he possessed, he was dismissed as a person of little or no consequence.

Now Sabas went to spend the ensuing Easter with Sanfala, a Christian priest of great piety: they lived in great tranquillity for three days, but on the third night they were both seized by a party of soldiers. The priest was allowed to dress himself, and to ride, but Sabas was obliged to leave his clothes behind him, and to walk; and, during the journey, they drove him through thorns and briars, beating him with great violence almost continually. This cruelty he bore without a single murmur, and in the evening they extended him between two beams, fastening his legs to the one and his arms to the other; and in that posture left him for the night, while they retired to repose. The woman of the house, however, hearing how ill he had been used, went and released him; but though he was now at liberty, and his persecutors asleep, he did not avail himself of the opportunity to make his escape.

On the next morning the persecutors began to practise on these two worthy Christians; and tampered with them to renounce their religion, and eat the meat consecrated to the idols. This, however, they jointly refused, and positively declared, that they were ready to meet the most cruel death, rather than comply with such detestable idolatry. Sanfala was at length discharged, and Sabas ordered to be drowned; which sentence was put into execution, A. D. 372, on the 12th of April.

Nicetas was of a Gothic extraction, born near the banks of the Danube, and though he had been long a Christian he never met with any molestation on that account, till the above-mentioned persecution began by Athanarick. That monarch ordered an idol to be drawn about on a chariot, through all the places where the Christians lived: the chariot stopped at the door of every one who professed the gospel, and the Christian inhabitants were ordered to pay it adoration. Upon a refusal, the house was immediately set on fire, and all within were burnt. This was the case with Nicetas, who on account of his religion, refusing to pay the respect demanded to the idol, had his house burnt, and himself consumed in it, A. D. 372, September 15.

The great Eusebius, bishop of Samosata, makes a most distinguished figure in ecclesiastical history, and was one of the most eminent champions of Christ against the Arian heresy. The Arians having advanced Miletas to the see of Antioch, thinking him of their party, the instrument of his advancement was placed in the care of Eusebius. When Miletus preached his first sermon, the Arians, to their great surprise, found they had been greatly mistaken in him, for his doctrines were orthodox and pure.

Provoked at their disappointment, they persuaded the emperor to displace him, and likewise to get the instrument out of the hands of Eusebius. Miletus was accordingly deposed, and the emperor sent to Eusebius to deliver the instrument. Eusebius's answer was that he could not give up a trust reposed in him by so great a number, without the express consent of all concerned in it. The emperor, incensed at this reply, wrote to him on that that subject, and assured him he had commissioned the bearer of the letter to cut off his right hand, if he refused to surrender the instrument in question; which threat was artfully added only to awe him into a compliance. Eusebius, however, knew the party was capable of any cruelty to promote their cause; but, without the least emotion, offered his hands, and declared he would lose them both rather than part with so flagrant a proof of Arian injustice. The emperor could not but be surprised at his resolution, and professed a high esteem for him ever after: so true it is that virtue can sometimes force even its declared enemies to love and admire it.

From this time the Arians looked upon Eusebius as a most dangerous enemy. At the time Jovian restored peace to the church, Miletus convened a council at Antioch, which consisted of Eusebius, and twenty-five other prelates, who unanimously confirmed the doctrines of the council of Nice.

The see of Cæsarea having become vacant, Eusebius was greatly instrumental in promoting Basil to it, on which occasion Gregory the younger calls him, "The pillar of truth, the light of the world, the fortress of the church, the rule of faith, the support of the faithful, and an instrument in the hands of God for bestowing favours on his people." When the Arians were the most vigilant to propagate their heresy, Eusebius was exceedingly assiduous in taking measures to prevent their success; and his zeal was always so governed by the rules of prudence, that his attempts seldom failed of success. It was not enough for our excellent prelate to screen his own flock from the insults of the common enemy, and maintain the faith in its purity against all the endeavours of such as would corrupt the people; but knowing that several churches were, by the iniquity of the times, deprived of their pastors, he disguised himself; and thus made the tour of Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine; fortified the pure against the solicitations of the heretics; ordained several priests and inferior ministers, wherever they were wanting; and, when he found any orthodox prelates in his travels, assisted them in consecrating bishops for the use of the widowed churches. It was impossible to conceal the hand that every day gave some fresh stroke to the Arian party, and sunk their interest wherever it was employed; so that the emperor, at their instigation, granted an order for banishing him into Thrace. He was at Samolatta when the messenger came with this commission; it was late in the evening; and Eusebius, who was very well beloved by his people, begged he would make no noise, but conceal his business; "for, says he, if it takes air, the people will fall on you, throw you into the river, and then I shall be charged with your death." Eusebius was calm enough to go through his usual devotions, and when the night was far advanced he left his house on foot, attended only by one trusty servant, who carried a pillow and one book after him. Thus accommodated he took a boat, and went to Zeugma, about seventy miles down the river.

However, the people next day, missing Eusebius, and hearing which way he was gone, followed in a great number of boats, and overtaking would have rescued him, at the same time entreating him with tears in their eyes not to abandon them thus.

This cordiality affected Eusebius very much, but he said he must go according to the emperor's order, putting them in mind of the authority of St. Paul, for paying a due reverence and proper submission to the civil power. Finding they could not prevail, they accommodated him with every thing that could comfort him in his journey, and then left him to pursue his way according to his inclination.

About this time Thrace was a scene of confusion, by means of the war carried on between the Goths and the emperor's forces; and in these contests, the life of Eusebius was frequently in danger. The emperor, in order to terminate the war with the greater expedition, resolved to march against the Goths in person; but first to engage the prayers of the Christians, he gave peace to the church of Christ, and allowed the orthodox prelates to return to their churches. Thus was Eusebius restored to his see, which however he did not long enjoy, for an Arian woman threw a tile at him from the top of a house, which fractured his skull, and, in the year 380, terminated his life.

There was now Marcellus, bishop of Apamea, a prelate of great merit, who was very active in attempting to suppress idolatry in his own diocese, on which account his life was in continual danger, till Cynegius, the præfect, arrived with a considerable body of troops, which kept the Pagans in awe. This officer's design was totally to abolish idolatry, to effect which he determined to destroy the temple of Jupiter; he however found this a more difficult attempt than he had imagined, for the building was so strong, the stones so unwieldy, the cement so durable, and the iron cramps so massy, that he despaired of being able to accomplish the work; when a poor labouring Christian, recommended by Marcellus, undertook to go through with what the præfect had given up, and the business was executed according to the following method.

First of all, this person examined the situation of the edifice, and finding it surrounded by a gallery, supported by stately pillars, ten yards in circumference, he judged it would be more to his purpose to weaken the foundation than pretend to attack the body of the building directly; with this view he dug at the bottom of the said pillars, and shored them with timber beams. When he had thus undermined three of the most considerable pillars, he set fire to the wood, which burning asunder, the pillars fell, and drew twelve more with them, and brought down one whole side of the building; upon which the people flocked together from all parts of the town, and praised God, who had thus triumphed over his enemies.

Now the bishop and præfect continued destroying a great number of idol temples, when being at a town called Aulo upon this business, while the troops were busy in demolishing the buildings, some Pagans privately seized upon the bishop, and burnt him, A. D. 393.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS of the CHRISTIANS under the ARIAN VANDALS.

THE Arian Vandals passing from Spain to Africa in the fifth century, under their leader Genferic, committed the most unheard-of cruelties. They persecuted the Christians wherever they came, and even laid waste the country as they passed, that the Christians left behind, who had escaped them, might not be able to live for want of sustenance. They plundered the churches, and murdered the bishops and ministers by a variety of tortures. In particular, they poured stinking oil and vinegar down the throats of some till they expired; suffocated others by filling their mouths with mud, and martyred many by stretching their limbs with cords till the veins burst, and sinews cracked. They also wreaked their vengeance on several of the clergy and nobility, whom they loaded with heavy burdens; and obliged them to carry their baggage; and if they did not travel fast enough, they pricked them on with sharp goads, insomuch that several died under their burdens. Reverend grey hairs found no instances of mercy, and guiltless infants felt the rage of their barbarity. Stately buildings were burned or levelled with the earth; and the chief churches in Carthage employed in their own heretical worship, or put to profane uses; and where any castles held out against them, they brought great numbers of Christians, and slew them, leaving their dead bodies lying under the walls, that the besieged might be forced to surrender on account of the offensive stench thereof.

When they had seized and plundered the city of Carthage, they put the bishop, and all the clergy, into a leaky ship, and committed it to the mercy of the waves, thinking that they must all perish of course; but the vessel arrived safe at Naples through the Divine Providence.

Several orthodox Christians were beaten, scourged, and banished to Capsur, where it pleased God to make them the means of converting many of the Moors to Christianity;

Christianity; but this coming to the ears of Genferic, he sent orders, that they and their new converts should be tied by the feet to chariots, and dragged about till they were dashed in piecemeal.

Pampinian, the bishop of Mansuetes, was tortured to death with plates of hot iron; the bishop of Urice was burnt; the bishop of Habenfa was banished, for refusing to deliver up the sacred books which were in his possession; and a whole congregation, who were assembled in a church at their devotions, together with the clergyman who was preaching to them, were murdered by these barbarians breaking in upon them, and exercising the most indiscriminate cruelties.

Genferic, the Vandalian tyrant, having made an expedition into Italy, and plundered the city of Rome, returned to Africa, flushed with the success of his arms. The Arians took this occasion to persuade him to persecute the orthodox Christians, as they assured him that they were stable friends to the people of Rome.

Likewise, Armogastus felt the rage of this persecution; Victor, the learned bishop of Vita, who was personally acquainted with Armogastus, and who likewise wrote the history of this persecution, informs us, that "his legs were tied, and his forehead bound with cords several times; which, though applied with no gentle hand, made not the least impression on his flesh, nor left any mark on his skin. After this, he was hung up by one foot; but in that posture seemed as much at his ease as if reposed on a soft bed. Theodoric, one of the king's sons, finding all attempts on his life had hitherto proved unsuccessful, ordered his head to be struck off. But Jecundus, an Arian priest, dissuaded him from that resolution, by telling him it would be much better to destroy him by slow and imperceptible means, and wear him out by degrees; whereas a violent death would procure him the reputation of a martyr among those of his own opinion, which could be of no service to the opposite cause. The prince sent him to the mines, and some time after removed him to a place near Carthage, where he was employed in looking after cattle. While Armogastus was thus engaged, he grew exceeding ill, and imagining that the end of his labours was near, he communicated his thoughts to Felix, a virtuous Christian, employed in that prince's service. From him he received some consolation; but his disorder increasing daily soon deprived him of life, and he was buried by Felix according to his own desire."

There was a devout Christian, Archinimus, upon whom all manner of artifices were employed in vain, to make him renounce his faith. At length Genferic himself undertook to persuade him, but finding his endeavours ineffectual, he passed sentence upon him to be beheaded. He, however, privately ordered the executioner to really perform his office, if the prisoner seemed intimidated and afraid; "for then (said he) the crown of martyrdom will be lost to him; but if he seems courageous, and willing to die (continued the king) strike not the stroke, for I do not intend that he shall have the honour of being deemed a martyr." The executioner, when they came to the place appointed, finding Archinimus resolved, and happy in the thought of dying for the sake of Christ, brought him back again unhurt. He was soon after this banished, and never heard of more, though it is conjectured that he was murdered privately by the king's order, as he thought the glory of dying publicly for the faith too great an honour.

Eugenius, bishop of Carthage, was eminent for his learning and piety, which brought upon him the hatred of the Arians in general, who took great pains to set the king Huneric against him and the orthodox Christians. In this infamous desire they succeeded but too well, for he banished above five thousand into a dreadful desert, where many perished through hunger, or the inclemency of the weather. Being bent on persecuting the whole body of the orthodox Christians, he sent an edict to Eugenius, which he commanded that he should read in the cathedral on Ascension-Day, A. D. 483.

By this edict it was ordered that all the orthodox bishops should meet at Carthage on the first of the ensuing February, for the purpose of disputing with the Arian prelates; the king's stratagem evidently appeared to Eugenius, and several other bishops, particularly to Victor, bishop of Vita, the learned author of the original account of this persecution; for they well knew that he artfully meant to establish Arianism under the appearance of justice and candour.

They determined, after a considerable deliberation, to send a petition to the king; which was written by Eugenius accordingly, and presented by a person who had great interest at court. The substance of this petition was, that the African prelates did not decline the proposed conference out of a sense of the weakness of their cause, or a distrust of their own abilities to maintain the orthodox faith; but as the whole church was concerned in the dispute, they were of opinion that they could not engage in it without the bishops of Europe and Asia. To this Huneric replied, that what they desired was impossible, unless the whole world was in his hands. Upon which Eugenius desired his majesty would be pleased to write to Odoacer, king of Italy, and other princes in his interest; and allow him to send to the bishops, that the common faith might be thus authentically published.

But the king, disregarding this remonstrance, insisted upon being obeyed, and then, previous to the time appointed, very artfully took an occasion to banish several of the most able and learned orthodox prelates, on various pretences; that the cause of truth might be weakened, and the Arians have the greater advantage.

At the appointed time for the conference, the orthodox clergy chose ten of their number to act in the name of the rest. Cyrilla, an Arian, took the style of patriarch upon the occasion, and was seated on a magnificent throne. The Arian prelates were allowed to sit near him, but the orthodox bishops were obliged to stand. They complained of this partial mode of behaviour, as an evident infringement of their liberty; on which the Arians took occasion to abuse them in a most illiberal manner. Eugenius, perceiving that they did not intend to come to any candid decision, proposed to adjourn to some future day; but instead of complying with this, each orthodox prelate, by the king's order, as Cyrilla asserted, received an hundred blows with a stick. Eugenius protested against such violence, but in vain; the prelates were turned out of the place unheard, their churches were shut up, and the revenues of their bishoprics were seized.

Immediately after they were compelled to quit Carthage, when they lay without the walls of that city, exposed to all the inclemencies of the open air. The king passing out of one of the gates, the orthodox clergy presented themselves before him, and modestly complained of the treatment they had met with.

Instead of redressing their grievances, Huneric ordered his guards to fall on them, and chastise them for their insolence, as he termed it. The soldiers complied with the tyrant's request, and treated them as unmercifully as he could wish. The king ordered them to appear on a certain day at a place which he then fixed.

Accordingly, at the time appointed, they assembled on the spot, when one of the king's officers shewed them a folded paper, and informed them that the king was inclined to forget what was past, and to restore them to their livings, provided they would swear to the truth of what that paper contained. The prelates, surprised at this unreasonable proposal, declared that they could not in conscience think of swearing to the truth of that to which they were total strangers. But if they were suffered to read the writing, and approved of the contents, they would take the oath with readiness.

But the officer replied, that was unnecessary; for he would tell them the contents, which were not of a religious but of a political nature, and only required them to swear that they were willing prince Hilderic should succeed his father in the throne. Several of the prelates innocently thinking that there could be no harm in swearing they were willing a son should succeed his father, as that was but a piece of natural justice, offered to comply. But the rest, with greater precaution, and well knowing the Arian wiles, refused to take the oath, as they justly judged so simple a proposal would never have been made them, unless some deep artifice was underneath concealed.

As they were disagreeing upon this head, the officer took an advantage of their discord, and committed them to separate prisons, those who were willing to swear to one, and those who were unwilling to another. They had not been long in confinement before the mystery was unravelled, and the whole artifice explained by an order from the king for the banishment of both parties. Those who had been willing to swear were banished, under the pretence of offering to break an established precept of the Scripture, viz. "Swear not at all," Matt. v. 34. And those who had refused to swear, were banished as enemies to the legal succession. Thus did the crafty Arians accomplish the ruin of the prelates, by wresting a text of the gospel to a wrong sense, and putting a piece of political sophistry to an improper use. The former were obliged to work as slaves in distant colonies, and the latter were sent to the island of Corsica to cut timber. Tripoli was the place to which Eugenius was banished; where Anthony, a violent Arian bishop, threw him into a loathsome dungeon, and made him suffer every hardship that cruelty could devise, in order to destroy him by a lingering death. The dampness of the place gave Eugenius the palsy, which Anthony hearing of went to the gaol, and finding him in a very weak condition laying on the floor, he poured some strong vinegar down his throat, with a design to have choked him. It had, however, a contrary effect; for instead of suffocating, it promoted an immediate and copious perspiration, which was essentially serviceable in curing his palsy, and restoring him to perfect health.

Upon the decease of Huneric, his successor recalled Eugenius, and the rest of the orthodox clergy; the Arians taking the alarm, persuaded him to banish them again, which he complied with, when Eugenius, being exiled to Languedoc in France, died there of the hardships he underwent, on the 6th of September, in the year 505.

A lady of fortune, and a widow, named Dionysia, being apprehended as an orthodox Christian, was stripped naked, and exposed in a most indecent manner, and severely scourged. Her son, a young lad, being seized at the same time, seemed afraid of the torture, and looked pitifully at his mother, who ordered him not to fear any torments that could be inflicted on him, but to be constant to the faith in which she had brought him up. When he was upon the rack, she again comforted him with words to the following effect.

"Remember, O my child, that we were baptized in the name of the ever sacred Trinity, let us not lose the benefit thereof, lest it should be hereafter said, cast them into outer darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth: for that pain which never endeth is indeed to be dreaded, and that life which endureth to eternity to be desired." Whereupon the youth patiently persevered, and from the force of his torments resigned his soul to him that made it.

With pious satisfaction the mother saw the death of her son, and soon after herself received the crown of martyrdom.

Cyrilla, the Arian bishop of Carthage, was a most furious heretic, and a very great enemy to those Christians who professed the faith in its purity. Having gained the ear of the king, he persuaded him that he could never expect prosperity in his undertakings, or hope to enjoy his kingdom in peace, while he suffered any of the orthodox Christians to remain.

Hereupon this weak monarch, believing all that Cyrilla told him, sent for several of the most eminent Christians, who were particularly obnoxious to that prelate. He, at first, attempted to draw them from their faith by flattery, and to bribe them from the hopes of future salvation, by the promise of immediate worldly rewards. Being firm and constant in their faith, they were proof against the former, and despised the latter; declaring resolutely against Arianism, and saying, we acknowledge but one Lord, one faith, and one baptism; you may therefore do whatever you please with our bodies, for it is better that we should suffer a few temporary pains, than to endure everlasting misery.

The king was greatly exasperated at this freedom, sent them to a filthy dark dungeon, and ordered them to be put into irons. The keeper, however, not being of the savage disposition too common to such as are intrusted with the care of gaols, suffered their friends to have access to them; by which they received great consolation, and became daily more and more confirmed in their resolution of dying for the sake of their Redeemer.

But the king having heard of the indulgence given them by their keeper, was exceedingly angry, and sent orders that they should be more closely confined, and loaded with still heavier fetters. He then began to ruminate in his mind by what means he should put them to death, and after revolving over and over all the modes of cruelty that he could recollect, at length determined to imitate the monstrous barbarity of the emperor Valens, who, as we have already related, caused fourscore clergymen to be burnt together in a ship. Fixing upon this infernal precedent, he ordered these Christians to be put on board a ship filled with combustible materials, and the vessel being set fire to, they received the crown of martyrdom. The names of seven of the principal of these Christians were, Rusticus, Severus, Liberatus, Rogatus, Servus, Septimus, and Boniface.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS from about the Middle of the Fifth, to the Conclusion of the Seventh Century.

PROTERIUS was made a priest by Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, who was well acquainted with his virtues before he appointed him to preach. On the death of Cyril, the see of Alexandria was filled by Dioscorus, an inveterate enemy both to the memory and family of his predecessor. Dioscorus, however, knowing the reputation of Proterius, and his great interest, did the utmost in his power to gain his confidence and favour; as he thought he might be of singular service to him in carrying on his evil intentions.

However, Proterius was not to be corrupted, the welfare of the church sat next his heart, and no prospect of worldly preferment could bribe him to forego his duty and honest designs.

Now Dioscorus being condemned by the council of Chalcedon for having embraced the errors of Eutyches, was deposed, and Proterius chosen to fill the vacant see, and approved of by the emperor. This occasioned a dangerous insurrection, for the city of Alexandria was divided into two factions; the one to espouse the cause of the old, and the other of the new prelate. A great deal of mischief was done on both sides, and Proterius was in the most imminent personal danger, from a set of schismatics who would neither obey the decisions of a council nor the emperor's commands.

These disorders becoming serious, the governor of Thebais marched at the head of a body of troops, in order to quell the sedition. The people, however, had worked up their imaginations to a kind of phrenzy; when they heard of the approach of the governor, they armed themselves, marched out of Alexandria, gave him battle, and defeated him. The intelligence of this affair so exasperated the emperor, that he sent a detachment of two thousand men against them; the appearance of whom, and the prudence of the governor of Alexandria, whose name was Florus, soon restored the city to peace and tranquillity.

However, the discontented party still beheld Proterius with an eye of resentment; so that he was obliged to have a guard out of respect to his personal safety, and at length, though naturally of a sweet and mild temper, was compelled to excommunicate some of them, and obtain their banishment from Alexandria. Ecclesiastical history, however, informs us, that, "When the emperor Marcian's death, which happened two years after, gave a new turn to affairs, the exiles returned to Alexandria, engaged in their usual cabals against Proterius, and seemed resolved to be revenged on him for what they had suffered in the last reign. Timothy, a priest, who was at the head of all the designs that had been formed against Proterius, employed every art to ruin his credit, drawing the people from his communion, and raising himself to that see. At last, taking the advantage of the absence of Dionysius, who commanded the forces of that province, and was then in the Upper Egypt, he seized on the great church, and was uncanonically and sacrilegiously consecrated by two bishops of his faction, that had been deposed for heresy. The usurper went on in the exercise of all the episcopal functions, and used the whole rigour of his pretended authority to oppress the orthodox, till the commander's return, who, upon hearing the disorders that had been committed, and that Timothy was the chief author of them, drove that incendiary out of the town."

Marcian's

Now this affair so enraged the Eutychians, that they determined to wreak their vengeance on Proterius, who fled to the church for sanctuary: but on Good-Friday, A. D. 457, a large body of them rushed into the church, and barbarously murdered the prelate; after which they dragged the body through the streets, insulted it, cut it to pieces, burnt it, and scattered the ashes all about.

A Carthaginian lady, named Julia, was taken prisoner when the Vandals sacked that city. After being sold and resold as a slave, she became the property of a Syrian Pagan, named Eusebius. Her master could not but admire a religion which inspired such resignation and patience in vassalage, and the most painful employments: thus it is plain, that the humility and purity prescribed by Christianity will attract even the admiration of heathens and idolaters.

Julia's master frequently took her with him upon his voyages: in one of these they touched upon the island of Corsica, where Eusebius joined in an idolatrous festival; but Julia kept at a distance from it.

Of this conduct the heathens complained, as disrespectful to their gods, and informed the governor Felix of it, who sent for Eusebius, and demanded what young woman it was that had refused to join in worship to the gods with the rest?

To this Eusebius replied, that the young woman was a Christian, and that all his authority over her had proved too weak to prevail with her to renounce her religion; but that, as she was a very diligent and faithful servant, he could not think of a separation.

But Felix pressed him to exert himself on this occasion, and either to oblige her to assist at the Pagan worship, or to part with her; and offered to give him his own price, or four of his best female slaves in exchange for her, which Eusebius absolutely refused, saying, that he would not part from her on any consideration.

When Felix found the master inflexible, he determined to get her into his power by artifice. To effect this, he invited Eusebius to an entertainment, and having intoxicated him, he sent for Julia in the name of her master.

Julia, the innocent slave, not suspecting the trap laid for her, came immediately, when the governor told her that he would procure her liberty, if she would sacrifice to the heathen gods. To which Julia replied, that while she was permitted to enjoy her religion, she was as free as her heart could wish.

Now Felix, not being able to prevail, ordered her to be severely beaten, which she bore with the utmost patience. Finding her still resolute, he commanded, that the hair of her head should be pulled up by the roots. This barbarity having no greater effect than the former, he sentenced her to be hanged, which sentence was put into execution immediately.

Scarcely was Julia dead when Eusebius recovered from his intoxication. As soon as he understood what had passed, he was greatly afflicted, and in the first transports of his resentment had thoughts of complaining to the emperor, who being a Christian, would have punished the perfidy of the governor. But reflecting again, that Felix had only acted with a zeal for the deities he himself adored, he determined to put up with the loss, and retire from a place which was become now so truly disagreeable.

Hermenigildus was a Gothic prince, being the eldest son of Leovigildus, king of the Goths, in Spain. This prince, who was originally an Arian, became a convert to the orthodox faith, by means of his wife Ingonda. When the king heard that his son had changed his religious sentiments, he stripped him of the command at Seville, where he was governor, and threatened to put him to death, unless he renounced the faith he had embraced so lately.

In order to prevent the execution of his father's menaces, the prince began to put himself into a posture of defence; and many of the orthodox persuasion in Spain declared for him. The king, exasperated at this act of rebellion, began to punish all the orthodox Christians who could be seized by his troops; and thus a very severe persecution commenced: he likewise marched against his son at the head of a very powerful army. The prince, knowing that he was unable to oppose the formidable force that his father was bringing against him, implored the assistance of the Roman troops that were left to garrison those parts of Spain, which the emperor still possessed. The Roman commander engaged to assist Hermenigildus, but being bribed by the king he broke his promise. Leovigildus then made it his business, as much as possible, to detach the orthodox Christians from the interest of his son; and in this he had great success, for it was effected in 581, by convening the Arian prelates at Toledo, who abolished the practice of re-baptizing those that came over to their sect, and drew up a captious profession of faith, which deceived many, and prevailed upon them to quit the interest of Hermenigildus.

Thus forsaken by numbers of those whom he most confided in, the prince was obliged to retreat towards Seville, in which city he soon after shut himself up, and sent to Constantinople for assistance from the emperor. The death of that monarch, however, prevented him from receiving any relief; for Maurice, who succeeded him, found his own hands too full to afford any succour to Hermenigildus. The king, who had information of every step which his son took, proceeded to Seville, and laid siege to it. The prince defended the place with great bravery, and even held out for the space of twelve months; but finding that the city must soon be taken, he privately made his escape, and fled to the Roman troops to beg protection. Being informed that they intended to give him up, he precipitately retired to Corduba, and from thence went to Asseto, which he fortified and prepared for his defence.

Upon the escape of the prince from Seville that city surrendered, and the king having properly garrisoned it, pursued his son, laid siege to Asseto, and soon obliged it to surrender. The unfortunate prince being driven to this distress, flew to a church for sanctuary. The king having too much respect for the sanctity of the place to force him from it, sent an officer, named Reccaredus, to assure him of his pardon, upon his submitting to ask it. The prince believing his father to be sincere, immediately went to him, and threw himself most submissively at his feet. The king, however, instead of forgiving him, loaded him with chains, and carried him to Seville, where he endeavoured to make him renounce the orthodox faith both by promises and menaces.

But the prince remained constant to the truth; and at the feast of Easter, when the king sent an Arian bishop to him to administer the eucharist, Hermenigildus absolutely refused to receive it, which so enraged the king, that before he gave himself time to reflect, he ordered some of his guards to go and cut the prince to pieces, which they punctually performed, A. D. 586, on the 13th of April.

Anastasius, a Persian, was brought up a Pagan, and bore arms as a soldier under Cosroes, king of Persia, at the time that monarch plundered Jerusalem; and, among other things, carried off the very cross on which Christ was crucified. Anastasius could not imagine why the the Christians had such a veneration for a person who had died so mean a death as that of being crucified; for that mode of death was, by the Persians, held in the greatest contempt, and none but the very lowest and most despicable malefactors were executed in that manner. Applying to some Christian captives, he was instructed in the whole Christian mystery, and being charmed with the purity of a faith which inspired such fortitude, he left the army, and retired to Syria: here he learned the trade of a goldsmith, and then going to Jerusalem, he supported himself by that business; was baptized by Modestus, vicar-general of Jerusalem; and staid a week with his godfather Elias.

As soon as that time was over, and he was now to quit the white clothes which he wore at his baptism, according to the then practice of the church, he desired the priest would put him in a way of renouncing the world entirely, and fulfilling the obligations of his profession without interruption. Elias recommended him to Justin, abbot of a seminary four miles from Jerusalem, who employed a proper person to instruct him in the Greek tongue, and teach him the Psalms; and then admitted him into his religious community. Anastasius passed seven years in that house, where he divided his time between the most humble domestic employments, and the truly Christian entertainments of the word of God, the lives of the fathers, and the acts of the martyrs. He was most sensibly affected with those monuments of Pagan barbarity, and Christian courage; and conceived a strong desire to lay down his life for his blessed Redeemer.

Having gone to Cæsarea, which was then in the hands of the Persians, he was taken up for a spy, and brought before Marzabanes, governor of that city, to whom he owned that he was a Christian, and was on that account sent to prison. When he had lain there some time, Marzabanes sent for him, and gave him fresh assurances of favour and promotion, if he would but renounce his religion: but he despised and rejected every mark of friendship and respect, that would endeavour to divorce him from his God; and the governor ordered him to be beaten till he should agree to his proposals. He then remanded him to prison, where he spent his time in prayer, and such labours as were imposed on him as part of his punishment. Justin being apprized of his sufferings, recommended him to the prayers of the whole community, and sent two of his people to encourage him to perseverance and fortitude.

The governor at length wrote to the king concerning Anastasius, and on receiving an answer, told the prisoner, that he would give him his liberty if he would renounce the Christian religion, only before him and two witnesses, and that his renunciation should not be known. Anastasius heard this proposal with horror, and rejected it with disdain; when the governor sent him bound in chains to Persia, there to be dealt with as the king should command.

Now the king did all in his power to engage him to renounce his religion, but finding his endeavours in vain, he ordered him to be executed, which was performed in this manner: he was laid upon his back, with a piece of wood across his legs, pressed down with the whole weight of two lusty men: he was then severely beaten, hung up by one hand, with a weight fastened to his foot; and after being strangled, his head was cut off, and sent to the king.

Martin, bishop of Rome, was born at Todi, in Italy. He was naturally inclined to virtue, and his parents bestowed on him an admirable education. He had every liberal endowment that the sciences could bestow, and all the worthiness that a mortal could derive from the saving grace of the gospel. He took orders, and on the death of Theodore, bishop of Rome, was advanced to that important see, by an unanimous election, in which all parties gave him the fullest praises, and admitted, that he well merited a trust of such great consequence. An eminent writer has thus drawn the character of this great man.

"His compassion for the poor appeared in large contributions for their relief, and the offices of hospitality, which he performed in favour of strangers. His fasts were rigorous and frequent, and prayer employed a very considerable part of his time. He was always ready to receive returning sinners; took no small pains to lead such through the paths of repentance, as testified their sorrow by tears; and comforted them by letting them see what reason they had to confide in God's infinite goodness. He loved his clergy with a brotherly tenderness, and honoured the episcopal character wherever he met with it."

The first vexation he received in his episcopal capacity, was from a set of heretics, called Monothelites; who not daring, after the express decisions of the council of Chalcedon, to maintain the unity of nature in Christ, asserted artfully, that he had but one will and operation of mind. This sect was patronized by the emperor Heraclius; and the first who attempted to stop the progress of these errors, was Sophronius, bishop of Jerusalem.

Now Martin, who perfectly coincided in sentiments with the bishop of Jerusalem, called a council, which consisted of 105 bishops, and they unanimously condemned the errors in question.

Provoked at these proceedings, the emperor ordered Olympius, his lieutenant in Italy, to repair to Rome, and seize the bishop, provided it could be done without causing an insurrection. The lieutenant performed the journey; but on his arrival at Rome, he found the people too unanimous in their opinions, and the prelate too much beloved, to attempt any thing by open violence. Hence he had recourse to treachery, and suborned a ruffian to assassinate the bishop at the altar; but the fellow, after promising to execute the bloody deed, was seized with such horrors of mind, that he had not the power to perform his promise. Olympius, finding it would be very difficult to perform any thing against Martin, withdrew from Rome, and putting himself at the head of his troops, marched against the Saracens, who had made some inroads into Italy, but during this expedition he died.

He was succeeded by Calliopas, who received express orders to seize the person of Martin, which, with the assistance of a considerable body of soldiers, he performed; at the same time shewing the clergy the imperial mandate, which commanded him to dispossess Martin of his bishopric, and carry him as a prisoner to Constantinople.

Having endured innumerable hardships, through a very tedious voyage, he reached the imperial city of Constantinople; and was immediately thrown into prison. While in confinement, he wrote two epistles to the emperor to refute the calumnies forged against him with respect to his faith and loyalty. The substance of which was, that for a proof of the soundness of the former, he appeals to the testimony of the whole clergy, and his own solemn protestation to defend the truth as long as he lived. In answer to such objections as had been made against the latter, he declared he never sent either money, letters, or advice to the Saracens, but only remitted a sum for the relief of poor Christians among those people: he concludes with saying, that nothing could be more false than what the heretics had alleged against him concerning the blessed Virgin, whom he firmly believed to be the mother of God, and worthy of all honour after her divine Son. In his second letter he gives a particular account of his being seized at Rome, as already related, and his indisposition and ill usage since he was dragged from that city: and ends with wishing and hoping his persecutors would repent of their conduct, when the object of their hatred was removed from this world.

So many were the fatigues that Martin had undergone, and his infirmities so great, that on the day appointed for his trial, he was forced to be brought out of prison in a chair, as he was unable to walk. When he was before the court, the judge ordered him to stand, which not being able to do, two men were ordered to hold him up. Twenty witnesses were produced against him, who swore as they were directed, and charged him with pretended crimes that had been invented for the purpose.

Martin

Martin began his defence, but as soon as he entered upon an investigation of the errors which he had combated, one of the senators stopped him, and said, that he was only examined respecting civil affairs, and consequently that ecclesiastical matters had nothing to do in his defence. The judge then prevented him from going on, and having broke up the court, went and reported the progress of the proceedings to the emperor.

Now Martin was ordered to be exposed in the most public places of the town, to the ridicule of the people; to be divested of all episcopal marks of distinction, and to be treated with the greatest scorn and severity. All these rigours he bore with a Christian-like patience, and an amazing degree of fortitude.

Martin, after laying some months in prison, was sent to an island at some distance, and there cut to pieces, A. D. 655.

John, bishop of Bergamo, in Lombardy, was a learned man, and a good Christian. He did his utmost endeavours to clear the church from the errors of Arianism, and joining in this holy work with John, bishop of Milan, he was very successful against the heretics. Grimoald, however, an Arian, having usurped the throne of Lombardy, the orthodox Christians feared that heresy would gain footing, once more, in Lombardy; but the bishop of Bergamo used such persuasive arguments with Grimoald, that he brought him from the errors of Arianism to profess the orthodox faith.

On the death of Grimoald, and his son who succeeded him, Pantharit came to the crown and again introduced those errors which had been combated with such spirit by the orthodox clergy. The bishop of Bergamo exerted himself strenuously to prevent the heresy from spreading, on which account he was assassinated A. D. 683, on the 11th of July.

Kilien was born in Ireland, and received from his parents a pious and Christian education. His favourite study was theology, and he took great delight in perusing the holy scriptures. Hence an ardent affection for the glory of God glowed within him, and he was very assiduous in bringing many to the light of the gospel.

The narrow limits of his native island seeming too small for his unbounded zeal, he crossed the sea, together with eleven other persons, in order to make converts on the continent. On landing, they directed their course to what is now called the Circle of Franconia, in Germany. Coming to the city of Wurtzbourg, they found the people in general, and their governor Gozbert, to be Pagans; but from their good dispositions, conceived great hopes of converting them from idolatry and superstition to the gospel faith. Previous to making this attempt, however, he deemed it necessary to go to Rome, in order to obtain his mission from the pontiff. He accordingly went thither, attended by one Coloman a priest, and Totman a deacon, two of those who had accompanied him from Ireland, and found Conon in Peter's chair. He gave them a favourable reception, and being informed of Kilien's business at Rome, after some questions about his faith and doctrine, consecrated him bishop, with full permission to preach to the infidels, wherever he found them. Thus authorized, Kilien returned to Wurtzbourg, where he opened his mission. He had not been long employed in those evangelical labours, when Gozbert sent for him, and desired to know the nature and tendency of this new religion, which he recommended so vigorously, and proposed so boldly. Our holy bishop had several conferences with the governor on that subject, and God gave such a blessing to his endeavours, that Gozbert received the faith, was baptized, and gave him free leave to preach wherever he had any power. As the example of great men seldom fails of influencing those of an inferior rank, that of Gozbert went very far in commanding the attention of his Pagan subjects to what our prelate had to offer; and much the greatest part of them became Christians in less than two years.

It is remarkable that Gozbert had married his brother's widow, for which Kilien, though he knew the sinfulness of the thing, did not chuse to rebuke him till he was thoroughly confirmed in his faith. When he thought him fully instructed in the principles of Christianity, and well grounded in the purity of its precepts, he entreated the governor, as the last proof of the sincerity of his conversion, to quit that person whom he had hitherto looked upon as a wife, as he could not cohabit with her without committing sin. Gozbert, surprised at the proposal, told the bishop this was the hardest demand he had ever made upon him. "But, said he, since I have renounced my own inclinations and pleasures in so many particulars for the love of God, I will make the work complete, by complying with your advice in this too."

The wife of the governor being informed of this affair, determined to be revenged on those who had persuaded Gozbert into such a resolution. The missionaries were sensible of that wicked woman's design; and the only shield they had, consisted of prayer, patience, and resignation. She sent accordingly to the place where they usually assembled, and had them all beheaded. Kilien, and his companions, submitted without resistance, the former telling them, that they need not fear those who had no power of the soul, but could only kill the body, which in a short time, would of itself decay. This happened, A. D. 689, and the martyrs were privately buried in the night, together with their books, clothes, &c. &c.

A few writers add what follows, as the sequel of this bloody affair: "Some days after this impious tragedy was acted, Gozbert, surprised that he had not seen Kilien lately, ordered diligent search to be made for him. Geilana, to stop the inquiry, gave out, that he and his companions had left the town, without giving any account of their motions. But the instrument of her revenge, the executioner, violently racked with remorse of conscience, ran about like a mad man, and declared that Kilien burnt him. Thus disordered, he was seized, and Gozbert was considering what to do with him, when a creature of the governess, a man of great eloquence and artifice, and a pretended convert, advised him to leave the God of the Christians the task of doing himself justice on his enemies, and proposed the event as a test of his ability.

Now Gozbert was weak enough to tempt God, by putting it on that issue. The murderer, being set at liberty, went raving mad, tore his own flesh with his teeth, and died in a most miserable condition. Geilana was so perplexed in her conscience, that it tormented her till she expired; Gozbert's rashness and criminal condescension, were punished by a violent death, and in a few years his whole race was exterminated.

A particular Account of the several PERSECUTIONS from the early Part of the Eighth, to near the Conclusion of the Tenth Century.

BONIFACE, archbishop of Mentz, and father of the German church, was an Englishman, and is, in ecclesiastical history, looked upon as one of the brightest ornaments of this nation. Originally his name was Winfred, or Winfrith, and he was born at Kirton, in Devonshire, then part of the West-Saxon kingdom. When he was only about six years of age, he began to discover a propensity to reflection, and seemed solicitous to gain information on religious subjects. Soon after, some evangelical missionaries came by chance to Kirton, and happened to fix their abode at his father's house. From these he understood, that the principal step to salvation was, to deny himself, and follow Christ. He considered seriously of what he heard, and, in process of time, determined to devote himself to a religious life. When he informed his father of his resolution, the latter would willingly have dissuaded him from it; but finding him fully resolved, he permitted him to go and reside at a monastery in the city of Exeter. Wolfrad, the abbot, finding that he possessed a bright genius as well as a strong inclination to study, had him removed to Nutselle, a seminary of learning, in the diocese of Winchester, where he would have a much greater opportunity of attaining improvement than at Exeter.

Exeter. The abbot of Nutscelle, who was as much celebrated for his great learning as his Christian virtues, took uncommon pains with the young pupil, who, in time, became a prodigy in profound literature and divine knowledge; and was, at length, employed at Nutscelle as a principal teacher.

We are informed by the ancient Saxon historians, who speak highly in his praise, that those who studied under him had no need to remove to any other place to finish what they had begun, for he gave them lessons in grammar, poetry, rhetoric, and philosophy; and explained the holy scriptures in the literal, moral, and mystical senses. But his example was as instructive as his lectures, and while he formed his scholars to learning by his dictates, he encouraged them to the practice of virtue, by the prudent conduct of his life.

The abbot of Nutscelle, seeing him thus qualified for the priesthood, obliged him to receive that holy order, when he was about thirty years old. From that time he began to preach, and labour for the salvation of his fellow-creatures; in the progress of which he gave the first proofs of that apostolical zeal, that afterwards made such glorious conquests in a most savage and barbarous part of the world.

Now there being an important occasion to assemble a synod of bishops in the kingdom of the West-Saxons, it was judged expedient to depute one of their body to the archbishop of Canterbury, to inform him of the exigency of affairs. Upon considering who was proper to be charged with such a commission, Boniface was proposed, and unanimously chosen by the synod; and the choice was by the then reigning king of the West-Saxons approved of, and confirmed.

Boniface discharged this trust with great prudence, and obtained the applause of every member of the synod; but far from being vain of the reputation he had acquired, he proposed to forsake his country, relations, and friends, in order to be of service to the faith, and extend Christianity on the continent. At first, the abbot and monks of Nutscelle would have dissuaded him from his purpose; but finding him resolute, two of their number were ordered to assist him.

Boniface accordingly left Nutscelle, and arrived in Friesland about the year 716; but found that country in the utmost disorder and confusion. It had belonged to the crown of France, but was at that time in the possession of prince Radbord, who had established Paganism in it, persecuted the Christians, and was at war with Charles Martel, mayor of the palace of Austrasia.

However, he went to Utrecht, where he found the infidel prince, and made him a tender of the gospel; but he being obdurate, Boniface perceived that the happy time of converting that nation was not yet come, and therefore returned to his monastery in England.

Boniface had not been many months there when the abbot died, and left the monks inconsolable, because they thought it would be impossible to repair their loss. Boniface too had his share in this affliction; but, arising above his passions, he undertook to comfort his brethren under that calamity, and made them several forcible exhortations to perseverance, and a conformity to the rule of their order, and the canons of the church.

Hereupon he discovered so much zeal and charity, that they desired he would supply the place of their deceased father and friend; but he either never accepted of that post, or quitted it very soon; for he obtained letters from Daniel, bishop of Winchester, his diocesan, which recommended him to the pope, and all the bishops, abbots, and princes he should find in his way to Rome, where he arrived in the beginning of the year 719.

He was received by Gregory the Second, who then sat in Peter's chair, with great friendship, and after several conferences with him, finding him full of zeal, piety, wisdom, and all the virtues that compose the character of an apostolical missionary, he dismissed him with a commission at large to preach the gospel to the Pagans, wherever he found them.

Having passed through Lombardy and Bavaria, he came to Thuringia, which country had before received the light of the gospel; but at the time that Boniface arrived there, that light burnt very dim. The first exertions of Boniface, therefore, were to bring the corrupted Christians back to a profession of the gospel in its purity; which gave him no small trouble, as the people in those parts were irregular and vitious, and the clergy interested and illiterate.

Having completed this pious work with great assiduity, and hearing that Radbord, whom he had formerly, in vain, attempted to convert, was dead, he repaired to Utrecht, to assist Willebrod, the first bishop of that city, in his evangelical labours.

For the space of three years these worthy pastors laboured in conjunction, in extirpating idolatry, and propagating the faith; and so far succeeded, that most of the people received baptism, and many of the Pagan temples were converted into Christian churches.

Now Willebrod, being very old and infirm, thought he could not do better than to appoint Boniface to succeed him, and to resign his charge into such pious hands; but this the English missionary absolutely refused, saying, he could not sojourn so long in any place, as he had many evangelical labours to perform. Willebrod, on hearing this, consented to his departure; and Boniface repaired to Hesse, where he brought to a knowledge of the real truth two brothers, who, though they called themselves Christians, were sunk into most of the errors of Paganism. They became such sincere converts, that they gave their estate to Boniface, who did not apply its revenues to his own use, but built and endowed a religious community; after which he proceeded to Saxony, where he converted some thousands to the Christian faith.

Having laboured in this new field with prodigious success about a year, he dispatched one of his companions to Rome, with an account of what he had done; upon which Gregory II. who was still in possession of that see, sent him a letter desiring him to repair to that city; in consequence of which he set out for Rome with all possible expedition. On his arrival, the bishop treated him as his character deserved, gave him all marks of esteem and affection, and was resolved not to let him return to his labours without the episcopal character, that he might pursue them with more authority, and to greater advantage. He was accordingly consecrated on the last day of November 723; from which time he took upon himself the name of Boniface.

Thus qualified for forming his new church, he left Rome, well provided with such books as would be necessary for his flock, or those to whom he should think fit to commit their instruction.

Boniface had with him six letters from the pope; one to Charles Martel; a second to all bishops, priests, dukes, counts, &c. a third to the clergy and people under his more immediate direction; a fourth to the five princes of Thuringia, and their Christian subjects; a fifth to the Pagans in their dominions; and a sixth to the whole body of Saxons. The purport of all which was, to recommend him to the protection of the Christian powers, and exhort the Pagans to hear him, and quit their errors and superstition.

Having made many converts in different parts, he returned to his mission in Germany, and was very successful, though he met with many that would willingly have been Christians only by halves; they were ready enough to acknowledge Christ, but did not care to adhere strictly to his precepts: in fine, they liked the name, but had not resolution enough to conform to the practice; and some were so far deluded, as to fall back into their former superstition and idolatries. These were exceedingly fond of worshipping a large oak-tree, which had, time immemorial, been dedicated to Jupiter. This tree Boniface ordered to be cut down; when the Pagans, finding that Jupiter did not take any notice of those who had cut it down, began to own the weakness of such pretended deities, and desired to be baptized.

Being naturally diffident of his own abilities, Boniface had frequent recourse to such persons as he thought thought might be of any service to him in his present difficult station. Pope Gregory and Daniel, his old diocesan, were his most considerable counsellors. But indeed he had more need of assistance than advice, and therefore, by the care of the bishop of Winchester, received from this island, large supplies of missionaries.

In the year 731, pope Gregory the Third succeeded to the chair, upon whose accession Boniface sent proper persons to Rome to acquaint him with the success of his labours, testifying his obedience, and desiring assistance in some difficulties which occurred in his mission. The pope not only answered the message by assuring him of the communion and friendship of the see of Rome, but as a mark of his respect for our missionary, sent him the Pallium, granted him the title of archbishop, or metropolitan of all Germany, and empowered him to erect new bishoprics.

Now Boniface went to the utmost extent of every religious duty, and not only erected new bishoprics, but built several monasteries. He then made a third journey to Rome in 738, when pope Gregory the Third, who had as much affection for him as his predecessor, felt an extraordinary pleasure at his appearing in that city, and detained him there the greatest part of the year.

Boniface having left Rome, went directly for Bavaria, upon the invitation of Odillo, duke of that country, where his business was to reform some abuses introduced by persons who had never received holy orders, and yet exercised the functions of the priesthood, and even such as were peculiar to the episcopal character, to the no small prejudice of the poor deluded inhabitants.

At this time Bavaria had only one bishop; he therefore, pursuant to his commission from Rome, erected three new bishoprics, one at Saltzburg, a second at Freisingen, and a third at Ratisbon, and thus all Bavaria was divided into four dioceses. This regulation was soon after confirmed by the pope, who at the same time thanked God for the prodigious success of Boniface's ministry, and desired him not to confine himself to one place, but carry the divine message into such parts of Germany as wanted the light of the gospel.

He now established four bishoprics, viz. At Erford, for Thuringia; at Barabourg, for Hesse; at Wurtzburg, for Franconia; at Achstat, for Bavaria.

We should observe that the bishopric of Barabourg is at present translated to Paderborn, in Westphalia. Willebald, the original author of the life of Boniface, was by him made first bishop of Achstat.

In the year 741, Gregory the Third was succeeded in the popedom by Zachary, and the latter confirmed Boniface in his power; and approved of all he had done in Germany, making him at the same time archbishop of Mentz, and metropolitan over thirteen bishoprics. He did not, however, lose his simplicity in grandeur, or forget his innocence in the parade of ecclesiastical dignity; but studied to preserve that humility, which is so pathetically recommended in Matt. v. 3—12.

Pepin, during the ministry of this meek prelate, was declared king of France. It was that prince's ambition to be crowned by the most holy prelate he could find, and Boniface was pitched on to perform that ceremony, which he did at Soissons in 752. The next year his great age, and many infirmities lay so heavy on him, that with the consent of the new king, the bishops, &c. of his diocese, he consecrated Lullus, his countryman, and faithful disciple, and placed him in the see of Mentz. When he had thus eased himself of his charge, he recommended the church of Mentz to the care of the new bishop in very strong terms, desired he would finish the church at Fuld, and see him buried in it, for his end was approaching.

These orders being left, he took boat for the Rhine, and went to Friesland, where he converted and baptized several thousands of the barbarous natives, demolished the temples, and raised churches on the ruins of those superstitious structures.

When he had appointed a day for confirming a great number of new converts, he ordered them to assemble in an open plain near the river Bourde. Thither he repaired the day before; and pitching a tent, determined to remain on the spot all night, in order to be ready in the morning early.

Several Pagans, who were his inveterate enemies, having intelligence of this, poured down upon him, and the companions of his mission, in the night, in such a manner as sufficiently evinced their design of massacring them. The servants of Boniface were for repelling the barbarians by force of arms; but he opposed the motion, told them, and his clergy, that the moment he had long wished for was now come, and exhorted his assistants in the ministry to prepare themselves for martyrdom. While he was thus employed, the Pagans rushed in upon him, and killed him and fifty-two of his companions and attendants on June 5, A. D. 755. Thus fell the great father of the Germanic church, the honour of England, and the glory of the age in which he lived.

There were forty-two persons of Armorian, in Upper Phrygia, who were martyred in the year 845, by the Saracens, the circumstances of which transaction are thus:

During the reign of Theophilus, the Saracens ravaged many parts of the eastern empire, gained several considerable advantages over the Christians; and at length laid siege to the city of Armorian. The garrison bravely defended the place for a considerable time, and would, in all probability, have obliged their enemies to raise the siege, when the place was basely betrayed by a renegade. Great numbers were put to the sword; and two general officers, with some other persons of distinction, were carried prisoners to Bagdat, where they were loaded with heavy chains, and thrown into a dark dungeon.

These people continued in prison for a considerable time without seeing any persons but their gaolers, or receiving any allowance greater than what would barely subsist them; the bare ground was their bed, and hope their only consolation. During this time, however, they only considered themselves as prisoners of war; but at length they were informed, that nothing could preserve their lives but renouncing their religion and embracing Mahometanism.

In order to induce them to comply, the caliph pretended a very great zeal for their welfare; and declared, that he looked upon converts in a more glorious light than conquests; and the gaining of souls, of much greater importance than the subduing of kingdoms. Agreeable to these maxims, after they had suffered all the hardships of a dark and noisome prison, and were reduced to a state that might oblige them to accept of relief on any terms, he sent some of the most ingenious and artful of the Mahometans, with money and clothes, and the promise of other advantages they might secure to themselves by a bare abjuration of Christianity; which, according to the corrupt casuistry of those infidels, might be made without quitting their faith. But our martyrs, well instructed in the simplicity and sincerity of the gospel, rejected the proposal with horror and contempt. After this they were attacked with that fallacious and delusive argument which the Mahometans still use in favour of themselves, and their monstrous absurdities! they were desired to judge of the merits of the cause by the success of those that were engaged in it; and chuse that religion which they saw flourished most, and was best rewarded with the good things of this life, which they called the blessings of heaven. But our noble prisoners were proof against all these temptations; and argued strenuously against the authority of their false prophet. This incensed the Mahometans, and drew greater hardships upon the Christians during their confinement, which lasted seven years. At the end of that time Boidizius, the renegade that had betrayed Armorian, brought them the welcome news of their sufferings being to conclude in martyrdom the next day. To which he added his advice to them to save their lives by dissimulation, a fault very excusable, he said, in their circumstances. But they knew what curse was denounced by Christ against such as deny him before men; and were therefore prepared to meet death in any shape, rather than commit that horrid offence.

When they were brought from their dungeon, they were again solicited to embrace the tenets of Mahomet; but but neither threats nor promises, the denunciations of malice, nor allurements of rewards, could induce them to forsake the true faith, or prevail on them to espouse the doctrines of an impostor.

Perceiving their resolution, and that their faith could not by any means be shaken, the caliph ordered them to be executed. Theodore, one of the number, had formerly received priest's orders, and officiated as a clergyman; but afterwards quitting the church, he had followed a military life, and raised himself by the sword to some considerable posts, which he enjoyed at the time of his being taken prisoner. The officer who attended the execution, being apprized of these circumstances, said to Theodore, "You might, indeed, pretend to be ranked amongst the Christians, while you served in their church as a priest; but the profession you have taken up, which naturally engages you in bloodshed, is so contrary to your former employment, that you should not now think of passing upon us, for one of that religion. When you quitted the altar for the camp, you renounced Jesus Christ. Why then will you dissemble any longer with the world? Would you not act more conformable to your own principles, and make your conduct all of a piece, if you came to a resolution of saving your life by owning our great prophet?"

Now Theodore covered with a religious confusion at this strong reproach, but still full of courage, and unshaken in his faith, made the following answer: "It is true, says he, I did in some measure abandon my God when I engaged in the army, and scarce deserve the name of a Christian. But the Almighty has given me the grace to see myself in a true light, and made me sensible of my fault; and I hope he will be pleased to accept my life, as the only sacrifice I can now offer to expiate my guilt. His mercies are infinite, and therefore I have room to hope my blood may be allowed to wash away my crimes. And in this I appeal to your own sentiments. If, in the same case, any one that had left your service, and rambled negligent of his duty for some time, should at last return and offer to lay down his life for you, would not you be inclined to forget all that was past, and receive him into your family again?"

This manly and pious answer confounded the officer, who only answered, that he should presently have an opportunity of giving that proof of his zeal for, and fidelity to, his master. Upon which, Theodore and the rest, to the number of forty-two, were beheaded.

Mary and Flora, two ladies of distinction, suffered martyrdom at the same time. Flora was the daughter of an eminent Mahometan, at Seville, in Spain; from whence he removed to Corduba, where the Saracen king resided, and kept his court. Her father dying while she was young, Flora was left to the care of her mother, who, being a Christian, brought her up in the true faith, and inspired her with sentiments of virtue and religion. A priest of Corduba, who personally knew both her and her mother, and who wrote the account of her martyrdom, hath given us the following portrait of her character: "Flora, says he, was a great proficient in the spiritual life, at an age when little is thought of but the world and its vanities; her whole thoughts seemed turned to Jesus Christ; her whole discourse was inflamed with the divine love; God was her sole care; her fasts were rigorous; her devotion full of fervour; her concern for the poor most surprising and edifying; and the precepts of the gospel were her constant study." Her brother being a professed enemy to Christianity, with the addition of a barbarous and savage temper, Flora was for some time obliged to use no small caution in the practice of such virtues, as must have exposed her to a domestic persecution at least. She was too zealous to bear this restraint long; for which reason she left Corduba, in company with her sister.

Flora's departure soon alarmed her brother, who guessed her motives, and, in revenge, informed against several Christians of Corduba; for as he did not know whither his sister was gone, he determined to wreak his vengeance on such Christians as were present.

When Flora was informed of these proceedings, she considered herself as the cause of what the Christians had suffered at Corduba, and having an interior conviction that God called her to fight for her faith, she returned to that city, and made her way directly to the persecutors, among whom she found her brother. "If, said our glorious martyr, I am the object of your inquiry, if the servants of God are tormented on my account, I now freely offer myself to your disposal. I declare, I believe in Jesus Christ, glory in his cross, and profess the doctrine which he taught. This now is my confession; and I hope through the divine mercy that nothing you can do to me will be able to make me retract or alter it." None of the company seemed so much enraged at this declaration as her brother, who after some threats, struck her; this violent proceeding was followed by attempts of a softer nature; for he endeavoured to gain her by expressions of concern, and pretended kindness. Finding her equally insensible to all he could say, he then informed against her, and undertook to prove her a Christian before the judge. He insinuated, that Flora had been educated in the religion of Mahomet, but had renounced it at the suggestion of some Christians, who inspired her with the utmost contempt for the great prophet. When she was called on to answer to the charge, she declared she had never owned Mahomet, but sucked the Christian religion in with her milk, and was entirely devoted to the Redeemer of mankind. The magistrate, finding her resolution, delivered her to her brother, and gave him orders to use his utmost endeavours to make her a Mahometan. She, however, soon found an opportunity of escaping over a wall in the night, and of secreting herself in the house of a Christian. At length, she withdrew to Tucci, a village of Andalusia, where she met with her sister, and they never separated again till her martyrdom.

Mary, who was martyred at the same time, was the daughter of a Christian tradesman at Estremadura, who afterwards removed to a town near Corduba.

As soon as the persecution began under Abderrama, king of the Saracens, in Spain, Mary's brother was one who fell a victim to the rage of the infidels on that occasion. Mary, hearing of his martyrdom, and full of a generous confusion at being left behind by one so much younger than herself, gave a free loose to her grief, which proceeded not so much from the loss of her brother, as her not being allowed to enjoy the happiness then in his possession.

She went full of these thoughts to Corduba, where, going into a church, she found Flora, who had left her retreat on the same motive, and was there recommending herself to the author and rewarder of such victories as Christians then gained over infidels. Upon conversing together, and finding they acted upon the same heroic principles, and proposed the same glorious end of their labours, they agreed to go together, and declare their faith before the judge. Accordingly, without further hesitation, they proceeded to the magistrate, when Flora boldly told him, she looked on Mahomet as no better than a false prophet, an adulterer, and a magician.

Hereupon Mary told the magistrate, that she professed the same faith, and entertained the same sentiments as Flora, and that she was sister to Walabonzus, who had already suffered for being a Christian. This behaviour so much enraged the magistrate, that he ordered them to be committed to close confinement for some time, and then to be beheaded: which sentence was executed A. D. 850, on the 4th of November.

Perfectus was born at Corduba, in Spain, and brought up in the Christian faith. Having a quick genius, he made himself master of all the useful and polite literature of that age; and, at the same time, was not more celebrated for his abilities, than admired for his piety. At length he took priest's orders, and performed the duties of his office with great assiduity and punctuality.

One day walking in the streets of Corduba, some Arabians entered into conversation with him, and, among other questions, asked him his opinion both of Jesus Christ, and of Mahomet.

Perfectus gave them a very exact account of the Christian tian faith, respecting the divinity of Christ, and the redemption of mankind; but begged to be excused from delivering his sentiments concerning Mahomet. The Arabians pressed him to speak freely; but he declined it, saying, that what he should utter would not be agreeable to their ideas, and consequently that it would be disgusting to their ears; he therefore thought best to be silent, as he wished not to offend any one. Dissatisfied with this answer, they still entreated him to speak his thoughts, declaring at the same time, that they would not be offended at any thing he should say.

Believing them sincere, and hoping this might be the favourable time allotted by God for their conversion, Perfectus let them know the Christians looked on Mahomet as one of the false prophets foretold in the gospel, who were to seduce and deceive great numbers, to their eternal ruin. To illustrate this assertion, he placed before them some of the actions of that grand impostor; endeavoured to shew them the impious doctrines, and abominable absurdities of the Alcoran; and ended with exhorting them, in very strong terms, to quit the miserable state in which they then were, and which would certainly be followed by eternal misery.

It may easily be imagined, that the infidels could not hear a discourse like this without feeling some warmth, and conceiving an indignation against the speaker. They thought proper, however, to disguise their resentments at that time, but were resolved not to let him escape without punishment. At first, indeed, they were unwilling to use any violence to him, because they had given him a solemn assurance he should come to no harm, for the liberty he took at their request; but zeal for their law, and its author, soon eased them of that scruple. They watched a favourable opportunity, seized on him, hurried him away to one of their chief magistrates, and accused him of blaspheming their great prophet and legislator.

The whole allegation having been heard, the judge ordered him to be put in chains, and closely confined in prison, till the feast of their Ramadan, or Lent, when he should be made a victim to Mahomet. He heard the determination of the judge with joy, and prepared for his martyrdom with great fervency.

When the time arrived, he was led to the place of execution, where he again made a confession of his faith, declared Mahomet an impostor, and insisted, that the Alcoran was filled with absurdities and blasphemies. In consequence of this he was sentenced to be beheaded, and was accordingly executed, A. D. 850; after which his body was honourably interred by the Christians.

Wincefflaus, duke of Bohemia, was brought up in the faith of Christ, for his father Wrattislaus, the preceding duke, was a valiant prince, and a good Christian; but Drahomira, his mother, was a Pagan, whose morals were as bad as her sentiments of religion: she consented, however, to intrust her mother, Ludmilla, with the education of her eldest son. That holy woman had resided at Prague ever since the death of Borivor her husband, the first duke of Bohemia, who embraced the faith of Christ; and Wincefflaus was sent to that city, to be brought up as she pleased. Ludmilla undertook to form his heart to devotion and the love of God, and was assisted in that work by Paul her chaplain, a man of great sanctity and prudence, who likewise endeavoured to cultivate his mind with the first rudiments of learning. The mind of the young prince corresponded with their endeavours; and the grace of God, who had prepared him for their instructions, made the task very easy. At a convenient age he was sent to a college at Budweis, about sixty miles from Prague, where several young persons of the first rank were placed for their improvement in virtue and learning, and studied under the direction of an excellent master, a native of Neisse, in the duchy of Sillesia.

At the death of Wrattislaus, his son Wincefflaus was very young; on which account Drahomira, his mother, declared herself regent during his minority. This princess, not having any one now to control her, gave a free vent to her rage against Christianity; and began her administration with an order for shutting up the churches. She repealed the laws in favour of the Christians, and removed all magistrates of that denomination, supplying their places with Pagans.

Finding themselves thus encouraged, the Pagans, upon any frivolous pretence, would murder the Christians with impunity; and if a Christian in his own defence killed a Pagan, his life, and that of nine other Christians, were to be the forfeit.

The venerable Ludmilla was sensibly touched at these proceedings, and could not, without affliction, behold a religion trampled on which she professed, and which her consort had established with so much difficulty.

Ludmilla could not think of any expedient to prevent the total extirpation of Christianity in Bohemia, but persuaded Wincefflaus, young as he was, to assume the reins of government. Wincefflaus at first declined engaging in this task, till maturer years had rendered him better qualified; but upon his grandmother's promising to assist him with her advice, and direct him in his conduct, he complied with her request; and, to prevent all future disputes, divided the country between himself and his younger brother Bolislaw, whose name a town in, and a considerable district of, that country still retains.

On this change of affairs Drahomira attached herself to Bolislaw, who, like herself, was a Pagan, and followed implicitly her maxims. With respect to the behaviour of Wincefflaus after his assuming the sovereignty, and the fate of the aged and worthy Ludmilla, the annals of Bohemia furnish us with these particulars: "Wincefflaus, pursuant to the impressions of virtue which he had received from his grandmother, and others employed in his education, was more careful than ever to preserve the innocence of his morals, and acquired some new degree of perfection every day. He was as humble, sober, and chaste, when master of his own motions, and in full possession of sovereign authority, as when under the government of those on whom he was taught to look as his superiors. He spent great part of the night in prayer, and the whole day in acts of piety; directing all his views to the establishment of peace, justice, and religion, in his dominions. He was assisted in these charitable and truly christian labours by able ministers; and nothing of consequence was done without the advice of Ludmilla. That excellent princess being informed that Drahomira, transported with rage at the success of her directions, had formed a design against her life, and that it would hardly be in her power to avoid the blow, was so far from being disturbed at the apprehensions of death, or desisting from what had made her odious to that wicked woman, that she exerted herself more vigorously than ever for the maintenance of religion, and confirming the prince in his resolutions. Being now assured that her death was near, and that several persons were actually employed to dispatch her the first convenient opportunity, she called all her servants together, acknowledged their fidelity in her service with a liberal hand, and distributed her goods and money among the poor. Thus divested of all she possessed in the world, she went to her chapel, received the holy eucharist, and then employed herself in prayer, recommended her soul to God, and expected his will with the utmost tranquillity and resignation. This was her situation, when two ruffians entered the chapel, seized on her, and strangled her with her own veil."

The young duke felt severely for the loss of his grandmother; and the more so, as he did not choose to punish the offenders, well knowing that they had been instigated to what they did by his mother. He therefore addressed himself to God only, entreated the throne of grace for his mother's pardon and conversion, and patiently submitted to the dispensations of Providence.

As many factions were stirred up in his dominions by means of his mother and brother, and as Wincefflaus himself seemed of an unwarlike disposition, a neighbouring prince determined to invade that part of Bohemia which belonged to him. This was Radislaus, prince of Gurima, who entered Bohemia at the head of a considerable army, and immediately commenced hostilities.

hostilities. Winceslaus hearing of these proceedings, sent a message to the invader, to know what offence he had given him, and what terms he required to quit his dominions; and leave him at his repose.

Radislaus mistaking the temper of Winceslaus, looked upon this message to proceed from timidity; he therefore answered in a very haughty manner, made some frivolous excuses for having commenced the quarrel, and concluded, by insisting that Winceslaus should surrender to him all his dominions.

This unjust and insolent demand obliged Winceslaus to appear in arms in defence of himself and his people. He accordingly raised a considerable body of forces, and marched to oppose the enemy. When the two armies were drawn up, and ready to engage, Winceslaus desired a conference with Radislaus, which being complied with, he observed, that as it would be unreasonable and unjust to hazard the lives of so many innocent men, the most eligible method of putting an end to the dispute would be by single combat between themselves.

Radislaus heard this proposal with pleasure, and accepted it with joy, thinking that he was much more expert in the use of arms than his antagonist. They accordingly engaged in fight of the two armies, and the victory seemed doubtful for some time, till, at length, it declared in favour of Winceslaus; when his antagonist was obliged, according to previous agreement, to relinquish his pretended claim, and retire into his own country.

Being thus freed from the fears of a foreign enemy, Winceslaus had leisure to turn his thoughts to domestic reformation. He removed corrupt judges and venal magistrates, and filled their places with persons of integrity: he put an end to oppression in all its branches, and punished such nobles as tyrannized over their vassals. These regulations, though they relieved the poor and helpless, gave great offence to the great and rich, as they abridged their power of using those who depended on them ill, and, in some degree, took from them that self-importance, and assumed consequence, which is the pride of little minds. Hence many became factious, and ripe for mischief. The malecontents gave an odious turn to all his best actions; spoke slightly, and even contemptibly, of his application to prayer, fasting, and other acts of religion, which they endeavoured to insinuate were low employments for a prince, and incompatible with the courage and policy necessary for the government of a state. His mother and brother were still the most inveterate of his enemies, who could not bear to see this growing prosperity of the patron of religion, and enemy of idolatry; and therefore resolved to take him off at any rate. Drahomira and Bolislaw were concerting measures for executing their black design, when they understood that Winceslaus had desired the pope to send some priests into his dominions, with whom he proposed to spend the remainder of his days in a religious retreat. This news suspended the execution of their conspiracy against him for some time; but, perceiving this affair did not come to a conclusion so soon as was necessary for satisfying their ambitious views, they re-assumed their criminal practices against him, and gained their ends in the following very black and treacherous manner:

Bolislaw having been some time married, his princess proved pregnant, and, at length, brought him forth a son. This circumstance, which should have diffused joy throughout the family, furnished Drahomira and Bolislaw with an idea of the most horrid nature, and the innocent infant was made the object for perpetrating a deed of unexampled cruelty. The scheme concerted between the bigoted Bolislaw, and his wicked mother, was to get Winceslaus into their power. The birth of the child furnished them with a fair pretence; and a polite message was dispatched to the unsuspecting duke, to partake of an entertainment given upon the occasion. Winceslaus, not having the least surmise of their barbarous intent, repaired to the court of Bolislaw, where he was received with the greatest appearance of cordiality. He partook of the entertainment, and wore the face of festivity till it grew rather late at night, when he thought proper to retire before the rest of the company, as he was not fond of late hours, and as he never neglected his devotions to the Almighty, previous to his laying down to sleep.

As soon as he was withdrawn, Drahomira urged Bolislaw not to trust their revenge to another hand, but to follow his brother instantly, and murder him. The bloody prince took his mother's sanguinary advice, and repairing to his brother's chamber, he found him kneeling, and in fervent prayer to the Almighty; when, unmoved by that pious appearance, he rushed upon him, and plunged a dagger to his heart. Thus, in A. D. 929, fell Winceslaus, the third duke of Bohemia, by as infernal an act of treachery as ever was recorded in the annals of any nation.

Adalbert, bishop of Prague, was a Bohemian by birth. His parents were persons of rank, but more distinguished for their virtue and piety than for their opulence or lineage. They were happy in a son, whose dawning perfections gave them a pleasing hope, that he would one day become a shining ornament to his family. That he might fulfil their expectations, they gave him a complete education; but their joy was in some measure damped, by his falling into a dropsy, from which he was with difficulty recovered.

When he was effectually cured, they sent him to Magdaburg, and committed him to the care of the archbishop of that city, who completed his education, and confirmed him in piety and virtue. The rapid progress which Adalbert made in human and divine learning, made him dear to the prelate, who, to the authority of a teacher, joined all the tenderness of a parent for his amiable pupil.

Having spent nine years at Magdaburg, he retired to his own country upon the death of the archbishop, and entered himself among the clergy at Prague. Dithmar, bishop of Prague, died soon after the return of Adalbert to that city; and, in his expiring moments, expressed such contrition for having been ambitious and solicitous of worldly honours and riches, as surprised every one who heard it. Adalbert, who was among the number present, was so sensibly affected at the bishop's dying sentiments, that he received them as an admonition to the strict practice of virtue, which he afterwards exercised with the greatest attention, spending his time in prayer, and relieving the poor with a cheerful liberality.

A few days after the decease of Dithmar, an assembly was held for the choice of a successor, which consisted of the clergy of Prague, and the chief quality of Bohemia. Adalbert's character for every virtue that important post required, soon determined them to raise him to the vacant see, which they did on the 19th of February 983. Messengers were immediately dispatched to Verona, to desire Otho II. would confirm the election. The emperor granted the request, ordered Adalbert to repair to court for investiture, gave him the ring and crozier, and then sent him to the archbishop of Mentz for consecration. That ceremony was performed on the 29th of June the same year; and he was received at Prague with all possible demonstrations of public joy. He divided the revenue of his see into four parts, according to the direction of the canons extant in the fifth century. The first was employed in the fabric, and ornaments of the church; the second went to the maintenance of the clergy; the third was laid out for the relief of the poor; and the fourth reserved for the support of himself and family; which was always made to include twelve indigent persons, to whom he allowed daily subsistence.

He now performed his duty with the utmost assiduity, and spent a great portion of his time in preaching to and exhorting the people. His conduct was discreet and humane; and his manner neither too severe nor too indulgent; so that his flock were not terrified into despair, or flattered into presumption. But some things which he could not remedy gave him great uneasiness, particularly the having a plurality of wives, and selling the Christians to the Jews, for trivial offences. Hence he determined to consult the pope, and made a journey to to Rome. Accordingly, John, who then sat in the papal chair, received him with great cordiality, and having heard his grievance, advised him to give up his bishopric, rather than be the witness of enormities which he could not remedy. He determined to take the pope's advice, and to devote the remainder of his days to mortification, poverty, and silence; which design he began by giving all his treasures to the poor. He was, however, before he entirely secluded himself from mankind, desirous of seeing the Holy Land, and set off accordingly, with three persons in his company.

In their way they arrived at Mount Cassino, where the heads of the monastery of that place received them in a very friendly manner, and entertained them as well as the rules of their order would admit. Being apprized of the cause of their journey, when they were about to depart, the superior of the monastery addressed himself to Adalbert, and observed to him, that the journey he had undertaken would give him more trouble and uneasiness than he was aware of; that the frequent desire of changing place and travelling, often proceeded more from a restless disposition, and eager curiosity, than real religion, or solid devotion. "Therefore, said he, if you will listen to my advice, leave the world at once with sincerity, and settle in some religious community, without desiring to see more than you have already seen." Adalbert listened attentively, and came readily into the sentiments of the superior, which soon determined him to take up his residence in that monastery, where he then thought he might live entirely recluse, and, being unknown, might pass unhonoured to the grave. But in the latter particular he was mistaken; for the priests, by accident, coming to a knowledge of the rank and former dignity of their colleague, began to treat him with great deference and respect, which occasioned him to leave the place. Nilus, a Grecian, was then at the head of a community not far from Mount Cassino; Adalbert made his way to him, and begged to be received into his monastery. He assured him he would willingly comply with his request, if he thought the rule and practice of his religious family would be agreeable to a stranger; besides which, he told him that the house in which he and his people lived was given to them by those of Mount Cassino; and therefore it might not be safe for him to receive one that had left that community. When Nilus had thus excused himself, he advised him to return to Rome, and apply himself to Leo, an abbot of his acquaintance there, to whom he gave a letter of recommendation. Adalbert went to Rome, where he found Leo, who, before he would admit him, put his virtue and courage to proper trials, by speaking roughly to him, and giving him a terrible account of the labours and severities of the state in which he desired to engage. But, finding his resolution was not moved or weakened by the prospect of the most austere mortifications, he conducted him to the pope, and, with the consent of that pontiff and the whole college of cardinals, gave him the habit on Holy Thursday in the year 990. We have already said, that he had been attended only by three select persons ever since he had the pope's advice for resigning his bishopric; two of them left him now; but the third, who was his own brother Gaudentius, followed his example, and engaged in the same community. Adalbert, full of the most profound humility, took a particular pleasure in the lowest employments of the house, and lived here an excellent pattern of christian simplicity and obedience.

The archbishop of Mentz, as metropolitan, was exceedingly afflicted at the disorders in the church of Prague, and wished for the return of the bishop, with whose retreat he was not, for some time acquainted. At length, after five years absence, he heard that Adalbert was at Rome, when he sent a deputation to the pope to press his return to his diocese. The pope summoned a council to consider of the deputation, and after a warm dispute between the monks and deputies, the latter carried their point, and Adalbert was ordered to return to his diocese; but, at the same time, had permission to quit his charge again, if he found his flock as incorrigible as before. The inhabitants of Prague met him, on his arrival, with great joy, and promised obedience to his directions; but they soon forgot their promises, and relapsed into their former vices, which obliged him, a second time, to leave them, and return to his monastery.

The archbishop of Mentz sent another deputation to Rome, and desired that his suffragan might be again ordered back to his diocese. Gregory V. who was then pope, commanded him to return to Prague; and he obeyed, though with great reluctance.

The Bohemians, however, did not look upon him as before, but deemed him the censor of their faults, and the enemy to their pleasures, and threatened him with death upon his arrival; but not having him yet in their power, contented themselves with falling on his relations, several of whom they murdered, plundered their estates, and set fire to their houses. Adalbert had intelligence of these outrageous proceedings, and could not judge it prudent to proceed on his journey. He therefore went to the duke of Poland, who had a particular respect for him, and engaged that prince to sound the Bohemians in regard to his return; but could get no better answer from that wretched people, than "that they were sinners, hardened in iniquity; and Adalbert a saint, and consequently not fit to live among them; for which reason he was not to hope for a tolerable reception at Prague." The bishop thought this message discharged him from any further concern for that church, and began to direct his thoughts to the conversion of infidels; to which end he repaired to Dantzick, where he converted and baptized many, which so enraged the pagan priests, that they fell upon him, and dispatched him with darts, on the 23d of April, A. D. 997.

An Account of the PERSECUTIONS in the ELEVENTH CENTURY.

ALPHAGE, archbishop of Canterbury, was descended from a considerable family in Gloucestershire, and received an education suitable to his illustrious birth. His parents were worthy Christians, and Alphage seemed to inherit all their virtues. He was prudent and humble, pious and chaste: he made a rapid progress both in polite literature and scripture learning, and was, at once, the admired scholar, and devout Christian: he strove to make the arts useful to the purposes of life, and to render philosophy subservient to the cause of religion. In order to be more at leisure to contemplate the divine perfections, he determined to renounce his fortune, quit home, and become a recluse. He accordingly retired to a monastery of Benedictines, at Deerhurst, in Gloucestershire, and soon after took the habit.

Considering that the principal business of a Christian was to subdue his passions, and mortify his appetites, he lived with the utmost temperance, and spent the greatest part of his time in prayer. But not thinking the austerities he underwent in this monastery sufficiently severe, he retired to a lonely cell near Bath, and lived in a manner still more rigid and mortifying. Here he thought to remain unknown, but some devout persons finding out his retreat, his austere life soon became the subject of conversation in the neighbouring villages, where many flocked to him, and begged to be taken under his pastoral care. He yielded to their importunities, raised a monastery near his cell, by the contributions of several well-disposed persons; formed his new pupils into a community, and placed a prior over them. Having prescribed rules for their regulation, he again retired to his beloved cell, fervently wishing to pass the remainder of his days in religious security; when the following affair once more drew him from his retreat.

The see of Winchester being vacant by the death of Ethelwold, it was no easy matter to agree upon the choice of a successor to that bishopric. The clergy had been driven out of the cathedral for their scandalous lives, but were admitted again by King Ethelred, upon certain certain terms of reformation. The monks, who had been introduced upon their expulsion, looked upon themselves as the chapter of that church; and hence arose a violent contest between them, and the clergy who had been re-admitted, about the election of a bishop; while both parties were hot, and vigorously set upon promoting each their own man. This dispute at last ran so high, that Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, as primate of all England, was obliged to interpose in the affair, who consecrated Alphege to the vacant bishopric, to the general satisfaction of all concerned in the election, or interested in the affair.

Alphege's behaviour was a sufficient proof of his being equal to the dignity of his vocation. Piety flourished in his diocese; unity was established among his clergy and people; and the church of Winchester recovered its lustre in such a manner, as made the bishop the admiration of the whole kingdom.

Dunstan had an extraordinary veneration for Alphege, and when at the point of death, made it his ardent request to God, that he might succeed him in the see of Canterbury; which accordingly happened, though not till about eighteen years after Dunstan's death. In the course of that period the metropolitan church was governed by three successive prelates; the last of whom was Alfrick; upon whose decease, in 1006, Alphege was raised to the see of Canterbury.

The people belonging to the diocese of Winchester were the only persons who did not sincerely rejoice at his promotion; for they were too sensible of the loss they sustained by his translation, not to regret his removal to Canterbury.

Soon after his being made archbishop, he went to Rome, and received the pall from pope John XVIII. and after his return to England, laboured assiduously to introduce the best regulations into the church.

After Alphege had governed the see of Canterbury about four years, with great reputation to himself, and benefit to his people, the Danes made an incursion into England. Ethelred, who then reigned, was a prince of a very weak understanding, and pusillanimous disposition. Too fearful to face the enemy himself, and too irresolute to furnish others with the means of acting in his stead, he suffered his country to be ravaged with impunity, and the greatest depredations to be committed at the option of his enemies.

The archbishop Alphege, upon this trying occasion, acted with great resolution and humanity: he went boldly to the Danes, purchased the freedom of several whom they had made captives; found means to send a sufficient quantity of food to others, whom he had not money enough to redeem, and even made converts of some of the Danes: but the latter circumstance made the Danes, who still continued Pagans, greater enemies to him than they would otherwise have been, and determined them to be revenged on him for occasioning a change in the sentiments of their companions. Edric, an English malecontent, and an infamous traitor, gave the Danes every encouragement, and even assisted them in laying siege to Canterbury. When the design of attacking this city was known, many of the principal people made a precipitate flight from it, and would have persuaded Alphege to follow their example. But he, like a good pastor, would not listen to such a proposal; he assured them he could not think of abandoning his flock, at a time when his presence was more necessary than ever, and was resolved to hazard his life in their defence, at this calamitous juncture. While he was employed in assisting and encouraging his people, Canterbury was taken by storm; the enemy poured into the town, and destroyed all that came in their way, by fire and sword. The monks did what they could to detain the archbishop in the church, where they hoped he might be safe. But his concern for his flock made him break from them and run into the midst of the danger. He had the courage to address the enemy, and offer himself to their swords, as more worthy their rage than the people: he begged they might be saved, and that they would discharge their whole fury on him. They accordingly seized him, tied his hands, insulted, and abused him in a rude and barbarous manner; and obliged him to remain on the spot till his church was burnt, and the monks massacred. They then decimated all the inhabitants, both ecclesiastics, and laymen, leaving only every tenth person alive: so that they put 7236 persons to death, and left only four monks, and 800 laymen alive: after which they confined the archbishop in a dungeon, where they kept him close prisoner for several months.

During his confinement, they proposed to him to redeem his liberty with the sum of 3000*l.* and to persuade the king to purchase their departure out of the kingdom, with a further sum of 10,000*l.* Alphege's circumstances would not allow him to satisfy the exorbitant demand: they bound him, and put him to severe torments, to oblige him to discover the treasure of his church; upon which they assured him of his life and liberty. The prelate knew, that what they insisted on was the inheritance of the poor, not to be thrown away upon the barbarous enemies of the christian religion; and therefore persisted in refusing to give them any account of it. They remanded him to prison again, confined him six days longer, and then taking him with them to Greenwich, brought him to a trial there. He still remained inflexible with respect to the church treasures; but exhorted them to forsake their idolatry, and embrace Christianity. This so greatly incensed the Danes, that the soldiers dragged him out of the camp, and beat him unmercifully. Alphege bore this usage patiently, and even prayed for his persecutors. One of the soldiers, who had been converted and baptized by him, was greatly afflicted, that his pains should be so lingering, as he knew his death was determined on: he, therefore, with the fury of a desperate zeal, and a kind of barbarous compassion, cut off his head, and thus put the finishing stroke to his martyrdom, on April 19, A. D. 1012. This transaction happened on the very spot where the church at Greenwich, which is dedicated to him, now stands. After his death his body was thrown into the Thames, but being found the next day, it was buried in the cathedral of St. Paul's, by the bishops of London and Lincoln; from whence it was, in the year 1023, removed to Canterbury by Æthelmoth, the archbishop of that province.

Gerard, a Venetian, devoted himself to the service of God from his tender years; entered into a religious house for some time, and then determined to visit the Holy Land. Going into Hungary, he became acquainted with Stephen, the king of that country, who, at once, acted the parts of prince and preacher, and not only regulated his subjects by wholesome laws, but taught them religious duties. Finding Gerard every way qualified to instruct his people, he tried, by every means, to detain him in his kingdom; and, at length, founding several churches, he made Gerard bishop of that of Chonad.

Gerard had a very difficult task to perform; the people of his diocese were fond of, and accustomed to idolatry; and their perverseness was equal to their immorality. The new bishop, however, assiduous in his charge, and full of zeal for the salvation of his flock, laboured diligently to bring them to a sense of their duty. He soon had the pleasure to find that his endeavours were not unsuccessful, for his sweetness of disposition won upon the people so much, that they could not help believing one whom they loved, or of placing a confidence in the doctrines of a man they had such great reason to reverence.

His conquests over idolatry were not confined to his own diocese, but extended to the adjacent country, where his doctrines successfully spread, and many became converts to the pure faith of Christ. Wherever the faith made its way by his ministry, he took care to establish ecclesiastical discipline for the preservation of religion, and made several useful regulations in the public service of the church. His exemplary conduct was at least as instructive as his sermons and exhortations, and went a great way in convincing his converts of the truth and dignity of their new profession: for who could doubt of the excellency of a religion, that raised him above the weaknesses and passions of human nature; and appeared divine, by placing him at a distance from all that flatters or delights the senses? He visited his diocese, and was remarkable for an uncommon tenderness for the poor, especially such as had the misfortune of sickness, or were incapable of following their accustomed employments.

During the life of Stephen, Gerard received every kind of assistance which that excellent monarch could afford him; but on the demise of Stephen, his nephew Peter, who succeeded him, was of so different a temper, that Gerard was greatly perplexed during his government.

At length, the tyranny of Peter exasperated his subjects so much against him, that they deposed him, and placed Ouvo on the throne. They, however, soon found that they had changed from bad to worse; for Ouvo proved a greater monster of cruelty than his predecessor. At Easter, Ouvo repaired to Chonad, in order to receive the crown from the hands of Gerard. When he arrived at the place, the other prelates of the kingdom, who were assembled on that solemn occasion, assured the prince of their affections for his person, and promised to concur in his coronation; but Gerard absolutely refused to pay that compliment to a public and malicious enemy; and took the liberty of letting the intruder know, that he could not look on Peter's exclusion as regular, and consequently should not proceed to do any thing to the prejudice of his title: he then told him, that if he persisted in his usurpation, the Divine Providence would soon put an end to his life and reign. Ouvo, growing more insupportable than his predecessor, was brought to the scaffold in the year 1044; upon which Peter was recalled, and placed on the throne a second time; but his deposition and retirement had made no alteration in his temper, so that he was again deprived of the royal dignity after two years possession.

Andrew, son of Ladislaus, cousin-german to Stephen, had then a tender of the crown made him, upon condition that he would employ his authority in extirpating the christian religion out of Hungary. The ambitious prince came into the proposal, and promised to do his utmost in re-establishing the idolatrous worship of his deluded ancestors. Gerard, being informed of this impious bargain, thought his duty obliged him to remonstrate against the enormity of Andrew's crime, and persuade him to withdraw his promise. In this view he undertook to go to that prince, attended by three other prelates, full of a like zeal for religion. The new king was at Alba Regalis, but as the four bishops were going to cross the Danube, they were stopped by a party of soldiers posted there by order of a man of quality in the neighbourhood, remarkable for his aversion to the christian religion, and to Stephen's memory. They bore an attack with a shower of stones patiently, when the soldiers proceeding to greater outrages, beat them unmercifully, and at length dispatched them with lances. Their martyrdoms happened in the year 1045.

Stanislaus, bishop of Cracow, was descended from an illustrious Polish family. The piety of his parents was equal to their opulence, and the latter they rendered subservient to all the purposes of charity and benevolence. Stanislaus was their only child, and consequently the sole object of their parental affection. When he was of a proper age, they employed masters in several branches of learning to instruct him, and were happy to find, that his rapid improvement fully answered their most sanguine expectations. He had a penetrating genius, retentive memory, and solid understanding; hence study became his amusement, learning his delight, and books his beloved companions. Nor was his disposition inferior to his abilities; he was modest, mild, candid, and grave, temperate in his meals, and moderate in his sleep; he voluntarily gave himself, in the dawn of youth, to such austerities, as might have given reputation to a professed hermit. Having pursued his studies at home for some years, he was sent to a seminary of learning in Poland, and afterwards to the university of Paris, that his education might be completed in that celebrated seat of literature. After continuing seven years at Paris, he returned to his own country, and on the demise of his parents became possessed of a plentiful fortune. Sensible that riches constituted no part of a Christian's happiness, any further than as they enabled him to assist the needy; he devoted most of his property to charitable uses, retaining only a small portion for his own sustenance.

His views were now solely directed to the ministry; but he remained for some time undetermined, whether he should embrace a monastic life, or engage among the secular clergy. He was at length persuaded to the latter by Lambert Zula, bishop of Cracow, who gave him holy orders, and made him a canon of his cathedral. In this capacity he lived in a most pious and exemplary manner, and performed the duties of his function with unremitting assiduity and fervent devotion. Lambert could not help being charmed with the many virtues which so particularly distinguished Stanislaus, and would fain have resigned his bishopric to him. The reason he alleged for such resignation was his great age, but Stanislaus absolutely refused to accept of the see, for the contrary reason, viz. his want of years; for being then only thirty-six years old, he deemed that too early a time of life for a man to undertake the important care of a diocese. Lambert, however, made him his substitute upon various occasions, by which he became thoroughly acquainted with all that related to the bishopric. Lambert died on November 25, A. D. 1071, when all concerned in the choice of a successor declared for Stanislaus. But his former objection remained, and on account of his age, he declined the acceptance of the prelacy.

Determined however to conquer his scruples, the king, clergy, and nobility unanimously joined in writing to pope Alexander II. who at their entreaty sent an express order that Stanislaus should accept the bishopric. Thus commanded, he obeyed, and exerted himself to the utmost in the improvement of his flock. He was equally careful with respect both to clergy and laity; and exhorted the former to shew a good example as much as he did the latter to imitate it. He kept a list of all the poor in his diocese, and by feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and administering remedies to the sick, he proved himself not only the godly pastor, but the bodily physician, and generous benefactor.

Bolisslaus, the second king of Poland, had, by nature, many good qualities, but giving way too much to his passions he ran into many enormities. He daily grew worse and worse, and from being deemed a good king, at length had the appellation of CRUEL bestowed on him. The nobility were shocked at his conduct, but did not care to speak to him concerning it, and the clergy saw his proceedings with grief, but were afraid to reprehend him. Stanislaus alone had the courage to tell him of his faults, when taking a private opportunity he freely displayed to him the enormity of his crimes.

The king was greatly exasperated at this freedom, but awed by the virtues of the bishop, dissimulated his resentment, and appearing to be convinced of his errors, promised to reform his conduct. So far however from designing to perform his promise, he complained to some of his sycophants of the freedom that Stanislaus had taken with him; and they, to flatter his folly, condemned the boldness of the bishop. The king, soon after, attempted the chastity of a married lady, who rejected his offers with disdain; which piqued his pride so much, that he seized her by force, and violated her by compulsion. This greatly alarmed all the nobility: none knew how long his own wife, daughter, or sister might be safe; and each dreaded for the peace of his family. They, at length, assembled together, and calling the clergy to their assistance, entreated Peter, archbishop of Gnesne, to remonstrate to the king on the impropriety and vitiousness of his conduct; adding, that it was more particularly his business so to do, as primate of Poland.

The archbishop, however, declined the dangerous task; for though a man of some virtue, he was of a disposition uncommonly timid. Several other prelates sheltered themselves behind his refusal, and gave their fear the name of modesty, which would not permit them to undertake what their metropolitan had thought too great for his abilities. Stanislaus alone was, as before, the only one who had courage and zeal sufficient to perform what he looked upon as a most important and indispensable duty. He, therefore, put himself at the head of a select number of ecclesiastics, noblemen, and gentlemen; and, proceeding to court, addressed the king in a solemn and serious manner, and fully represented the heinousness of his crimes, and what would be the fatal consequences of his debaucheries.

The king had scarce patience to hear him out; and, as soon as he had done speaking flew into a violent passion, at once complaining of the want of respect to his royal dignity, and vowing revenge for what he called an insult to his person. Stanislaus, however, not in the least intimidated by his menaces, visited him twice more, and remonstrated with him in a similar manner, which so much exasperated the king, that he knew not how to contain himself.

The nobility and clergy, finding that the admonitions of the bishop had not the desired effect upon the king, thought proper to interpose between them. The nobility entreated the bishop to refrain from any more exasperating a monarch of so ferocious and untractable a temper; and the clergy endeavoured to persuade the king not to be offended with Stanislaus for his charitable remonstrances. Neither, however, succeeded, for the king remained as obstinate, and the bishop as zealous, as ever. The haughty sovereign, at length, determined, at any rate, to get rid of a prelate, who, in his opinion, was so extremely troublesome. Hearing one day that the bishop was by himself, in the chapel of St. Michael, at a small distance from the town, he dispatched some soldiers to murder him. The soldiers readily undertook the bloody task; but when they came into the presence of Stanislaus, the venerable aspect of the prelate struck them with such awe, that they could not perform what they had promised. On their return, the king, finding they had not obeyed his orders, stormed at them violently, snatched a dagger from one of them, and ran furiously to the chapel, where, finding Stanislaus at the altar, he plunged the weapon to his heart. The prelate immediately expired, on the 8th of May, A. D. 1079, receiving a crown of martyrdom, as a reward for his zeal.

An Account of the PERSECUTIONS of the WALDENSES, in FRANCE.

POPERY having brought various innovations into the church, and overspread the christian world with darkness and superstition, some few, who plainly perceived the pernicious tendency of such errors, determined to shew the light of the gospel in it's real purity, and to disperse those clouds which artful priests had raised about it, in order to blind the people, and obscure it's real brightness.

The principal among these was Berengarius, who, about the year 1000, boldly preached gospel truths according to their primitive purity. Many, from conviction, assented to his doctrine, and were, on that account, called Berengarians. To Berengarius succeeded Peter Bruis, who preached at Thoulouse, under the protection of an earl, named Hildephonus; and the whole tenets of the reformers, with the reasons of their separation from the church of Rome, were published in a book written by Bruis under the title of ANTICHRIST.

By the year of Christ 1140, the number of the reformed was very great, and the probability of their increasing alarmed the pope, who wrote to several princes to banish them their dominions, and employed many learned men to write against their doctrines.

A. D. 1147, Henry, of Thoulouse, being deemed their most eminent preacher, they were called Henricians; and as they would not admit of any proofs relative to religion, but what could be deduced from the scriptures themselves, the popish party gave them the name of Apostolics. At length, Peter Waldo, or Valdo, a native of Lyons, became a strenuous opposer of Popery: and from him the reformed, at that time, received the appellation of Waldenses, or Waldoys.

Peter Waldo was a man eminent for his learning, piety, and benevolence; so that his doctrines were admired by great numbers, and he was followed by multitudes. The bishop of Lyons taking umbrage at the freedom with which he treated the pope and the Romish clergy, sent to admonish him to refrain, in future, from such discourses. To which message Waldo returned this reply: "That he could not be silent in a cause of such importance as the salvation of men's souls; wherein he must obey God rather than man."

Waldo's principal accusations against the pope and Popery were, that the Roman-Catholics affirm the church of Rome to be the only infallible church of Christ upon earth; and that the pope is it's head, and the vicar of Christ: that they hold the absurd doctrine of transubstantiation, insisting, that the bread and wine given in the sacrament is the very identical body and blood of Christ which was nailed to the cross: that they believe there is a place called purgatory, where the souls of persons, after this life, are purged from the sins of mortality; and that the pains and penalties here inflicted may be abated according to the masses said by, and the money paid to the priests: that they teach, the communion of one kind, or the receiving the wafer only, is sufficient for the lay-people, though the clergy must be indulged with both bread and wine: that they pray to the Virgin Mary and saints, though their prayers ought to be immediately to God: that they pray for souls departed, though God decides the fate immediately on the decease of the person: that they will not perform the service of the church in a language understood by the people in general: that they place their devotion in the number of prayers, and not in the intent of the heart: that they forbid marriage to the clergy, though God allowed it; and that they use many things in baptism, though Christ used only water.

Pope Alexander the Third being informed of these transactions, excommunicated Waldo and his adherents, and commanded the bishop of Lyons to exterminate them, if possible, from the face of the earth; and hence began the papal persecutions against the Waldenses.

Before we describe the sufferings and martyrdom of the Waldenses, it is necessary to shew their tenets, which will explain how, and for what reason, they differed from the church of Rome:

1. That holy oil is not to be mingled in baptism.
2. That prayers used over things inanimate are superstitious.
3. Flesh may be eaten in Lent; the clergy may marry; and auricular confession is unnecessary.
4. Confirmation is no sacrament; we are not bound to pay obedience to the pope; ministers should live upon tithes; no dignity sets one clergyman above another, for their superiority can only be drawn from real worth.
5. Images in churches are absurd; image-worship is idolatry; the pope's indulgences ridiculous; and the miracles pretended to be done by the church of Rome are false.
6. Fornication and public stews ought not to be allowed; purgatory is a fiction; and deceased persons, called saints, ought not to be prayed to.
7. Extreme unction is not a sacrament; and masses, indulgences, and prayers are of no service to the dead.
8. The Lord's prayer ought to be the rule of all other prayers.

Waldo himself remained three years undiscovered in Lyons, though the utmost diligence was used to apprehend him. However, being greatly beloved, he was not betrayed; but at length found an opportunity of escaping from the place of his concealment to the mountains of Dauphiny. Waldo soon after found means to propagate his doctrines in Dauphiny and Picardy, which so exasperated Philip, king of France, that he put the latter province, as the most obnoxious of the two, under military execution; destroying above 300 gentlemen's seats, crasing some walled towns, burning many of of the reformed, and driving others into Flanders and Germany.

Notwithstanding these persecutions, the reformed religion seemed to flourish; and the Waldenses, in various parts, became more numerous than ever. Hence the pope accused them of heresy, and the monks with immorality; the first asserting that they had fallen into many errors, and the latter that they committed many bad practices. These flanders they, however, refuted in a modest publication, which at once defended the purity of their doctrines, and the piety of their lives.

The pope, incensed at their increase, used all manner of arts for their extirpation; such as excommunications, anathemas, canons, constitutions, decrees, &c. by which they were rendered incapable of holding places of trust, honour, or profit; their lands were seized, their goods confiscated, and they were not permitted to be buried in consecrated ground.

Some of the Waldenses having taken refuge in Spain, Aldephonsus, king of Arragon, at the instigation of the pope, published an edict, strictly ordering all Roman-Catholics to persecute them wherever they could be found; and decreeing that all who gave them the least assistance should be deemed traitors, and punished accordingly.

The year after this edict Aldephonsus was severely punished by the hand of Providence: for his son was defeated in a great battle, and 50,000 of his men slain, by which a considerable portion of his kingdom fell into the hands of the Moors.

Notwithstanding all the cruelties of the Papists, the reformed ministers preached boldly against the Romish church; and Peter Waldo, in particular, wherever he went, asserted,

1. That the pope was antichrist.
2. Mass was an abomination.
3. The host was an idol.
4. Purgatory was a fable.

These proceedings of Waldo, and the reformed, occasioned the first rise of inquisitors; for pope Innocent III. authorized certain monks inquisitors to inquire for, and deliver over, the reformed to the secular power. The monks greatly abused this authority; for, upon the least surmise or information, they delivered over the reformed to the magistrate, and the magistrate delivered them to the executioner; for the process was short, as an accusation was deemed adequate to guilt, and a candid trial was never granted to the accused.

The pope finding that these cruel means had not the intended effect, determined to try others of a more rational and mild nature. To this end he sent several learned monks to preach among the Waldenses, and to endeavour to argue them out of their opinions. Among these monks was one Dominic, who appeared extremely zealous in the cause of Popery. This Dominic instituted an order, which, from him, was called the order of Dominican friars; and the members of this order have ever since been the principal inquisitors in the various inquisitions in the world. The power of the inquisitors was unlimited; they proceeded against whom they pleased without any consideration of age, sex, or rank. Let the accusers be ever so infamous, the accusation was deemed valid; and even anonymous informations sent by letter were thought sufficient evidence. To be rich was a crime equal to heresy; therefore many who had money were accused of heresy, or of being favourers of heretics, that they might be obliged to pay for their opinions. The dearest friends or nearest kindred could not, without danger, serve any one who was imprisoned on account of religion. To convey to those who were confined, a little straw, or give them a cup of water, was called favouring of the heretics, and they were persecuted accordingly. No lawyer dared to plead even for his own brother, or notary register any thing in favour of the reformed; the malice of the Papists, indeed, went beyond the grave, and the bones of many Waldenses, who had been long dead, were dug up in order to be burnt, as examples to the living. If a man on his death-bed was accused of being a follower of Waldo, his estates were confiscated, and the heir to them defrauded of his inheritance; and some were even obliged to make pilgrimages to the Holy Land while the Dominicans took possession of their houses and properties, and when the owners returned would often pretend not to know them.

Enraudus, a knight, being accused of embracing the opinions of Waldo, was delivered to the secular power, and burnt at Paris, A. D. 1201. About the year 1228 such numbers of the reformed were apprehended, that the archbishops of Aix, Arles, and Narbonne, took compassion on them, and thus expressed themselves to the inquisitors. "We hear that you have apprehended such a multitude of the Waldenses, that it is not only impossible to defray the charge of their food and confinement, but to provide lime and stone to build prisons for them."

In the year 1380, a monk inquisitor, named Francis Boralli, had a commission granted him by pope Clement the seventh, to search for and punish the Waldenses in Aix, Ambrune, Geneva, Savoy, Orange, Arles, Vienne, Ambone, Venice, and Avignon.

Boralli opened his commission at Ambrune, and summoned all the inhabitants to appear before him. Those who appeared, and were found to be of the reformed religion, were immediately delivered over to the secular power, and burnt; and those who did not appear were excommunicated for contumacy, and had their effects confiscated. In the distribution of the effects, however, they provided well for the sons of the church; for the clergy had two thirds of every man's property who was condemned, and the secular power only one third. All the reformed inhabitants of the other places, named in the commission of this ecclesiastic, were equal sufferers; for devastations marked his journey, and his footsteps might be traced in blood.

In the year 1400, the Waldenses, who resided in the valley of Pragela, were, at the instigation of some priests, suddenly attacked by a body of troops, who plundered their houses, murdered many, and drove others into the Alps, where great numbers were frozen to death, it being in the depth of winter.

A. D. 1460, a prosecution was carried on in Dauphiny against the Waldenses, by the archbishop of Ambrune, who employed a monk, named John Vayleti; and this monk proceeded with such violence, that not only the Waldenses but even many Papists were sufferers. For if any Papists expressed compassion or pity for the inoffensive people, who were so cruelly treated, they were sure to be accused of favouring the Waldenses, and to be punished for commiserating the miseries of their fellow-creatures. At length Vayleti's proceedings became so intolerable, that a great number of the Papists themselves wrote a petition against him to Lewis the eleventh, king of France. The monarch, on receiving this petition, granted the request of the petitioners, and sent an express order to the governor of Dauphiny to stop the persecution.

Vayleti, however, by the order of the archbishop, still continued the persecution; for taking advantage of the last clause of the edict, he pretended that he did nothing contrary to the king's precept, who had ordered punishment to such as affirmed any thing against the holy catholic faith. This persecution at length concluded with the death of the archbishop, which happened A. D. 1487.

Pope Innocent the eighth, A. D. 1488, determined to persecute the Waldenses. To this end he sent one Albert de Capitaneis, archdeacon of Cremona, to France. When Albert arrived in Dauphiny, he craved the assistance of the king's lieutenant to exterminate the Waldenses from the valley of Loyse. The lieutenant very readily granted his assistance, and marched a body of troops to the place. When they arrived at the valley, they found that it had been deserted by the inhabitants, who had retired to the mountains, and hid themselves in caves, caverns, &c. The archdeacon and lieutenant immediately followed them with the troops, and catching many, they cast them headlong from precipices, by which they were dashed to pieces. Several, however, retired retired to the further parts of the caverns, and knowing the intricacies better than the troops, they were able to conceal themselves. The archdeacon and lieutenant, not being able to come at them, ordered the mouths of the caves to be filled with faggots, which being lighted, those within were suffocated. On the caves being afterwards searched, 400 infants were found smothered, either in their cradles or their mother's arms; and, upon the whole, about 3000 men, women, and children, were destroyed in this persecution.

Having completed this tragical work, the lieutenant and archdeacon proceeded with the troops to Pragelo and Frassaniere, in order to persecute the Waldenses in those parts. But these having heard of the fate of their brethren in the valley of Loyle, thought proper to arm themselves; and by fortifying the different passes, and bravely disputing the passages through them, they so harassed the troops, that the lieutenant was compelled to retire without effecting his purpose.

In 1594, Anthony Fabri, and Christopher de Salicence, having a commission to persecute the Waldenses of Dauphiny, put some to death, sequestered the estates of others, and confiscated the goods and chattels of many; but Lewis the twelfth coming to the crown in 1598, on the decease of his predecessor, the Waldenses petitioned him for a restitution of their properties. The king determined to have the affair impartially canvassed, and to this end sent a commissioner of his own, together with a commissary from the pope, to make the proper inquiries. The witness against the Waldenses having been examined, the innocence of those poor people evidently appeared, and the king's commissioner in particular declared, "That he only desired to be as good a Christian as the worst of them." When this favourable report was made to the king, he immediately gave orders that the Waldenses should have their property restored to them. The archbishop of Ambrune, having the greatest quantity of these poor people's goods, it was generally imagined that he would set a laudable example to others, by being the first to restore them. The archbishop, however, to the surprise of the people in general, and to the affliction of the Waldenses in particular, declared, that he would not restore any of the property alluded to, for they were incorporated with, and became part of his archbishopric itself. He, however, with an affectation of some small degree of candour, offered to relinquish several vineyards, of which he had dispossessed the Waldenses, provided, at the same time, the lords of Dauphiny would restore all they had taken from those poor people. This the lords absolutely refused, for they were as fond of keeping their ill-got plunder as the archbishop himself.

The Waldenses finding, by these mean subterfuges, and unjust proceedings, that they were not likely to recover any of their property, without something further being done, again appealed to the king. The monarch having attended to their complaints, wrote to the archbishop; but that artful and avaricious prelate replied, "That at the commencement of the persecution the Waldenses had been excommunicated by the pope, in consequence of which their goods were distrained; therefore, till the sentence of excommunication was taken off, which had occasioned them to be seized, they could not be restored with propriety, or consistent with the respect due to the pontiff." This plea was allowed to be reasonable; and application was ineffectually made to the pope to remove the sentence of excommunication; for the archbishop, supposing this would be the case, had used all his interest at the court of Rome, to prevent such application from succeeding. Thus were the poor Waldenses robbed of their property, only because they would not sacrifice their consciences to the will of their inhuman persecutors.

The Waldenses having spread from Dauphiny into several other provinces, became very numerous in Provence. At their first arrival, Provence was almost a desert, but by their great industry it soon abounded with corn, wine, oil, fruit, &c.

The pope, by being often near them at his seat at Avignon, heard occasionally many things concerning their differing from the church of Rome. His intelligence greatly exasperated him, and he determined to have them persecuted on account of their religious tenets. Proceeding to some extremities, under the sanction of his ecclesiastical authority, only without consulting the king of France, the latter became alarmed, and sent his master of requests, and his confessor, to examine into the affair. On their return they reported that the Waldenses were not such dangerous or bad people as they had been represented; that they lived with perfect honesty, were friendly to all, hurt none, caused their children to be baptized, had them taught the Lord's prayer, creed, and ten commandments; expounded the scriptures with purity, kept the Lord's-day sacred, feared God, honoured the king, and wished well to the state. Then, said the king, they are much better Christians than myself or my catholic subjects, and therefore they shall not be persecuted: the king was as good as his word, and sent orders to stop the persecution accordingly.

Some time after, the inhabitants of Merindol received a summons, that the heads of the families of that town should appear before the ecclesiastical court. When they appeared, and confessed themselves Waldenses, they were ordered to be burnt, their families outlawed, their habitations laid waste, and the woods that surrounded the town to be cut down, two hundred paces each way; so that the whole should be rendered desolate. The king however, being informed of this barbarous decree, sent to countermand the execution of it: but his order was suppressed by cardinal Tournon, and the greatest cruelties were consequently exercised.

The president of Opede sent several companies of soldiers to burn some villages that were occupied by Protestants, which they performed; and, without the least respect to sex or age, murdered the men immediately, ravished the women, cut off the breasts of mothers, and then suffered the infants to famish, &c. &c. The president likewise proclaimed, that none should give any manner of assistance, or sustenance, to the Waldenses.

Going to another small town, the president found there only a boy, who had surrendered himself to a soldier, for the other inhabitants had deserted the place. The boy he ordered to be shot by the soldier to whom he had surrendered, and then destroyed every house in the place.

After this the president marched against Cabrières, and began to cannonade it. At this time there were not above sixty poor peasants, with their families, in the town; and they sent him word, that he need not expend powder and shot upon the place, as they were willing to open the gates, and surrender, provided they might be permitted to retire, with their families, to Geneva, or Germany. This was promised them; but the gates were no sooner opened, than the president ordered all the men to be cut to pieces; which cruel command was executed with the utmost barbarity. Several women and children were crammed into a large barn, which was set fire to, and every one perished in the flames. Other women and children having taken refuge in a church, the president ordered one of his officers to go in and kill them all: the captain, at first, refused, saying, "Such unnecessary cruelty is unbecoming a military man." The president, being displeased at this reply, said, "I charge you, on pain of being accused of mutiny, immediately to obey my orders:" when the captain, afraid of the consequences of such a reply, thought proper to comply, and make a sacrifice of humanity to the fear of military punishment.

The president then sent a detachment of his troops to ravage the town of Costa, which design was accomplished with the greatest barbarity, and cruelties were exercised, shocking both to modesty and nature.

At length, the judgment of God overtook this monster of cruelty, the president; for he was, at once, afflicted with a dreadful bloody-flux, and a painful strangury. In this extremity he sent for a surgeon from Arles, who, on examining his disorders, told him they were of a singular nature, and much worse than he had ever seen them them on any other person. He then took an occasion to reprehend him for his cruelties, and told him, that unless he repented, he might expect that the hand of heaven would fall still heavier upon him. On hearing these words, the president flew into a violent passion, and ordered his attendants to seize upon the surgeon as an heretic.

The surgeon was seized, but found means to escape, and soon after the president's disorder increased to a most terrible degree. As he before found some little ease from the surgeon, he again sent to him, for he had been informed of the place of his retirement. His message was accompanied with an apology for his former behaviour, and a promise of personal security. The surgeon forgiving what was past, went to him, but too late to be of any service; for he found the president raving like a madman, and crying out, that he had a fire within him. After storming and blaspheming for some time, he expired in the most dreadful agonies; and his body in a few hours, became so offensive, that hardly any one could endure the stench.

John de Roma, a monk, having a commission from the pope to search for heretics, he executed it with great severity in Provence. The king of France hearing of his proceedings, sent an order to the parliament of Provence to apprehend him; but the monk made his escape to Avignon, and thought to live luxuriously upon what he had plundered from the Waldenses. But in this he was mistaken, for some robbers soon after plundered him of the greatest part of his ill-got wealth; and his grief on this account brought on a violent disorder, which, by turning him, even while living, into a mere mass of putrefaction, soon put a period to his existence.

The bishop of Aix, with some priests, being at Avignon together, were one day walking along the streets with some courtizans. Seeing a man who sold obscene pictures, they purchased several, and presented them to the women. Close by was a bookseller, who had a great number of Bibles in the French language for sale. The bishop stepping up to him, said, "How darest thou be so bold as to sell French merchandize in this town?" The bookseller replied, with a kind of sneer, "My lord, do you not think that Bibles are as good as those pictures which you have bought for the ladies?" Enraged at the sarcasm, the bishop exclaimed, "I'll renounce my place in paradise if this fellow is not one of the Waldenses. Take him away, take him away, take him away to prison." These expressions occasioned him to be terribly used by the rabble; and the next day he was brought before the judge, who, at the instigation of the bishop, condemned him to the flames. He was accordingly burnt, with two Bibles hanging from his neck, the one before and the other behind.

An Account of the PERSECUTIONS of the ALBIGENSES.

THE Albigenes were people of the reformed religion, who inhabited the country of Albi. They were condemned on the score of religion, in the council of Lateran, by order of pope Alexander the Third. Nevertheless they increased so prodigiously, that many cities were inhabited by persons only of their persuasion, and several eminent noblemen embraced their doctrines. Among the latter were Raymond, earl of Thoulouse, Raymond, earl of Foix, the earl of Beziers, &c. The pope, at length, pretended that he wished to draw them to the Romish faith by sound argument and clear reasoning, and for this end ordered a general disputation, in which, however, the popish doctors were entirely overcome by the arguments of Arnold, a reformed clergyman, whose reasons were so strong, that they were compelled to confess their force.

A friar, named Peter, having been murdered in the dominions of the earl of Thoulouse, the pope made the murder a pretence to persecute that nobleman and his subjects. To effect this, he sent persons throughout all Europe, in order to raise forces to act coercively against the Albigenes, and promised paradise to all that would come to this war, which he termed a Holy War, and bear arms for forty days. The same indulgences were likewise held out to all who entered themselves for this purpose, as to such as engaged in crusades to the Holy Land.

The pope then sent orders to all archbishops, bishops, &c. to excommunicate the earl of Thoulouse every sabbath and festival; at the same time absolving all his subjects from their oaths of allegiance to him, and commanding them to pursue his person, possess his lands, destroy his property, murder such of his subjects as continued faithful to him, &c. &c.

The earl of Thoulouse hearing of these mighty preparations against him, wrote to the pope in a very candid manner, desiring not to be condemned unheard, and assuring him that he had not the least hand in Peter's death: for that friar was killed by a gentleman, who immediately after the murder fled out of his territories, or otherwise he would have punished him as the crime deserved.

But arguments were in vain: for the pope, being determined on his destruction, was resolved not to hear reason. A formidable army, with several noblemen and prelates at the head of it, began their march against the Albigenes. The earl had only the alternative, to oppose force by force, or submit. As he despaired of success in attempting the former, he determined on the latter. The pope's legate being at Valence, the earl repaired thither, and said, "He was surprised that such a number of armed men should be sent against him; before the least proof of his guilt had been deduced. He therefore came voluntarily to surrender himself, armed only with the testimony of a good conscience, and hoped that the troops would be prevented from plundering his innocent subjects, as he thought himself a sufficient pledge for any vengeance they chose to take on account of the death of the friar."

To this reasonable proposal the legate replied, that he was very glad the earl had voluntarily surrendered; but, with respect to the proposal, he could not pretend to countermand the orders to the troops, unless he would consent to deliver up seven of his best fortified castles, as securities for his future behaviour.

This demand made the earl perceive his error in submitting, but it was too late; he knew himself to be a prisoner, and therefore sent an order for the delivery of the castles. The pope's legate had no sooner garrisoned these places, than he ordered the respective governors to appear before him. When they came, he said; "That the earl of Thoulouse having delivered up his castles to the pope, they must consider that they were now the pope's subjects, and not the earl's; and that they must therefore act conformable to their new allegiance."

The governors were greatly astonished to see their lord thus in chains, and themselves compelled into a new allegiance, so much against their inclinations and consciences. But what afflicted them still more, was the affronts afterwards put upon the earl; for he was stripped naked, except his drawers, led nine times round the grave of friar Peter, and severely scourged before all orders of people. Not contented with this, they obliged him to swear that he would be obedient to the pope during the remainder of his life; conform to the church of Rome; and make irreconcilable war against the Albigenes. The legate even went further than this; and ordered him, by the oaths he had newly taken, to join the troops, and inspect the siege of Beziers. But thinking this too hard an injunction, he took an opportunity privately to quit the army, and determined to go to the pope, and relate all the ill usage he had received. The army, however, proceeded to besiege Beziers; and the earl of Beziers, who was likewise governor of that city, thinking it impossible to defend the place, came out, and presenting himself before the pope's legate, implored mercy for the inhabitants; intimating at the same time, that there were as many Roman-Catholics as Albigenes in the city. The legate replied, that all excuses availed nothing; that the place must be delivered delivered up at discretion, or the most dreadful consequences should ensue.

The earl of Beziers returning into the city, told the inhabitants he could obtain no mercy, unless the Albigenes would abjure their religion, and conform to the worship of the church of Rome. The Roman-Catholics pressed the Albigenes to comply with this request; but the Albigenes nobly answered, that they would not forsake their religion for the base price of their frail life: that God was able, if he pleased, to defend them; but if he would be glorified by the confession of their faith, it would be a great honour to them to die for his sake. That they had rather displease the pope, who could but kill their bodies, than God, who could cast both body and soul into hell.

The popish parties finding their importunities ineffectual, sent their bishop to the pope's legate, beseeching him not to include them in the chastisement of the Albigenes; and representing, that the best means to win the latter over to the Roman-Catholic persuasion was by gentle means, and not by rigour. The legate, upon hearing this, flew into a violent passion with the bishop, and declared, that "If all the city did not acknowledge their fault, they should taste of one curse without distinction of religion, sex, or age."

The inhabitants refusing to yield upon such terms, a general assault was given, and the place taken by storm; when it is impossible for the imagination to paint a more horrid scene than now ensued. Every cruelty that barbarous superstition could devise was practised; nothing was to be heard but the groans of men who lay weltering in their blood; the lamentations of mothers who were doubly wounded, wounded in the body by the spears of the soldiers, and to the soul, by having their children taken from them, and dashed to pieces before their faces. The complaints of violated maidens and ravished matrons, the cries of helpless infants, and the execrations of the barbarians who committed these cruelties, added to the sounds of horror. The city being fired in various parts, new scenes of confusion arose; in several places the streets were streaming with blood; here lofty buildings appeared in clouds of smoke, and there large ranges of houses were seen in flames. Those who hid themselves in the recesses of their dwellings, had only the dreadful alternative to remain and perish in the flames, or rush out and fall by the swords of the soldiers. The bloody legate, during these infernal proceedings, seemed to enjoy the carnage, and even cried out to the troops, "Kill them, kill them all, kill man, woman, and child; kill Roman-Catholics as well as Albigenes, for when they are dead the Lord knows how to pick out his own." Thus the beautiful city of Beziers was reduced to a heap of ruins; and 60,000 persons of different ages, and both sexes, were murdered upon the occasion.

The earl of Beziers and a few others made their escape, and went to Carcasson, which they put into the best posture of defence they could. The legate, not to lose an opportunity of spilling blood during the forty days which the troops were to serve, led them immediately against Carcasson. As soon as the place was invested, a furious assault was given, but the besiegers were repulsed with great slaughter; and upon this occasion the earl of Beziers gave the most distinguished proofs of his courage, saying, to encourage the besieged, "We had better die fighting than fall into the hands of such bigoted and bloody enemies."

It is to be observed, that two miles from the city of Carcasson there was a small town of the same name, which the Albigenes had likewise fortified. The legate, being enraged at the repulse he had received from the city of Carcasson, determined to wreak his vengeance upon the town. The next morning he made a general assault; and, though the place was bravely defended, the legate took it by storm, put all within it to the sword, and then burnt the town.

During these transactions the king of Arragon arrived at the camp, and after paying his obedience to the legate, told him, he understood the earl of Beziers, his kinsman, was in the city of Carcasson, and that, if he would grant him permission, he would go thither, and endeavour to make him sensible of the duty he owed both to the pope and church. The legate readily acquiescing, the king immediately repaired to the earl, and, among other questions, asked him from what motives he shut himself up in that city, and against so great an army? The earl answered, it was to defend his life, goods, and subjects; that he knew the pope, under pretence of religion, resolved to destroy his uncle, the earl of Thoulouse, and himself; that he saw the cruelty which they had used at Beziers, even against the priests; adding also what they had done to the town of Carcasson, and that they must look for no mercy from the legate or his army; he, therefore, rather chose to die, defending himself with his subjects, than fall into the hands of so inexorable an enemy as the legate: that though he had in his city some that were of another religion, yet they were such as had not wronged any, were come to his succour in his greatest extremity, and for their good service he was resolved not to abandon them; that his trust was in God, the defender of the oppressed; and that he would assist them against those ill-advised men, who forsook their own houses to burn, sack, and kill other men without reason, judgment, or mercy.

The king reported to the legate what the earl had said: the legate, after considering for some time, replied, "For your sake, sir, I will receive the earl of Beziers to mercy, and with him twelve others shall be safe, and be permitted to retire with their property: but as for the rest, I am determined to have them at my discretion."

This answer displeased the king; and when the earl heard it, he absolutely refused to comply with such terms. The legate then commanded another assault, but his troops were again repulsed with great slaughter, and the dead bodies occasioned a stench that was exceedingly offensive both to the besieged and besiegers.

The legate, being shagrin'd at this second disappointment, determined to act by stratagem. He therefore sent a gentleman, who was well skilled in dissimulation and artifice, to the earl of Beziers, with a seeming friendly message. The design was, by any means, to induce the earl to leave the city, in order to have an interview with the legate; and to this end the gentleman was to promise, or swear, whatever he thought proper; for, says the legate, "Swear to what falsehoods you will in such a cause, as I will give you absolution."

Unfortunately, this infamous plot succeeded: for the earl, believing the promises made him of personal security, and crediting the solemn oaths that the perjured agent swore upon the occasion, left the city and went with him. The legate no sooner saw him, than he told him "He was a prisoner, and must remain so till Carcasson was surrendered, and the inhabitants taught their duty to the pope."

The earl on hearing this, cried out that he was betrayed, and exclaimed against the treachery of the legate, and perjury of the person he had employed. His complaints, however, availed him nothing, for he was ordered into close confinement, and the place summoned to surrender immediately.

The people, on receiving the summons, and hearing of the captivity of the earl, were thrown into the utmost consternation, when one of the citizens begging to be heard, informed the rest, "That he had been formerly told by some old men, that there was a very capacious subterraneous passage, which led from thence to the castle of Cameret, at three leagues distance. If (continued he) we can find this passage, we may all escape before the legate can be apprized of our flight."

This information was joyfully received; all were employed to search for the passage, and at length, it was happily found. In the beginning of the evening the inhabitants began their flight, taking with them their wives, children, a few days provisions, and such moveables as were most valuable and portable. They reached the castle by the morning, and escaped to Arragon, Catalonia, and such other places as they thought would secure them from the power of the bloody legate.

In the morning the troops were strangely astonished, not hearing any noise, nor seeing any man stirring in the city; yet they approached the walls with much fear, lest it should be but a stratagem to endanger them; but finding no opposition they mounted the walls, crying out, that the Albigenes were fled; and thus was the city, with all the spoils, taken, and the earl of Beziers committed to prison in one of the strongest towers of Carcasson, where he soon after died.

The legate being now in possession of the city, called all the prelates, and great lords of his army together, telling them, that though it was requisite there should be always a legate in the army, yet it was likewise necessary that there should be a secular general, wise and valiant, to command in all their affairs, &c. This charge was first offered to the duke of Burgongue, then to the earl of Ennevers, and thirdly, to the earl of St. Paul; but they all refused it. At length, it was offered to Simon, earl of Montfort, who, after some excuses, accepted of it.

Four thousand men were left to garrison Carcasson, and the deceased earl of Beziers was succeeded in title and dignity by earl Simon, a bigoted Roman-Catholic, who threatened vengeance on the Albigenes, unless they conformed to the worship of the church of Rome.

The king of Arragon, however, who was in his heart of the reformed persuasion, secretly encouraged the Albigenes; and gave them hopes, that if they acted with prudence, they might cast off the yoke of the tyrannical earl Simon. They took his advice, and while Simon was gone to Montpellier, they surprised some of his fortresses, and were successful in several expeditions against his officers.

These proceedings so enraged earl Simon, that returning from Montpellier, he collected together some forces, marched against the Albigenes, and ordered every prisoner he took to be immediately burnt. Failing, however, in some of his enterprizes, he grew disheartened, and wrote to every Roman-Catholic power in Europe, to send him some assistance, otherwise he should not be able to hold out against the Albigenes.

Having received some succours, he attacked the castle of Beron, and making himself master of it, ordered the eyes to be put out, and the noses to be cut off, of all the garrison, one person alone excepted, and he was deprived of one eye only, that he might conduct the rest to Cabaret.

Being joined by some additional forces, earl Simon undertook the siege of Menerbe, which, on account of the want of water, was obliged to yield to him. The lord of Termes, the governor, was put in prison, where he died; his wife, sister, and daughter, were burnt; and one hundred and eighty others were committed to the flames. Many other castles surrendered to the forces of earl Simon, and the inhabitants were butchered in a manner equally inhuman.

It is now necessary to take some notice of the earl of Thoulouse, who by means of letters of recommendation from the king of France, after many difficulties, was reconciled to the pope: at least the pope pretended to give him remission for the death of friar Peter, and to absolve him from all other crimes he had committed.

The legate, however, by the connivance of the pope, did all he could to ruin the earl of Thoulouse. Some altercations having passed between them, the legate excommunicated the earl; and the Roman-Catholic bishop of Thoulouse, upon this encouragement, thought proper to send this imprudent message to the earl, "That as he was an excommunicated person, he commanded him to depart the city; for an ecclesiastic could not say mass with propriety, while a person of such a description was so near him."

The earl was greatly exasperated at the bishop's insolence, and sent him an order immediately to depart from the place on pain of death. This order was all the prelate wanted, and was what he wished for, as it would give him some shadow of a reason to complain of that nobleman.

The bishop with the canons of the cathedral church marched out of the city in solemn procession, barefooted and bareheaded, taking with them the cross, banner, host, &c. and proceeded in that manner to the legate's army. Here they were received with great respect as persecuted martyrs, and the legate thought this a sufficient excuse to proceed against the earl of Thoulouse, for having as he termed it, relapsed from the truth. The legate attempted to get him into his power by stratagem, but the earl being apprized of the design, escaped the snare.

Enraged at his disappointment, the legate laid siege to the castle of Montferrand, which belonged to the earl, and was governed by Baldwin his brother. On the first summons, Baldwin not only surrendered, but abjured his religion, and turned Papist. This stroke, which severely afflicted the earl of Thoulouse, was followed by another that gave him still greater mortification; for his old friend the king of Arragon forsook his interest; and it was stipulated, that the king of Arragon's daughter should be married to earl Simon's eldest son. The legate's troops were then joined by the forces of Arragon and those belonging to earl Simon, when they jointly laid siege to Thoulouse.

The earl of Thoulouse determined to interrupt the besiegers by frequent sallies. In the first of these he met with a severe repulse; but in the second he took earl Simon's son prisoner, and in the third he unhorsed earl Simon himself. After several furious assaults given by the popish army, and some other successful sallies of the Albigenes, the earl of Thoulouse compelled his enemies to raise the siege. In their retreat they did much mischief in the countries through which they passed, and put many defenceless Albigenes to death.

The earl of Thoulouse now did all he could to recover the friendship of the king of Arragon, and as the marriage ceremony between that monarch's daughter, and earl Simon's son, had not been performed, he entreated him to break off that preposterous match, and proposed another more proper, viz. that his own eldest son and heir to the earldom of Thoulouse should wed the princess of Arragon, and that by this match their friendship should be again united and more firmly cemented.

The king of Arragon was easily persuaded, not only to come into this proposal, but to form a league with the principal Albigenes, and to put himself as captain general at the head of their united forces, consisting of his own people, and of the troops of the earls of Thoulouse, Foix, and Comminges. The Papists were greatly alarmed at these proceedings; earl Simon sent all over Christendom to engage the assistance of the Roman-Catholic powers, and the pope's legate began hostilities by entering the dominions of the earl of Foix, and committing the most cruel depredations.

The army of the Albigenes being ready to take the field, the king of Arragon began his operations by laying siege to Murat, a town near Thoulouse, belonging to the Roman-Catholics, strongly fortified, and pleasantly situated upon the river Garonne. Earl Simon, by forced marches, came to the assistance of the place; and unfortunately the king of Arragon, who kept up very little discipline in his army, was feasting and revelling, at a time when all his attention was requisite. Earl Simon suddenly attacked the Albigenes, while they were in confusion, when the united forces of the reformed were defeated, and the king of Arragon himself was slain. The loss of this battle was imputed to the negligence of the king of Arragon, who kept up no manner of order in his army, and was as fond of entertainment in a camp, as if he had been securely at peace in a palace.

Flushed with this victory, the popish commanders declared they would entirely root out and extirpate the whole race of the Albigenes; and earl Simon sent an insolent message to the earls of Thoulouse, Foix, and Comminges, to deliver to him all the castles and fortresses of which they were possessed. Those noblemen did not think proper to return an answer to the demand, but retired to their respective territories, in order to put them into the best posture of defence.

Earl

Earl Simon marched towards the city of Thoulouse, when the earl of Thoulouse, who had retired to Montalban, sent word to the citizens of the former place, to make the best terms they could with the Roman-Catholics, as he was confident they could not hold out a siege; but at the same time recommended them to preserve their hearts for him, though they surrendered their persons to another. The citizens of Thoulouse, upon receiving this intimation, sent deputies to earl Simon, with offers of immediate surrender, provided the city itself, and the persons and properties of its inhabitants, should be perfectly safe, and protected from devastations or injury.

These conditions were agreed to immediately, and earl Simon, in order to ingratiate himself at court, wrote a letter to prince Lewis, the son of Philip, king of France, informing him that the city of Thoulouse had offered to surrender to him; but being willing that the prince should have the honour of receiving the keys, and taking the homage of the people, he begged that he would repair to the camp for that purpose.

Prince Lewis, pleased with the invitation, went directly to the army, and had the city of Thoulouse surrendered to him in form. The pope's legate, however, was greatly displeased at the mild conditions granted to the people of Thoulouse, and insisted, that though the prince might take upon him the sovereignty of the place, and receive the homage of the people, yet the plunder belonged to the holy pilgrims (for so the popish soldiers employed in these expeditions were called); and that the place, as a receptacle of heretics, ought to be dismantled.

In vain did the prince and earl Simon, remonstrate against such harsh proceedings, so contrary to the conditions granted at the surrender of the place: the legate was peremptory, when earl Simon, and the prince, unwilling to come to an open rupture with him, gave up the point, and suffered him to do as he pleased. The legate immediately sent his holy pilgrims, as he termed them, to work, when they presently dismantled the city, and plundered the inhabitants: thus the poor people were stripped of all their property, at a time they thought themselves perfectly secured, by the articles of the treaty of surrender.

The pope's legate finding that among the Albigenes were many lucrative places, which would of course fall to the disposal of the prince, he determined, by an artifice, to deprive him of any advantage which might accrue from thence; for he thought the Romish church ought to engross and monopolize every thing that was valuable. To this end he gave absolution to the Albigenes, which, though they had not in the least changed their religious opinions, he cunningly called reconciling them to the church. The prince, not apprized of this stratagem, was going to put such of his officers as he thought merited encouragement, into the possession of some places of profit; when, to his great astonishment, the legate informed him, that he had no power to dispose of those places. The prince demanded an explanation of his meaning. "My meaning (replied the legate) is, that the people have received absolution, and being reconciled to, are consequently under the protection of, the church; therefore, all places among, or connected with them, are in the disposal of the church only."

The prince, though offended at this curious mode of reasoning, and highly displeased at the meanness of the subterfuge, thought proper, at that time, to dissemble his resentment. Determined, however, to quit the legate, he put the troops that were under his command in motion, and marched to attack some other fortresses; but he found, wherever he came, that the legate had played the same trick, and plainly perceived, if he continued his military operations, that when unsuccessful, he should bear all the blame, and when successful, the legate would run away with all the profit. These considerations convinced him of the folly of remaining longer in the army; he therefore left it in disgust, and returned to court.

Earl Simon now, with his own forces, those the prince had just quitted, and some other auxiliaries, undertook the siege of Foix, being provoked to it by two reasons, viz. the death of his brother, who was slain by the earl of Foix, who was of the reformed persuasion. He lay before the castle of Foix for the space of ten days, during which time he frequently assaulted it, but was as often repulsed. Hearing that an army of Arragonians were in full march towards him, in order to revenge the death of their king, he raised the siege of Foix, and went to meet them. The earl of Foix immediately sallied out and harassed his rear, and the Arragonians attacking his front, gave him a total defeat, which compelled him to shut himself up in Carcasson.

The pope's legate called a council at Montpellier, for renewing the military operations against the Albigenes, and for doing proper honour to earl Simon, who was present; for the Arragonians not taking advantage of their victory, had neglected to block up Carcasson, by which omission earl Simon had the liberty to repair to Montpellier.

At the council the legate, in the pope's name, paid many compliments to earl Simon, and declared, that he should be prince of all the countries that might in future be taken from the Albigenes: at the same time, by order of the pontiff, he styled him, The active and dextrous soldier of Jesus Christ, and the invincible defender of the Catholic faith. But just as the earl was going to return thanks for these great honours, and fine encomiums, a messenger brought word, that the people having heard earl Simon was in the council, had taken up arms, and were coming thither to destroy him as a common disturber.

This threw the whole council into great confusion; and earl Simon, though a minute before styled an Invincible Defender of the Faith, was glad to jump out of a window, and steal away from the city by the most private passages.

The affair becoming serious, according to the opinions of the Papists, the pope himself soon after called a council, to be held at Lateran, in which great powers were granted to Roman-Catholic inquisitors, and many Albigenes were immediately put to death. This council of Lateran likewise confirmed to earl Simon all the honours intended him by the council of Montpellier, and empowered him to raise another army against the Albigenes.

Earl Simon immediately repaired to court, received his investiture from the French king, and began to levy forces. Having raised a considerable number of troops, he determined if possible, to exterminate the Albigenes, when he received advice, that his countess was besieged in Narbonne, by the earl of Thoulouse. Earl Simon proceeded to the relief of his wife, when the Albigenes met him, gave him battle, and defeated him. He, however, found means to escape from the fight, and get into the castle of Narbonne.

During earl Simon's misfortunes, Thoulouse was recovered by the Albigenes; but the pope still espousing earl Simon's cause, raised forces on his account, and enabled him, once more, to undertake the siege of that city. The earl assaulted the place furiously, but being repulsed with great loss, he seemed sunk in affliction: when the pope's legate said, to comfort him, "Fear nothing, my lord, make another vigorous attack; let us by any means recover the city, and destroy the inhabitants; and those of our men who are slain in the fight, I will assure you shall immediately pass into paradise." One of earl Simon's principal officers, on hearing this, said with a sneer, "Monsieur Cardinal, you talk with great assurance; but if the earl believes you, he will, as heretofore, pay dearly for his confidence."

Earl Simon, however, took the legate's advice, made another assault, and was again repulsed. To complete his misfortune, before the troops could recover from their confusion, the earl of Foix made his appearance at the head of a formidable body of forces, and attacking the already dispirited army of earl Simon, easily put them to the rout; when the earl himself narrowly escaped being drowned in the Garonne, into which which he had hastily plunged, in order to avoid being apprehended.

Now this misfortune almost broke earl Simon's heart; but the pope's legate had him yet be of good cheer, for he would raise him another army; which promise, with some difficulty, and three years delay, he at length performed, and that bigoted nobleman was, once more, enabled to take the field. He bent his whole force against Thoulouse, which he besieged for the space of nine months, when in one of the sallies made by the besieged, his horse was wounded. The animal being in great anguish, ran away with him, and bore him directly under the ramparts of the city, when an archer taking aim, shot him in the thigh with an arrow; and a woman immediately after throwing a large stone from the wall, it struck him upon the head, and killed him instantly. Upon the death of the earl, the siege was raised; but the legate, greatly enraged to be disappointed of his wished-for vengeance on the inhabitants of that devoted city, engaged the king of France in the cause, who sent his son to besiege it. The French prince, with some chosen troops, furiously assaulted Thoulouse, but meeting with a severe repulse, he grew sick of the enterprize, and abandoned Thoulouse to besiege Miromand. This place he soon took by storm, and put to the sword all the inhabitants, consisting of 5000 men, women, and children.

Bertrand (for that was the legate's name) being very old, grew weary of following the army; but his passion for blood-spilling still remained, as appears by his epistle to the pope, in which he begs to be recalled, on account of his age and infirmities; but entreats the pontiff to appoint a successor, who might continue the wars, as he had done, with spirit and perseverance.

Accordingly, the pope recalled Bertrand, and appointed Conrad, bishop of Portua, to be legate in his room. The new legate determined to tread in the steps of his predecessor, and to persecute the Albigenes with the greatest severity. Guido, earl of Monfort, the son and heir of earl Simon, undertook the command of the troops, and immediately laid siege to Thoulouse, before the walls of which he was slain. His brother Almerick succeeded to the command; but he was soon obliged to raise the siege by the spirited conduct of the besieged.

Thereupon the legate prevailed upon the king of France to undertake the siege of Thoulouse in person, and reduce to the obedience of the church those obstinate heretics, as he thought proper to call the brave Albigenes. Hearing of the great preparations made by the king of France, the earl of Thoulouse sent the women, children, cattle, &c. into secret and secure places in the mountains, ploughed up the land, that the king's forces should not obtain any forage, and did all that a skilful general could perform to save his country, and distress the enemy. By these wise regulations the French army, soon after entering the earldom of Thoulouse, suffered all the extremities of famine, which obliged the troops to feed on the carcases of horses, on dead dogs, cats, &c. which unwholesome food produced the plague. This complicated distress broke the king's heart; nevertheless, his son, who succeeded him, determined to carry on the war, but was defeated in three several engagements by the earl of Thoulouse.

However, the king, the queen-mother, and three archbishops, raised another formidable army, and had the art to persuade the earl of Thoulouse to come to a conference, when he was treacherously seized upon, made a prisoner, forced to appear bare-footed and bare-headed before his enemies, and compelled to subscribe to the unreasonable and ignominious conditions which follow:

1. That he should abjure the faith he had hitherto defended.
2. That he should be subject to the church of Rome.
3. That he should give his daughter Joan in marriage to one of the brothers of the king of France.
4. That he should maintain in Thoulouse six popish professors of the liberal arts, and two grammarians.

5. That he should take upon him the cross, and serve five years against the Saracens in the Holy Land.

6. That he should level the walls of Thoulouse with the ground.

7. That he should destroy the walls and fortifications of thirty of his other cities and castles, as the legate should direct.

8. That he should remain prisoner in the Louvre at Paris, till his daughter was delivered to the king's commissioners.

These cruel conditions were followed by a severe persecution against the Albigenes (many of whom suffered for the faith) and express orders, that the laity should not be permitted to read the sacred writings.

The persecution against the Albigenes was very great in the year 1620. At a town called Tell, while the minister was preaching to a congregation of the reformed, the Papists attacked and murdered many of the people. A lady of considerable eminence, being exhorted to change her religion, if not for her own sake, at least for the sake of the infant she held in her arms, the lady, with an undaunted courage, said, "I did not quit Italy, my native country, nor forsake the estate I had there, for the sake of Jesus Christ, to renounce him here. With respect to my infant, why should I not deliver him up to death, since God delivered up his Son to die for us?" As soon as she had done speaking, they took the child from her, delivered it to a popish nurse to bring up, and then cut to pieces the poor mother.

A youth of sixteen, named Dominico Berto, refusing to turn Papist, was set upon an ass with his face to the tail, which he was obliged to hold in his hand for a bridle. In this condition he was led to the marketplace, amidst the acclamations of the populace; after which they cut off his nose, ears, and cheeks, and burnt holes in several parts of his body, till he at last died.

There was an Albigenes young lady, of a noble family, seized by the Papists, and carried through the streets with a paper mitre upon her head. After mocking, beating, and smearing her face with dirt, they bade her call upon the saints; to which she replied, "My trust and salvation is in Christ only; for even the Virgin Mary, without the merits of her Son, could not be saved." On hearing this, the multitude fell upon her, and soon put an end to her existence.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in FRANCE, previous to, and during the Civil Wars of that Nation.

A Learned man, named Almericus, and six of his disciples, were in the third century ordered to be burnt at Paris; for holding these tenets:

1. That God was no otherwise present in the sacramental bread, than in any other bread.
2. That it was idolatry to build altars, or shrines, to saints.
3. That it was ridiculous to offer incense to saints.
4. That it was absurd to kiss the relics of saints.

However, the martyrdom of Almericus and his pupils did not prevent many from acknowledging the justness of his notions, and seeing the purity of the reformed religion; so that the faith of Christ continually increased, and in time not only spread itself over many parts of France, but diffused the light of the gospel over various other nations.

About the year 1524, at a town in France, called Melden, one John Clark set up a bill on the church door, wherein he called the pope Antichrist. For this offence he was repeatedly whipped, and then branded in the forehead: his mother, who stood by at the time, cried with a loud voice, "Blessed be Christ, and welcome these marks for his sake." Going afterwards to Metz, in Lorraine, he demolished some images, for which he had his right hand and nose cut off, and his arms and breast torn by sharp pincers. He sustained these cruelties with amazing fortitude, and was even sufficiently cool to sing the 115th psalm, which expressly forbids superstition.

Having sung this psalm with admirable patience, he was thrown into the fire, and burnt to ashes.

Several persons of the reformed persuasion were, about this time, beaten, racked, scourged, and burnt to death, in several parts of France; but more particularly at Paris, Malda, and Limosin.

There was a native of Malda burnt in a slow fire for saying that mass was a plain denial of the death and passion of Christ. At Limosin, John de Cadurco, a clergyman of the reformed religion, was apprehended, degraded, and ordered to be burnt.

On his degradation, a friar undertook to preach a sermon upon the occasion; when opening the New Testament he pitched upon this text, in the first epistle of St. Paul the apostle, to Timothy, chap. iv. ver. 1. "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." The friar began to expound this verse in favour of the Roman-Catholic persuasion, and in condemnation of the reformed religion, when John de Cadurco called to him, and begged, that before he proceeded in his sermon, he would read the two verses which followed that he had chosen for his text. The friar again opened the Testament, but on casting his eye on the passage, he stood mute and confounded. John de Cadurco then desired that the book might be handed to him; this request being complied with, he read thus, "Speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth." The Roman-Catholics plainly saw, but had not candour sufficient to own their error; but instead of thanking the person who pointed out their being wrong, they condemned him to the flames, and he was accordingly burned.

Alexander Kanus, a reformed clergyman, was burnt at Paris in a slow fire; four men were committed to the flames for distributing about papers that ridiculed the saying mass. One had his tongue bored through for speaking ill of the Romish superstitions. Peter Gauder, a Genoese, was burnt by the desire of his own uncle, a bigoted Roman-Catholic; and John Pointer, a surgeon, had his tongue cut out, and was then committed to the fire.

Many were martyred at Arras, Foutanis, and Ruitiers, for being of the reformed religion; in particular, at the latter place, one Stephen Brune was condemned to be burnt for refusing to attend mass. When the fire was kindled, the flames were driven from him by a brisk gale of wind: this occasioned the executioner to heap more faggots round him, and pour oil on them. Still, however, the wind blew the flames into a contrary direction, when the executioner absurdly grew angry with Stephen Brune, and in his passion struck him on the head. Brune very calmly said in return, "As I am condemned only to be burnt, why do you strike me with a staff like a dog." This expression so greatly enraged the executioner, that he ran him through with a pike, and then burnt the body when lifeless.

One Aymond de Lavoy, a minister of Bourdeaux, had a complaint lodged against him by the Romish clergy of that city. On hearing this, his friends advised him to abscond; but he absolutely refused so to do, and told them: "That should he be absent himself, the people might well imagine what he had preached consisted only of dreams and fables, and was not extracted from the pure word of God; but to prevent them from entertaining such a notion, he determined to seal his testimony of the truth with his blood." When he was seized upon, the people would have rescued him, but he desired them to forbear, saying, "Since it is the will of God that I should suffer for him, I will not resist his will." He remained nine months in prison on the information only, and patiently suffered all the inclemencies of a gaol. Being brought to trial, he was ordered to be racked; when in the extremity of the torture he comforted himself with this expression; "This body must once die, but the soul shall live; for the kingdom of God endureth for ever." At length he swooned away; but on recovering, prayed for his persecutors. The question was then put to him, "Whether he would embrace the Roman-Catholic persuasion; which positively refusing, he was condemned to be burnt. At the place of execution he said, "O Lord, make haste to help me; tarry not; despise not the work of thy hands." And perceiving some who used to attend his sermons, he addressed them thus, "My friends, I exhort you to study and learn the gospel; for the word of God abideth for ever. Labour to know the will of God, and fear not them that kill the body, but have no power over the soul." The executioner then strangled him, and burnt his body afterwards.

An apothecary of Blois, of the name of Hufson, went from that city to Rouen, and there privately distributed and scattered about several small pamphlets, explaining the tenets of the reformed church, and exposing the Romish superstitions. These books gave a general alarm, and a council being called, an order was issued for diligent search to be made for the author and distributor. With some difficulty it was at length discovered that Hufson had brought them to Rouen, and that he was gone towards Dieppe. Orders for a pursuit were given, and Hufson being apprehended, was brought back to Rouen, where he confessed that he was both author and distributor of the books in question. This confession occasioned his condemnation, when he was executed in the following manner. His tongue being cut out, his hands and feet were tied behind, and he was drawn up by a pulley to a gibbet, and then let down into a fire kindled beneath; in which situation he called upon the Lord, and soon breathed his last.

One Francis Brihard, secretary to cardinal de Bellay, for speaking in favour of the reformed, had his tongue cut out, and was then burnt, A. D. 1554. James Cobard, a school-master in the city of St. Michael, was burnt, A. D. 1545, for saying "That mass was useless and absurd;" and about the same time, fourteen men were burnt at Malda, their wives being compelled to stand by and behold the execution.

Peter Chapot brought a number of Bibles in the French tongue to France, and publicly sold them there in the year 1546, for which being apprehended, he was condemned to be burnt; which sentence was executed a few days after it passed. Soon after a cripple of Meaux, a school-master of Fera, named Stephen Polliot, and a man named John English, were burned for the truth.

The choice being offered to Michael Michelot, either to recant and be beheaded, or to persevere and be burned; he chose the latter, making use, at the same time, of these words: "God, who has given me grace not to deny the truth, will give me strength to endure the fire." Many, about the same time were burnt at Paris, Bar, &c. and at Langres, five men and two women were, by the Roman-Catholics, committed to the flames for being of the reformed religion: when the youngest woman encouraged the other, saying, "This day shall we be married to Jesus Christ, and be with him for ever."

A rich jeweller, named Monsieur Blondel, was, A. D. 1548, apprehended at Lyons, and sent to Paris: where he was burnt for the faith, by order of the high court. A. D. 1549. Hubert, a youth of nineteen years of age, was committed to the flames at Dijon; as was Florent Venote, at the same time.

There was a lady, named Ann Audebert, who designed, on account of her faith, to retire to Geneva, seized and sent to Paris. Being condemned, she was led to execution by a rope placed round her waist. This rope she called her wedding girdle; and as it was on a Saturday, she said, "I was once married to a man on a Saturday, and now I shall be married to God on the same day of the week." She was at length fastened to the stake, and burnt, meeting her fate with the most exemplary fortitude and resignation.

Many singular circumstances happened immediately after the coronation of Henry the Second, king of France, which we shall relate. A taylor was apprehended for working on a saint's day; being asked why why he gave such offence to religion, his reply was, "I am a poor man, and have nothing but my labour to depend upon; necessity requires that I should be industrious, and my conscience tells me there is no day but the sabbath which I ought to keep sacred from labour." Having expressed himself thus, he was committed to prison, and the affair being soon after rumoured at court, some of the nobles persuaded the king to be present at the trial. On the day appointed, the monarch appeared in a superb chair of state, and the bishop of Mafcon was ordered to interrogate the prisoner. The taylor, on perceiving the king, paid his obedience to him in the most respectful manner, saying, "I thank God for honouring me thus, and for permitting me to vindicate the light of his gospel before so great a prince." The prelate then questioned him concerning the tenets of his faith, when the clearness and spirit of his answers amazed all that heard him. The king was much affected and seemed to muse, when the bishop exclaimed, "He is an obstinate and impudent heretic; let him be taken back again to prison, from thence conveyed to the place of execution, and there burnt to death." As the king did not oppose what the bishop said, the officers proceeded to do as they were ordered; and, in the mean time, lest what the taylor had uttered might alarm the conscience of the king, the bishop artfully insinuated, "That the heretics (as he called the reformed) had many specious arguments in their mouths, which, at the first hearing, appeared conclusive, but on serious examination, they were found to be false and deceitful. He then used his utmost endeavours in persuading the king to be present at the execution, who at length consented, and repaired to a balcony which overlooked the place where persons under condemnation were usually put to death. When the taylor saw the king, he fixed his eyes stedfastly upon him, and even while the flames were consuming him, he kept gazing in such a manner, as threw the monarch into visible confusion, and obliged him to retire before the martyr gave up the ghost. The king was so shocked upon this occasion, that he could not recover his spirits for some time; and what added to his disquiet was, his continually dreaming, for many successive nights, that he saw the taylor with his eyes fixed upon him, in the same manner as he had done during the execution.

One Claudius, a pious man, was burnt at Orleans; a Genoese youth, called Thomas, having rebuked a Roman-Catholic for profanely swearing, was informed against as an heretic, and committed to the flames at Paris: and three men at Lyons, being condemned for their religion, were conducted to the place of execution; two of them with ropes about their necks; but the third, having been an officer in the king's service, was exempted from that disgrace. He, however, told the officer, that he begged to be treated in the same manner as his companions, and desired they would indulge him with one of those precious collars about his neck, in honour of the Lord. His request was complied with; and after having sung a psalm with great fervency, they were all three committed to the flames.

Simon Laloe, a citizen of Geneva; Matthew Dimonet, a converted libertine; and Nicholas Naile, a bookseller of Paris, were martyred by fire, for professing the reformed religion.

Peter Serre was originally a priest, but reflecting on the errors of Popery, he, at length, embraced the reformed religion, and learned the trade of a shoe-maker, that by honest industry he might obtain a subsistence. Having a brother at Thoulouse, who was a bigoted Roman-Catholic, Serre, out of fraternal love, made a journey to that city, in order to dissuade him from his superstitions. The brother's wife not approving of his design, lodged a complaint against him. He was soon apprehended, and very candidly made a full declaration of his faith. The judge then asked him concerning his occupation: to which he replied, "I have of late practised the trade of a shoe-maker." Of late, said the judge, and what did you practise formerly? That I am almost ashamed to tell you, exclaimed Serre, because it was the vilest and most wicked occupation imaginable.

The judge and all who were present, from these words supposed he had been a murderer, or thief, and that what he spoke was through contrition for his past crimes. The judge, however, to put the matter beyond doubt, ordered him to explain precisely what he meant; when Serre, with tears in his eyes, cried, "O! I was formerly that abominable thing—A POPISH PRIEST." This reply surprised all who heard it, and so much exasperated the judge, that he condemned Serre to be first degraded, then to have his tongue cut, and afterwards to be publicly burnt; which sentence was punctually executed.

Two men of the reformed religion, with the son and daughter of one of them, were, in the year 1554, apprehended and committed to the castle of Niverne. On examination, they confessed their faith, and were ordered for execution: being smeared with grease, brimstone, and gunpowder, they cried, "Salt on, salt on this sinful and rotten flesh." Their tongues were then cut out, and they were afterwards committed to the flames, which soon consumed them, by means of the combustible matter with which they were belined all over.

A priest of the name of Philip Hamlin, was apprehended for having renounced the errors of Popery, and embraced the reformed religion. Being condemned to the stake, the faggots were piled about him, when he began earnestly to exhort the people to quit the errors of the church of Rome. The officer who presided at the execution, on hearing this, ordered the faggots to be immediately lighted, and that one should blow a trumpet while Hamlin was burning, that the people should not hear his voice, or be induced to change their opinions from what he might say to them.

A full and particular Account of the MARTYRDOM of JOHN CALAS.

SEEING that we are now treating of the persecutions in the kingdom of France, it may not be improper to look a little forward to modern times, wherein we may see the same persecuting spirit of Popery, that raged formerly, most strikingly exhibited in the martyrdom of John Calas.

Without doubt, this is one of the most singular affairs that ever happened, and by being transacted in a polished age, shews that neither experience, or improvement, can root out the inveterate prejudices of the Roman-Catholics; or render them less cruel, or inexorable, to the Protestants.

This John Calas was a merchant of the city of Thoulouse, where he had been settled, and lived in good repute, and had married an English woman of French extraction.

Both Calas and his wife were Protestants, and had five sons, whom they educated in the same religion; but Lewis, one of the sons, became a Roman-Catholic, having been converted by a maid-servant, who had lived in the family above thirty years. The father, however, did not express any resentment or ill-will upon the occasion, but kept the maid in the family, and settled an annuity upon the son. In October 1761, the family consisted of John Calas and his wife, one woman servant, Mark Anthony Calas, the eldest son, and Peter Calas, the second son. Mark Anthony was bred to the law, but could not be admitted to practise, on account of his being a Protestant: hence he grew melancholy, read all the books which he could procure relative to suicide, and seemed determined to destroy himself. To this may be added, that he led a dissipated life, was greatly addicted to gaming, and did all which could constitute the character of a libertine. On which account his father frequently reprehended him, and sometimes in terms of severity, which considerably added to the gloom that seemed to oppress him.

Mr. Gobe La Vaiffe, a young gentleman about nineteen years of age, the son of La Vaiffe, a celebrated advocate of Thoulouse, having been some time at Bourdeaux, came back to Thoulouse to see his father on the 13th of October 1761; but finding that he was gone to his country-house, at some distance from the city, he went to several places, endeavouring to hire a horse to carry him thither. No horse, however, was to be hired; and, about five o'clock in the evening, he was met by John Calas the father, and the eldest son Mark Anthony, who was his friend. Calas, the father, invited him to supper, as he could not set out for his father's that night, and La Vaiffe consented. All three, therefore, proceeded to Calas's house together, and when they came thither, finding that Mrs. Calas was still in her own room, which she had not quitted that day, La Vaiffe went up to see her. After the first compliments, he told her, he was to sup with her by her husband's invitation, at which she expressed her satisfaction, and a few minutes after left him, to give some orders to her maid. When that was done, she went to look for her son Anthony, whom she found sitting alone in the shop, very pensive: she gave him some money, and desired him to go and buy some Roquefort cheese, as he was a better judge of the quality of cheese than any other person in the family. She then returned to her guest La Vaiffe, who very soon after went again to the livery-stable, to see if any horse was come in, that he might secure it for the next morning.

Anthony in a short time returned, having bought the cheese, and La Vaiffe also coming back about the same time, the family and their guest sat down to supper, in a room up one pair of stairs; the whole company consisting of Calas the father and his wife, Anthony and Peter Calas the sons, and La Vaiffe the guest, no other person being in the house, except the maid-servant, who has been mentioned already.

Now it was about seven o'clock: the supper was not long; but before it was over, or, according to the French expression, "when they came to the desert," Anthony left the table, and went into the kitchen, which was on the same floor, as he was accustomed to do. The maid asked him if he was cold? He answered, "Quite the contrary, I burn;" and then left her. In the mean time his friend and family left the room they had supped in, and went into a bed-chamber; the father and La Vaiffe sat down together on a sofa; the younger son Peter in an elbow chair; and the mother in another chair; and without making any inquiry after Anthony, continued in conversation together till between nine and ten o'clock, when La Vaiffe took his leave, and Peter, who had fallen asleep, was awakened to attend him with a light.

There was on the ground floor of Calas's house a shop and a warehouse; the latter of which was divided from the shop by a pair of folding-doors. When Peter Calas and La Vaiffe came down stairs into the shop, they were extremely shocked to see Anthony hanging in his shirt, from a bar which he had laid across the top of the two folding-doors, having half opened them for that purpose. On discovery of this horrid spectacle, they shrieked out, which brought down Calas the father, the mother being seized with such a terror as kept her trembling in the passage above. The unhappy old man rushed forward, and taking the body in his arms, the bar, to which the rope that suspended him was fastened, slipped off from the folding-door of the warehouse, and fell down. Having placed the body on the ground, he loosed and took off the cord in an agony of grief and anguish not to be expressed, weeping, trembling, and deploring himself and his child. The two young men, his second son and La Vaiffe, who had not had presence of mind enough to attempt taking down the body, were standing by, stupid with amazement and horror. In the mean time the mother, hearing the confused cries and complaints of her husband, and finding no one come to her, found means to get down stairs. At the bottom she saw La Vaiffe, and hastily demanded what was the matter. This question roused Calas in a moment, and instead of answering her, he urged her to go again up stairs, to which, with much reluctance, she consented; but the conflict of her mind being such as could not be long borne, she sent down the maid to know what was the matter. When the maid discovered what had happened, she continued below, either because she feared to carry an account of it to her mistress, or because she busied herself in doing some good office to her master, who was still embracing the body of his son, and bathing it in his tears. The mother, therefore, being thus left alone, went down, and mixed in the scene, that has been already described, with such emotions as it must naturally produce. In the mean time Peter had been sent for La Moire, a surgeon in the neighbourhood. La Moire was not at home, but his apprentice, Mr. Grosse, came instantly. Upon examination, he found the body quite dead; and upon taking off the neckcloth, which was of black taffata, he saw the mark of the cord, and immediately pronounced that the deceased had been strangled. This particular had not been told, for the poor old man, when Peter was going for La Moire, cried out, "Save at least the honour of my family; do not go and spread a report that your brother has made away with himself."

A crowd of people by this time were gathered about the house, and one Casing, with another friend or two of the family, were come in. Some of those who were in the street had heard the cries and exclamations of the father, the mother, the brother, and his friend, before they knew what was the matter; and having by some means heard that Anthony Calas was suddenly dead, and that the surgeon, who had examined the body, declared he had been strangled, they took it into their heads he had been murdered; and as the family were Protestants, they presently supposed that the young man was about to change his religion, and had been put to death for that reason. The cries they had heard they fancied were those of the deceased, while he was resisting the violence that was offered him. The tumult in the street increased every moment: some said that Anthony Calas was to have abjured the next day; others, that Protestants are bound by their religion to strangle or cut the throats of their children when they are inclined to become Catholics. Others who had found out that La Vaiffe was in the house when the accident happened, very confidently affirmed, that the Protestants, at their last assembly, appointed a person to be their common executioner upon these occasions, and that La Vaiffe was the man, who, in consequence of the office to which he had been appointed, had come to Calas's house to hang his son.

Now the poor father, who was overwhelmed with grief for the loss of his child, was advised by his friends to send for the officers of justice to prevent his being torn to pieces by the multitude, who supposed that he had murdered his son. This was accordingly done: a messenger was dispatched to the capitoul, one David, the first magistrate of the place; and another to an inferior officer, called an assessor. The capitoul was already set out, having been alarmed by the rumour of a murder before the messenger sent from Calas's got to his house. He entered Calas's house with forty soldiers, took the father, Peter the son, the mother, La Vaiffe, and the maid, all into custody, and set a guard over them. He sent for M. de la Tour, a physician, and M. la Marque and Perronet, surgeons, who examined the body for marks of violence, but found none except the mark of the ligature on the neck: they found also the hair of the deceased done up in the usual manner, perfectly smooth, and without the least disorder: his clothes were also regularly folded up, and laid upon the counter, nor was his shirt either unbuttoned or torn.

The capitoul, notwithstanding these appearances, thought proper to agree with the opinion of the mob, and took it into his head that old Calas had sent for La Vaiffe, telling him he had a son to be hanged; that La Vaiffe had come to perform the office of executioner; and that he had received assistance from the father and brother.

On account of these notions the capitoul ordered the body of the deceased to be carried to the town-house, with the clothes. The father and son were thrown into a dark dungeon; and the mother, La Vaiffe, the maid, and Casing, were imprisoned in one that admitted the light. The next day, what is called the verbal process was taken at the town-house, instead of the spot where the

the body was found, as the law directs, and was dated at Calas's house to conceal the irregularity. This verbal process is somewhat like the coroner's inquest in England: witnesses are examined, and the magistrate makes his report, which is the same there as the verdict of the coroner's jury in England. The witnesses examined by the capitoul were, the physician and surgeon, who proved Anthony Calas to have been strangled. The surgeon having been ordered to examine the stomach of the deceased, deposed also, that the food which was found there had been taken four hours before his death.

Seeing that no proof of the supposed fact could be procured, the capitoul had recourse to a monitory, or general information, in which the crime was taken for granted, and all persons were required to give such testimony against it as they were able, particularizing the points to which they were to speak. This recites, that La Vaiffe was commissioned by the Protestants to be their executioner in ordinary, when any of their children were to be hanged for changing their religion: it recites also, that when the Protestants thus hang their children, they compel them to kneel, and one of the interrogatories was, whether any person had seen Anthony Calas kneel before his father when he strangled him: it recites likewise, that Anthony died a Roman-Catholic, and requires evidence of his Catholicism.

Now these ridiculous opinions being adopted and published by the principal magistrate of a considerable city, the church of Geneva thought itself obliged to send an attestation of its abhorrence of opinions so abominable and absurd, and of its astonishment that they should be suspected of such opinions by persons whose rank and office required them to have more knowledge and better judgment.

However, before this monitory was published, the mob had got a notion, that Anthony Calas was the next day to have entered into the fraternity of the White Penitents. The capitoul immediately adopted this opinion also, without the least examination, and ordered Anthony's body to be buried in the middle of St. Stephen's church, which was accordingly done, forty priests, and all the White Penitents, assisting in the funeral procession.

Some short time after the interment of the deceased, the White Penitents performed a solemn service for him in their chapel: the church was hung with white, and a tomb was raised in the middle of it, on the top of which was placed a human skeleton, holding in one hand a paper, on which was written, "Abjuration of heresy," and in the other a palm, the emblem of martyrdom.

The Franciscans performed a service of the same kind for him the next day; and it is easy to imagine how much the minds of the people were inflamed by this strange folly of their magistrates and priests.

Still the capitoul continued the prosecution with unrelenting severity; and though the grief and distraction of the family, when he first came to the house, were alone sufficient to have convinced any reasonable being that they were not the authors of the event which they deplored, yet having publicly attested that they were guilty, in his monitory, without proof, and no proof coming in, he thought fit to condemn the unhappy father, mother, brother, friend, and servant, to the torture, and put them all into irons on the 18th of November. Casing was enlarged upon proof that he was not in Calas's house till after Anthony was dead.

From these dreadful proceedings the sufferers appealed to the parliament, which immediately took cognizance of the affair, and annulled the sentence of the capitoul as irregular; but the prosecution still continued.

As soon as the trial came on, the hangman, who had been taken to Calas's house, and shewn the folding-doors and the bar, deposed, that it was impossible Anthony should hang himself as was pretended. Another witness swore, that he looked through the key-hole of Calas's door into a room, where he saw men running hastily to and fro. A third swore, that his wife had told him, a woman named Maundrill had told her, that a certain woman unknown had declared, she heard the cries of Anthony Calas at the further end of the city.

Agreeable to this evidence the majority of the parliament were of opinion, that the prisoners were guilty, and therefore ordered them to be tried by the criminal court of Thoulouse.

There was among those who presided at the trial one La Borde, who had zealously espoused the popular prejudices; and though it was manifest to demonstration that the prisoners were either all innocent or all guilty, he voted that the father should first suffer the torture, ordinary and extraordinary, to discover his accomplices, and be then broken alive upon the wheel; to receive the last stroke when he had laid two hours, and then to be burnt to ashes. In this opinion he had the concurrence of six others; three were for the torture alone; two were of opinion that they should endeavour to ascertain upon the spot whether Anthony could hang himself or not; and one voted to acquit the prisoner. After long debates the majority was for the torture and wheel, and probably condemned the father by way of experiment, whether he was guilty or not, hoping he would in the agony, confess the crime, and accuse the other prisoners, whose fate, therefore, they suspended. It is, however, certain, that if they had evidence against the father that would have justified the sentence they pronounced against him, that very evidence would have justified the same sentence against the rest; and that they could not justly condemn him, for they were all in the house together when Anthony died. All concurred in declaring he hanged himself, that the persons accused could have had no motive to do such an act, nor could they have hanged him by violence, without the knowledge of the rest.

However, poor Calas, an old man of 68, was condemned to this dreadful punishment alone. He suffered the torture with great constancy, and was led to execution in a frame of mind which excited the admiration of all that saw him.

Father Bourges and father Coldagues, the two Dominicans, who attended him in his last moments, wished their latter end might be like his; and declared, that they thought him not only wholly innocent of the crime laid to his charge, but an exemplary instance of true Christian patience, charity, and fortitude.

He gave but one single shriek, and that not very violent, when he received the first stroke; after that he uttered no complaint. Being at length placed on the wheel, to wait for the moment which was to end his life and his misery together, he expressed himself with an humble hope of an happy immortality, and a compassionate regard for the judges who had condemned him. When he saw the executioner prepared to give him the last stroke, he made a fresh declaration of his innocence to father Bourges; but while the words were yet in his mouth, the capitoul, the author of this catastrophe, and who came upon the scaffold merely to gratify his desire of being a witness of his punishment and death, ran up to him, and bawled out, "Wretch, there are the faggots which are to reduce your body to ashes; speak the truth." Mr. Calas made no reply, but turned his head a little aside, and that moment the executioner did his office.

Donat Calas, a boy of fifteen years of age, and the youngest son of the unfortunate victim, was apprentice to a merchant at Nismes, when he heard of the dreadful punishment by which seven unfortunately prejudiced judges of Thoulouse, had put his worthy father to death.

So violent was the popular outcry against this family in Languedoc, that every body expected to see the children of Calas broke upon the wheel, and the mother burnt alive. Even the attorney-general expected it. So weak, it is said, had been the defence made by this innocent family, oppressed by misfortunes, and terrified at the sight of lighted piles, racks, and wheels.

Young Donat Calas was made to dread sharing the fate of the rest of his family, and was advised to fly into Switzerland: he went and found a gentleman, who, at first, could only pity and relieve him, without daring to judge of the rigour exercised against the father, mother, and brothers.

Shortly after, one of the brothers, who was only banished, banished, likewise threw himself into the arms of the same person, who, for more than a month, took every possible precaution to be assured of the innocence of the family. But when he was once convinced, he thought himself obliged, in conscience, to employ his friends, his purse, his pen, and his credit, to repair the fatal mistake of the seven judges of Thoulouse, and to have the proceedings revised by the king's counsel. This revision lasted three years, and it is well known what honour Messrs. de Grosne and Bacquancourt acquired by reporting this memorable cause. Fifty masters of the Court of Requests unanimously declared the whole family of Calas innocent, and recommended them to the benevolent justice of his majesty. The duke de Choiseul, who never let slip an opportunity of signaling the greatness of his character, not only assisted this unfortunate family with money, but obtained for them a gratuity of 36,000 livres from the king.

The arret which justified the family of Calas, and changed their fate, was signed on the 9th of March 1765. The 9th of March 1762, was the very day on which the innocent and virtuous father of that family had been executed. All Paris ran in crowds to see them come out of prison, and clapped their hands for joy, while the tears streamed down their cheeks.

Now have we traced, through all its circumstances, one of the most singular affairs that ever the annals of superstition, or the history of bigotry produced; and lament, that a worthy and innocent man fell a sacrifice to that narrowness, which a popish education bestows, and which settled prejudices always convert to cruelty. Hence we may perceive, to what a depraved state the human mind may be reduced, when left to the guidance of the passions, or suffered to be the slave of enthusiasm. A sect, which would propagate its doctrines in blood, cannot be the favourer of truth: that persuasion alone can merit the sacred name of religion, which wishes to reform mankind.

The purity of the gospel will equally shun superstition and cruelty, as the mildness of Christ's tenets teaches only to comfort in this world, and procure salvation in the next. To persecute for being of a different opinion, is as absurd as to persecute for having a different countenance: if we honour God, keep sacred the pure doctrines of Christ, put a full confidence in the promises contained in the holy scriptures, and obey the political laws of the state in which we reside, we have an undoubted right to protection instead of persecution, and to serve heaven, as our consciences may direct, when regulated by the gospel precepts.

C H A P. IV.

Including an HISTORICAL SURVEY of the PERSECUTIONS in SPAIN, PORTUGAL, ITALY, &c. &c.

A full and particular Account of the RISE, PROGRESS, &c. of the INQUISITION.

AS soon as the reformed religion began to diffuse the gospel light throughout Europe, pope Innocent the Third entertained great fear for the Romish church. Unwilling that the spirit of free inquiry should gain ground, or that the people should attain more knowledge than the priests were willing to admit, he determined to impede, as much as possible, the progress of reformation. He accordingly instituted a number of inquisitors, or persons who were to make inquiry after, apprehend, and punish heretics, as the reformed were called by the Papists.

One Dominic was at the head of these inquisitors, who had been canonized by the pope, in order to render his authority the more respectable. Dominic, and the other inquisitors, spread themselves into various Roman-Catholic countries, and treated the Protestants with the utmost severity. In process of time, the pope, not finding these roving inquisitors so useful as he had imagined, resolved upon the establishment of fixed and regular courts of inquisition. After the order for these regular courts, the first office of inquisition was established in the city of Thoulouse, and Dominic became the first regular inquisitor, as he had before been the first roving inquisitor.

Now courts of inquisition were erected in several countries; but the Spanish inquisition became the most powerful, and the most dreadful of any. Even the kings of Spain themselves, though arbitrary in all other respects, were taught to dread the power of the lords of the inquisition; and the horrid cruelties they exercised, compelled multitudes, who differed in opinion from the Roman-Catholics, carefully to conceal their sentiments.

The Dominicans and Franciscans were the most zealous of all the popish monks, and those who most implicitly obeyed the church of Rome: these, therefore, the pope thought proper to invest with an exclusive right of presiding over, and managing the different courts of inquisition. The friars of those two orders were always selected from the very dregs of the people, and therefore were not much troubled with punctilios of honour: they were obliged, by the rules of their respective orders, to lead very austere lives, which rendered their manners unsocial and brutish, and, of course, the better qualified them for the employment of inquisitors.

Now the pope thought proper to give the inquisitors the most unlimited powers, as judges delegated by him, and immediately representing his person: they were permitted to excommunicate, or sentence to death, whom they thought proper, upon the most slight information of heresy. They were allowed to publish crusades against all whom they deemed heretics, and enter into leagues with sovereign princes, to join those crusades with their forces.

In the year 1244, their power was further increased by the emperor Frederic the Second, who declared himself the protector and friend of all inquisitors, and published two very cruel edicts as follows:

1. That all heretics, who continued obstinate, should be burnt.
2. That all heretics, who repented should be imprisoned for life.

This zeal in the emperor for the inquisitors, and the Roman-Catholic persuasion, arose from a report which had been propagated throughout Europe, that he intended to renounce Christianity, and turn Mahometan; the emperor therefore attempted, by the height of bigotry, to contradict the report, and by cruelty to shew his attachment to Popery.

The officers of the inquisition are, three inquisitors, or judges, a fiscal proctor, two secretaries, a magistrate, a messenger, a receiver, a gaoler, an agent of confiscated possessions; several assessors, counsellors, executioners, physicians, surgeons, door-keepers, familiars, and visitors, who are all sworn to profound secrecy.

The chief accusation against those who are subject to

to this tribunal, is heresy, which comprises all that is spoken, or written, against any of the articles of the creed, or the traditions of the Romish church. The other articles of accusation are, renouncing the Roman-Catholic persuasion, and believing that persons of any other religion may be saved, or even admitting that the tenets of any but Papists are, in the least, reasonable or proper. We shall mention two other things which incur the most severe punishments, and shew the inquisitors, at once, in an absurd and a tyrannical light, viz. To disapprove of any action done by the inquisition, or disbelieve any thing said by an inquisitor.

This grand article, heresy, comprises many subdivisions; and, upon a suspicion of any of these, the party is immediately apprehended: advancing an offensive proposition; failing to impeach others who may advance such; contemning church ceremonies; defacing idols; reading books condemned by the inquisition; lending such books to others to read; deviating from the ordinary practices of the Romish church; letting a year pass without going to confession; eating meat on fast-days; neglecting mass; being present at a sermon preached by an heretic; not appearing when summoned by the inquisition; lodging in the house of, contracting a friendship with, or making a present to an heretic; assisting an heretic to escape from confinement, or visiting one in confinement, are all matters of suspicion, and prosecuted accordingly. Nay, all Roman-Catholics were commanded, under pain of excommunication, to give immediate information, even of their nearest and dearest friends, if they judged them to be what was called heretics, or any ways inclining to heresy.

All who give the least countenance or assistance to Protestants, are called fautors, or abettors of heresy, and the accusations against these usually turn upon some of the following points; comforting such as the inquisition have begun to prosecute; assisting, or not informing against such, if they should happen to escape; concealing, abetting, advising, or furnishing heretics with money; visiting, or writing to, or sending them subsistence; secreting, or burning books and papers, which might serve to convict them.

In like manner the inquisition takes cognizance of such as are accused of being magicians, witches, blasphemers, soothsayers, wizards, common swearers; and of such who read, or even possess the Bible in the common language, the Talmud of the Jews, or the Alcoran of the Mahometans.

The inquisitors upon all occasions carry on their processes with the utmost severity, and punish those who offend them with the most unparalleled cruelty. A Protestant has seldom any mercy shewn him; and a Jew, who turns Christian, is far from being secure; for if he is known to keep company with another new-converted Jew, a suspicion immediately arises that they privately practise together some Jewish ceremonies; if he keeps company with a person who was lately a Protestant, but now professes Popery, they are accused of plotting together; but if he associates with a Roman-Catholic, an accusation is often laid against him for only pretending to be a Papist, and the consequence is, a confiscation of his effects as a punishment for his insincerity, and the loss of his life if he complains of ill usage.

In the inquisition a defence is of little use to the prisoner, for a suspicion only, is deemed sufficient cause of condemnation, and the greater his wealth the greater his danger. The principal part of the inquisitors' cruelties is owing to their rapacity: they destroy the life to possess the property; and, under the pretence of zeal, plunder each obnoxious individual.

Any prisoner to the inquisitors is never allowed to see the face of his accuser, or of the witnesses against him, but every method is taken, by threats and tortures, to oblige him to accuse himself, and by that means corroborate their evidence. If the jurisdiction of the inquisition is not fully allowed, vengeance is denounced against such as call it in question; or if any of its officers are opposed, those who oppose them are almost certain to be sufferers for their temerity; the maxim of the inquisition being to strike terror, and awe those who are the objects of its power, into obedience. High birth, distinguished rank, great dignity, or eminent employments, are no protection from its severities; and the lowest officers of the inquisition can make the highest characters dread them.

Such are the circumstances which subject a person to the rage of the inquisition, and the modes of beginning the process are four in number, viz.

1. To proceed by imputation, or prosecute on common report.

2. To proceed by the information of any indifferent person who chuses to impeach another.

3. To found the prosecution on the information of those spies who are regularly retained by the inquisition.

4. To prosecute on the confession of the prisoner himself.

As soon as a person is summoned to appear before the inquisition, the best method (unless he is sure of escaping by flight) is immediately to obey the summons; for though really innocent, the least delay increases his criminality in the eye of the inquisitors, as one of their maxims is, that backwardness to appear always indicates guilt in the person summoned; and if he escapes, it is the same as perpetual banishment, for should such ever return, the most cruel death would be the certain consequence thereof.

Now the inquisitors never forget or forgive; length of time cannot efface their resentments; nor can the humblest concessions, or most liberal presents, obtain a pardon: they carry the desire of revenge to the grave, and would have both the property and lives of those who have offended them. Hence, when a person once accused to the inquisition, after escaping, is retaken, he ought seriously to prepare himself for martyrdom, and arm his soul against the fear of death. Every person, in such a situation, ought to be composed for the awful occasion, without expectation of remedy.

If a positive accusation is given, the inquisitors direct an order under their hands to the executioner; who takes a certain number of familiars with him to assist in the execution. The calamity of a man under such circumstances can scarce be described, he being probably seized when surrounded by his family, or in company with his friends. Father, son, brother, sister, husband, wife, must quietly submit; none dare resist or even speak; either would subject them to the punishment of the devoted victim. No respite is allowed to settle the most important affairs, but the prisoner is instantaneously hurried away to meet his fate.

From this we may judge how critically dangerous must be the situation of persons who reside in countries where there is an inquisitorial tribunal; and how carefully cautious all states ought to be who are not cursed with such an arbitrary court, to prevent its introduction. In speaking of this subject, an elegant author pathetically says, "How horrid a scene of perfidy and inhumanity? What kind of community must that be whence gratitude, love, and mutual forbearance with regard to human frailties are banished! What must that tribunal be, which obliges parents not only to erase from their minds the remembrance of their own children, to extinguish all those keen sensations of tenderness and affection wherewith nature inspires them, but even to extend their inhumanity so far as to force them to commence their accusers, and consequently to become the cause of the cruelties inflicted upon them! What ideas ought we to form to ourselves of a tribunal, which obliges children not only to stifle every soft impulse of gratitude, love, and respect, due to those who gave them birth, but even forces them, and that under the most rigorous penalties, to be spies over their parents, and to discover to a set of merciless inquisitors, the crimes, the errors, and even the little lapses to which they are exposed by human frailty. In a word, a tribunal which will not permit relations, when imprisoned in its horrid dungeons, to give each other the succours, or perform the duties which religion enjoins, must be of an infernal stamp. What disorder and confusion must such conduct give rise to, in a tenderly affectionate family?"

family? An expression innocent in itself, and perhaps, but too true, shall, from an indiscreet zeal, or a panic of fear, give infinite uneasiness to a family; shall ruin it's peace entirely, and perhaps cause one or more of it's members to be the unhappy victims of the most barbarous of all tribunals. What distractions must necessarily break forth in a house where the husband and wife are at variance, or the children loose and wicked! Will such children scruple to sacrifice a father, who endeavours to restrain them by his exhortations, by reproofs, or paternal corrections? Will not they rather, after plundering his house to support their extravagance and riot, readily deliver up their unhappy parent to all the horrors of a tribunal, founded on the blackest injustice? A riotous husband, or a loose wife, have an easy opportunity, assisted by means of the persecution in question, to rid themselves of one who is a check to their vices, by delivering him, or her, up to the rigours of the inquisition."

As soon as the inquisitors have taken umbrage against an innocent person, all expedients are used to facilitate condemnation; false oaths and testimonies, founded on perjury, are directed by the virulence of prejudice to find the accused guilty; and all laws, divine and human, all institutions, moral and political, are sacrificed to bigoted revenge.

If a person accused be taken and imprisoned, his treatment is deplorable indeed. The gaolers first begin by searching him for books or papers which might tend to his conviction, or for instruments which might be employed in self-murder, or breaking from the place of confinement. But it is to be observed, that the obvious articles of the search are not the only things taken from a prisoner; for the conscientious gaolers make free with money, rings, buckles, apparel, &c. under various pretences, such as, that money or rings may be swallowed, to the great detriment of the prisoner's health, the prongs of buckles may be used to take away life, by means of a neckcloth or a pair of garters a prisoner may hang himself, &c. &c. Thus he is robbed under the plausible pretext of humanity, and used ill through pretended affection.

When the prisoner has been searched under the name of care, and robbed beneath the mask of justice, he is committed to prison by way of security. "Here, says an authentic writer, he is conveyed to a dungeon, the sight of which must fill him with horror, torn from his family and friends, who are not allowed access, or even to send him one consolatory letter, or take the least step in his favour in order to prove his innocence. He sees himself instantly abandoned to his inflexible judges, to melancholy and despair, and even often to his most inveterate enemies, quite uncertain of his fate. Innocence on such an occasion is a weak reed, nothing being easier than to ruin an innocent person."

The usual portion of a prisoner is death, the mildest sentence being imprisonment for life; yet the inquisitors proceed by degrees, at once subtle, slow, and cruel. The gaoler first of all insinuates himself into the prisoner's favour, by pretending to wish him well, and advise him well, and among other hints, falsely kind, tells him to petition for an audit.

Now this is the worst thing a prisoner can do, for the mere petition is deemed a supposition of guilt, and he is persuaded to it only with a view to entrap him. When he is brought before the consistory, the first demand is, What is your request?

To this the prisoner very naturally answers that he would have a hearing.

Hereupon one of the inquisitors replies, your hearing is this—confess the truth—conceal nothing, and rely on our mercy.

Then if the prisoner makes a confession of any trifling affair, they immediately found an indictment on it: if he is mute, they shut him up without light, or any food but a scanty allowance of bread and water till he overcomes his obstinacy as they call it; and if he declares he is innocent, they torment him, till he either dies with the torment, or confesses himself guilty.

On the re-examinations of such as confess, they continually say, "You have not been sincere, you tell not all—you keep many things concealed, and therefore must be remanded to your dungeon." When those who stood mute are called for re-examination, if they continue silent, such tortures are ordered as will either make them speak, or kill them; and when those who proclaim their innocence are re-examined, a crucifix is held before them, and they are solemnly exhorted to take an oath of their confession of faith. This brings them to the test, they must either swear they are Roman-Catholics, or acknowledge they are not. If they acknowledge they are not Roman-Catholics, they are proceeded against as heretics. If they acknowledge they are Roman-Catholics, a string of accusations is brought against them, to which they are obliged to answer extempore, no time being given even to put their answers into proper method.

When they have verbally answered, pen, ink, and paper are given them, in order to produce a written answer, which it is required shall in every degree coincide with the verbal answer. If the verbal and the written answer differ, the prisoners are charged with prevarication; if one contains more than the other, with wishing to conceal certain circumstances; if they both agree, they are accused with premeditated artifice.

After the person impeached is condemned, he is either severely whipped, violently tortured, sent to the galleys, or sentenced to death; and in either case the effects are confiscated. After judgment a procession is performed to the place of execution, which ceremony is called, an Auto de Fe, or Act of Faith.

The following is an exact account of an Auto de Fe, performed at Madrid in the year 1682.

The officers of the inquisition, preceded by trumpets, kettle-drums, and their banner, marched on the 30th of May, in cavalcade, to the palace of the great square, where they declared by proclamation, that on the 30th of June the sentence of the prisoners would be put in execution.

Now there had not been a spectacle of this kind at Madrid for several years before, for which reason it was expected by the inhabitants with as much impatience as a day of the greatest festivity and triumph.

When the day appointed arrived, a prodigious number of people appeared dressed as splendid as their respective circumstances would admit. In the great square was raised a high scaffold; and thither, from seven in the morning till the evening, were brought criminals of both sexes; all the inquisitions in the kingdom sending their prisoners to Madrid.

Twenty men and women out of these prisoners, with one renegado Mahometan, were ordered to be burned; fifty Jews and Jewesses, having never before been imprisoned, and repenting of their crimes, were sentenced to a long confinement, and to wear a yellow cap; and ten others, indicted for bigamy, witchcraft, and other crimes, were sentenced to be whipped, and then sent to the galleys: these last wore large paste-board caps, with inscriptions on them, having a halter about their necks, and torches in their hands.

On this solemn occasion the whole court of Spain was present. The grand inquisitor's chair was placed in a sort of tribunal far above that of the king. The nobles here acted the part of the sheriffs officers in England, leading such criminals as were to be burned, and holding them when fast bound with thick cords: the rest of the criminals were conducted by the familiars of the inquisition.

There was among those who were to suffer, a young Jewess of exquisite beauty, and but seventeen years of age. Being on the same side of the scaffold where the queen was seated, she addressed her, in hopes of obtaining a pardon, in the following pathetic speech: "Great queen! will not your royal presence be of some service to me in my miserable condition? Have regard to my youth; and, oh! consider that I am about to die, for professing a religion imbibed from my earliest infancy!" Her majesty seemed greatly to pity her distress, but turned away her eyes, as she did not dare to speak a word in behalf of a person who had been declared an heretic by the inquisition.

Mass now began, in the midst of which the priest came came from the altar, placed near the scaffold, and seated himself in a chair prepared for that purpose.

Then the chief inquisitor descended from the amphitheatre, dressed in his cope, and having a mitre on his head. After bowing to the altar, he advanced towards the king's balcony, and went up to it, attended by some of his officers, carrying a cross and the gospels, with a book containing the oath by which the kings of Spain oblige themselves to protect the catholic faith, to extirpate heretics, and support, with all their power, the prosecutions and decrees of the inquisition.

On the approach of the inquisitor, and his presenting this book to the king, his majesty rose up, bare-headed, and swore to maintain the oath, which was read to him by one of his counsellors: after which the king continued standing till the inquisitor was returned to his place; when the secretary of the holy office mounted a sort of pulpit, and administered a like oath to the counsellors and the whole assembly. The mass was begun about twelve at noon, and did not end till nine in the evening, being protracted by a proclamation of the sentences of the several criminals, which were all separately rehearsed aloud one after the other.

Next followed the burning of the twenty-one men and women, whose intrepidity in suffering that horrid death was truly astonishing: some thrust their hands and feet into the flames with the most dauntless fortitude; and all of them yielded to their fate with such resolution, that many of the amazed spectators lamented that such heroic souls had not been more enlightened.

The near situation of the king to the criminals rendered their dying groans very audible to him; he could not, however, be absent from this dreadful scene, as it is esteemed a religious one; and his coronation oath obliges him to give a sanction by his presence to all the acts of the tribunal.

Another Auto de Fe is thus described by the reverend Doctor Gedde:

"At the place of execution there are so many stakes set as there are prisoners to be burned, a large quantity of dry furze being set about them. The stakes of the Protestants, or, as the inquisitors call them, the professed, are about four yards high, and have each a small board, whereon the prisoner is seated within half a yard of the top. The professed then go up a ladder betwixt two priests, who attend them the whole day of execution. When they come even with the fore-mentioned board, they turn about to the people, and the priest spends near a quarter of an hour in exhorting them to be reconciled to the see of Rome. On their refusing, the priests come down, and the executioner ascending, turns the professed from off the ladder upon the seat, chains their bodies close to the stakes, and leaves them.

"Then the priests go up a second time to renew their exhortations, and if they find them ineffectual, usually tell them at parting, 'That they leave them to the Devil, who is standing at their elbow ready to receive their souls, and carry them with him into the flames of hell fire, as soon as they are out of their bodies.'

"A general shout is then raised, and when the priests get off the ladder, the universal cry is, 'Let the dogs' heads be made' (which implies, singe their heads); this is accordingly performed by means of flaming furzes thrust against their faces with long poles.

"This barbarity is repeated till their faces are burnt, and is accompanied with loud acclamations. Fire is then set to the furzes, and the criminals are consumed."

Innumerable are the martyrs who have borne these rigours with the most exemplary fortitude: and we hope that every Protestant, whose fate may expose him to the merciless tyranny of Papists, will act consistent with the duty of a Christian, when they consider the great rewards that await them.

These remarks may be applied to inquisitions in general, as well as to that of Spain in particular. The inquisition belonging to Portugal is exactly upon a similar plan to that of Spain, having been instituted much about the same time, and put under the same regulations, and the proceedings nearly resemble each other; we shall therefore introduce an account of it in this place. The house, or rather palace, of the inquisition, is a noble edifice. It contains four courts, each about forty feet square, round which are about three hundred dungeons, or cells.

These dungeons on the ground floor are allotted to the lowest class of prisoners, and those on the second story to persons of superior rank. The galleries are built of freestone, and hid from view both within and without by a double wall of about fifty feet high, which greatly increases the gloom, and darkens them exceedingly.

So extensive is the whole prison, which contains so many turnings and windings, that none but those well acquainted with it can find the way through its various avenues. The apartments of the chief inquisitor are spacious, and elegant; the entrance is through a large gate, which leads into a court-yard, round which are several chambers, and some large saloons for the king, royal family, and the rest of the court to stand and observe the executions during an Auto de Fe.

Respecting the dungeons where the prisoners are confined, they are not only gloomy in themselves, but as miserably furnished as can be imagined; the only accommodations being a frame of wood by way of bedstead, and a straw bed, mattress, blankets, sheets, an urinal, wash-hand basin, two pitchers, one for clean, the other for foul water, a lamp, and a plate.

A testoon, which is seven-pence halfpenny English money, is allowed every prisoner daily; and the principal gaoler, accompanied by two other officers, monthly visits every prisoner, to inquire how he would have his allowance laid out. This visit, however, is only a matter of form, for the gaoler usually lays out the money as he pleases, and commonly allows the prisoner daily, viz. a porringer of broth, half a pound of beef, a small piece of bread, and a trifling portion of cheese.

All these articles are charged to the prisoner at the rate of seventeen testoons in the month; four are allowed for brandy, or wine; two for fruit, making in the whole twenty-three; and the rest of the money, to make up the number of testoons for the month, are scandalously sunk in the articles of sugar and soap.

Many, who find their allowance too little, petition the lords inquisitors for a greater portion, when the petition is frequently granted; and in this particular the only mark of humanity hath been casually shewn; in all other circumstances they are inhuman, cruel, and severe. They not only exclude the prisoners from every intercourse with their relations or friends, make them suffer every inclemency of a gaol, or torture them in confinement, but even prohibit them from making the least noise by speaking loud, singing psalms or hymns, exclaiming, or even uttering the sighs which affliction naturally heaves from the breast.

Centinels walk about continually to listen; if the least noise is heard, they call to, and threaten the prisoner; if the noise is repeated, a severe beating ensues, as a punishment to what is deemed the offending party, and to intimidate others. As an instance of this take the following fact: a prisoner having a violent cough, one of the guards came and ordered him not to make a noise; to which he replied, that from the violence of his cold, it was not in his power to forbear. The cough increasing, the guard went into the cell, stripped the poor creature naked, and beat him so unmercifully, that he soon after died of the blows.

In this inquisition, as in that of Spain, if the prisoners plead their innocence, they are condemned as obdurate, and their effects embezzled; if they plead guilty, they are sentenced on their own confession, and their effects confiscated of course; and if they are suffered to escape with their lives (which is but seldom the case) as penitent criminals who have voluntarily accused themselves, they dare not reclaim their effects, as that would bring on them an accusation of being hypocritical and relaxed penitents, when a most cruel death would be the certain consequence.

Sometimes a prisoner passes months without knowing of what he is accused, or having the least idea of when he is to be tried. The gaoler at length informs him, that he must petition for a trial. This ceremony being gone through, he is taken bare-headed for examination. When they come to the door of the tribunal, the gaoler knocks three times, to give the judges notice of their approach. A bell is rung by one of the judges, when an attendant opens the door, admits the prisoner, and accommodates him with a stool.

Then the prisoner is ordered by the president to kneel down, and lay his right hand upon a book, which is presented to him close shut. This being complied with, the following question is put to him: Will you promise to conceal the secrets of the holy office, and to speak the truth?

Should he answer in the negative, he is remanded to his cell, and cruelly treated. If he answers in the affirmative, he is ordered to be again seated, and the examination proceeds; when the president asks a variety of questions, and the clerk minutes both them and the answers.

When the examination is closed, the bell is again rung, the gaoler appears, and the prisoner is ordered to withdraw, with this exhortation; Tax your memory, recollect all the sins you have ever committed, and when you are again brought here, communicate them to the holy office.

Now the gaolers and attendants, when apprized that the prisoner hath made an ingenuous confession, and readily answered every question, make him a low bow, and treat him with an affected kindness, as a reward for his candour.

He is brought in a few days to a second examination, with the same formalities as before. It is then demanded of him, If he has taken a serious review of his past life, and will divulge its various secrets, and the crimes and follies into which he has run at different times. If he refuses to confess any thing, many ensnaring questions are put to him, and the arts of casuistry are exhausted to draw some secret from him. But if he accuses himself of any crimes or follies, they are written down by the secretary, and a process extracted from them. The inquisitors often over-reach prisoners, by promising the greatest lenity, and even to restore their liberty, if they will accuse themselves. The unhappy persons, who are in their power, frequently fall into this snare, and are sacrificed to their own simplicity, and ill-placed confidence. Instances have been known of some, who relying on the faith of the judges, and believing their fallacious promises, have accused themselves of what they were totally innocent, in expectation of obtaining their liberty speedily; and thus, being duped by the inquisitors, they became martyrs to their own folly, and suffered death for fictitious transgressions.

There is another artifice used by the inquisitors; if a prisoner has too much resolution to accuse himself, and too much sense to be ensnared by their sophistry, they proceed thus: a copy of an indictment against the prisoner is given him, in which, among many trivial accusations, he is charged with the most enormous crimes, of which human nature is capable. This, of course, rouses his temper, and he exclaims against such falsities. He is then asked which of the crimes he can deny? He naturally singles out the most atrocious, and begins to express his abhorrence of them, when the indictment being snatched out of his hand, the president says, "By your denying only those crimes which you mention, you implicitly confess the rest, and we shall therefore proceed accordingly."

These wretches make a ridiculous affectation of equity, by pretending that the prisoner may be indulged with a counsellor, if he chuses to demand one. Such a request is sometimes made, and a counsellor appointed; but upon these occasions, as the trial itself is a mockery of justice, so the counsellor is a mere cypher: for he is not permitted to say any thing that might offend the inquisitor, or to advance a syllable that might benefit the prisoner. Amazing profligacy, to turn that to a farce, which ought to be revered as a superior virtue.

It may be seen from what hath been said, that a prisoner to the inquisitors is reduced to the sad necessity of defending himself against accusers he does not know, and of answering to the evidence of witnesses he must not see. The only person he is permitted to have a sight of upon his trial, exclusive of the judges and secretary, is the fiscal, who acts officially as the ostensible accuser, from the collected information of others. A desire of being informed of the real accuser's name, or to see the actual witnesses, avail nothing, those things he is told are always kept secret. Thus is he continued in suspense respecting his fate, and frequently interrogated, perhaps, for years together, before his trial is finally concluded. When that fatal time comes, if he is condemned to die, death is deferred for a considerable time. To put him out of his misery immediately would be too great a favour, and prevent the inquisitors from indulging their sanguinary dispositions with other sufferings which they intend to inflict. They begin by putting him to the torture, under the pretence of making the poor wretch discover his accomplices. For this purpose the tortures are various, and the torments inflicted excruciating to the last degree. Well might a late writer, in speaking of these cruelties, exclaim, "O, that I was able to give some faint idea of that variety of tortures which the miserable victims are here forced to suffer; but no language can represent such a complicated scene of horrors. It is utterly impossible for any words to describe which of them is the most cruel and inhuman. Every one is so exquisite in its kind as to surpass all imagination. What detestable monsters then must those judges be, who are the inventors, and perpetrators of such misery? They are shaped, it is true, like other men, but surely they seem to have a different kind of souls. They appear as little affected with the groans and agonies of their fellow-creatures, as the cords, chains, racks, and tortures, which are applied to their writhing limbs. The hearts of these ecclesiastical butchers are grown callous, and, like those of common butchers are so insured to the shedding of blood, and horrid sight of mangled carcases, as to have lost all the impressions of sensibility, and every touch and feeling of humanity. Perpetual scenes of horror and distress become so familiar to their minds, that what would rend the very heart-strings of some men, make no more impression on theirs than on a rock of adamant. Indeed, without such a fiend-like temper, it would be impossible for any man to act the part of an inquisitor."

Though the inquisitors allow the torture to be used only three times, yet at those three it is so severely inflicted, that the prisoner either dies under it, or continues always after a cripple, and suffers the severest pains upon every change of weather. We shall give an ample description of the severe torments occasioned by the torture, from the account of one who suffered it the three respective times, but happily survived the cruelties he underwent.

The first Time of Torturing.

A prisoner on refusing to comply with the iniquitous demands of the inquisitors, by confessing all the crimes they thought proper to charge him with, was immediately conveyed to the torture room, where no light appeared but what two candles gave. That the cries of the sufferers might not be heard by the other prisoners, this room is lined with a kind of quilting, which covers all the crevices and deadens the sound.

Very great was the prisoner's horror on entering this infernal place, when suddenly he was surrounded by six wretches, who, after preparing the tortures, stripped him naked to his drawers. He was then laid upon his back on a kind of stand, elevated a few feet from the floor.

The operation they began by putting an iron collar round his neck, and a ring to each foot, which fastened him to the stand. His limbs being thus stretched out, they wound two ropes round each arm, and two round each thigh; which ropes being passed under the scaffold, through holes made for that purpose, were all drawn tight at the same instant of time, by four of the men on a given signal.

We

We may naturally conceive that the pains which immediately succeeded were intolerable; the ropes which were of a small size, cut through the prisoner's flesh to the bone, making the blood gush out at eight different places thus bound at a time. As the prisoner persisted in not making any confession of what the inquisitors required, the ropes were drawn in this manner four times successively.

Let it be observed, that a physician and surgeon attended, and often felt his temples, in order to judge of the danger he might be in; by which means his tortures were for a small space suspended, that he might have sufficient opportunity of recovering his spirits, to sustain each ensuing torture.

During this extremity of anguish, while the tender frame is tearing, as it were, in pieces, while at every pore it feels the sharpest pangs of death, and the agonizing soul is just ready to burst forth, and quit its wretched mansion, the ministers of the inquisition have the obduracy of heart to look on without emotion, and calmly to advise the poor distracted creature, to confess his imputed guilt, in doing which they tell him he may obtain a free pardon, and receive absolution. All this however, was ineffectual with the prisoner, whose mind was strengthened by a sweet consciousness of innocence, and the divine consolation of religion.

While he was thus suffering, the physician and surgeon were so barbarously unjust as to declare, that if he died under the torture, he would be guilty, by his obstinacy, of self-murder. In short, at the last time of the ropes being drawn tight he grew so exceedingly weak, by the circulation of his blood being stopped, and the pains he endured, that he fainted away; upon which he was unloosed, and carried back to his dungeon.

The second Time of Torturing.

These inhuman wretches of the inquisition, finding that all the torture inflicted, as above described, instead of extorting a discovery from the prisoner, only served the more fervently to excite his supplications to heaven for patience and power to persevere in truth and integrity, were so inhuman, six weeks after, as to expose him to another kind of torture, more severe if possible, than the former; the manner of inflicting which was as follows: they forced his arms backwards, so that the palms of his hands were turned outward behind him; when, by means of a rope that fastened them together at the wrists, and which was turned by an engine, they drew them by degrees, nearer each other, in such a manner that the back of each hand touched, and stood exactly parallel to the other. In consequence of this violent contortion, both his shoulders became dislocated, and a considerable quantity of blood issued from his mouth. This torture was repeated thrice; after which he was again taken to the dungeon, and put into the hands of the physician and surgeon, who, in setting the dislocated bones, put him to the most exquisite torment.

The third Time of Torturing.

About two months after the second torture, the prisoner, being a little recovered, was again ordered to the torture room; and there, for the last time, made to undergo another kind of punishment, which was inflicted twice without any intermission. The executioners fastened a thick iron chain twice round his body, which crossing upon his stomach, terminated at the wrists. They then placed him with his back against a thick board, at each extremity whereof was a pulley, through which there run a rope that caught the ends of the chain at his wrists.

Then the executioner stretching the end of this rope, by means of a roller placed at a distance behind him, pressed or bruised his stomach in proportion as the ends of the chain were drawn tighter. They tortured him in this manner to such a degree, that his wrists, as well as his shoulders, were quite dislocated. They were, however, soon set by the surgeons; but the barbarians, not yet satisfied with this series of cruelty, made him immediately undergo the like torture a second time; which he sustained (though if possible attended with keener pains) with equal constancy and resolution.

This done, he was again remanded to his dungeon, attended by the surgeon to dress his bruises and adjust the parts dislocated; and here he continued till their Auto de Fe, or gaol delivery, when he was happily discharged.

It may easily be judged from the before-mentioned relation, what dreadful agony the sufferer must have laboured under, at being so frequently put to the torture. Most of his limbs were disjointed; and so much was he bruised and exhausted, as to be unable, for some weeks, to lift his hand to his mouth; and his body became greatly swelled from the inflammation caused by such frequent dislocations. After his discharge he felt the effects of this cruelty for the remainder of his life, being frequently seized with thrilling and excruciating pains, to which he had never been subject, till after he had the misfortune to fall under the merciless and bloody lords of the inquisition.

The unhappy females who fall into the hands of the inquisitors, have not the least favour shewn them on account of the softness of their sex, but are tortured with as much severity as the male prisoners, with the additional mortification of having the most shocking indecencies added to the most savage barbarities.

Should the above-mentioned modes of torturing force a confession from the prisoner, he is remanded to his horrid dungeon, and left a prey to the melancholy of his situation, to the anguish arising from what he has suffered, and to the dreadful ideas of future barbarities. Should he refuse to confess, he is, in the same manner, remanded to his dungeon, but a stratagem is used to draw from him what the torture fails to do. A companion is allowed to attend him, under the pretence of waiting upon, and comforting his mind till his wounds are healed: this person, who is always selected for his cunning, insinuates himself into the good graces of the prisoner, laments the anguish he feels, sympathizes with him, and, taking an advantage of the hasty expressions forced from him by pain, does all he can to dive into his secrets.

This companion sometimes pretends to be a prisoner like himself, and imprisoned for similar charges. This is to draw the unhappy person into a mutual confidence, and persuade him in unbosoming his grief, to betray his private sentiments.

Frequently these snares succeed, as they are the more alluring by being glossed over with the appearance of friendship, sympathy, pity, and every tender passion. In fine, if the prisoner cannot be found guilty, he is either tortured, or harassed to death, though a few have sometimes had the good fortune to be discharged, but not without having, first of all, suffered the most dreadful cruelties. If he is found guilty, all his effects are confiscated, and he is condemned to be whipped, imprisoned for life, sent to the galleys, or put to death. These sentences are put in execution at an Auto de Fe, or gaol delivery, which is not held annually, or at any stated periods, but sometimes once in two, three, or even four years.

Having now mentioned the barbarities with which the persons of prisoners are treated by the inquisitors, we shall proceed to recount the severity of their proceedings against publications.

When a book is published, it is carefully read by some of the familiars belonging to the inquisition. These wretched critics are too ignorant to have taste, too bigoted to search for truth, and too malicious to relish beauties. They scrutinize, not for the merits, but for the defects of another, and pursue the slips of his pen with unremitting diligence. Hence they read with prejudice, judge with partiality, pursue errors with avidity, and strain that which is innocent into an offensive meaning.

They misapply, misunderstand, confound, and pervert the sense; and when they have gratified the malignity of their disposition, charge their blunders upon the author, that a prosecution may be founded upon their false conceptions, and designed misinterpretations.

Any trivial charge causes the censure of a book; but but it is to be observed, that the censure is of a three-fold nature, viz.

1. When the book is wholly condemned.
2. When the book is partly condemned, that is, when certain passages are pointed out as exceptionable, and ordered to be expunged.
3. When the book is deemed incorrect; the meaning of which is, that a few words or expressions displease the inquisitors. These, therefore, are ordered to be altered, and such alterations go under the name of corrections.

It is evident, from what has been said that the inquisitors check the progress of learning, impede the increase of arts, nip genius in the bud, destroy the national taste, and continue the cloud of ignorance over the minds of the people.

There is a catalogue of condemned books annually published under the three different heads of censures, already mentioned, and being printed on a very large sheet of paper, is hung up in the most public and conspicuous places. After which, people are obliged to destroy all such books as come under the first censure, and to keep none belonging to the other two censures, unless the exceptionable passages have been expunged, and the corrections made, as in either case disobedience would be of the most fatal consequence: for the possessing or reading the proscribed books are deemed very atrocious crimes.

Every publisher of such books is usually ruined in his circumstances, and sometimes obliged to pass the remainder of his life in the inquisition.

Instances of the Barbarities exercised by the INQUISITIONS of Spain and Portugal, on various Persons, upon several Occasions, and at different Times, from the most genuine Historians and the most authenticated Records.

I. FRANCIS ROMANES, a native of Spain, being of a mercantile turn of mind, was employed by the merchants of Antwerp, to transact some business for them at Breme. He had been educated in the Romish persuasion, but going one day into a Protestant church, he was struck with the truths which he heard, and beginning to perceive the errors of Popery, he determined to search further into the matter.

Perusing the sacred scriptures attentively, and reading the writings of some Protestant divines, he plainly perceived how erroneous the principles were he had formerly embraced; and renounced the impositions of Popery for the doctrines of the reformed church, in which religion appeared in all its genuine purity.

Resolving to give over-worldly thoughts, and think of his eternal salvation, he studied religious truths more than trade, and purchased books rather than merchandise, convinced that the riches of the body are trifling to those of the soul.

Now he resigned his agency to the merchants of Antwerp, giving them an account at the same time of his conversion; and then resolving, if possible, to convert his parents, he went to Spain for that purpose. But the Antwerp merchants writing to the inquisitors, he was seized upon, imprisoned for some time, and then condemned to be burnt as an heretic.

Romanes was led to the place of execution in a garment painted over with devils, and had a paper mitre put upon his head, by way of derision. As he passed by a wooden cross, one of the priests bade him kneel to it; but he absolutely refused so to do, saying, It is not for Christians to worship wood.

Having been placed upon a pile of wood, the fire quickly reached him, whereupon he lifted up his head suddenly; the priests thinking he meant to recant, ordered him to be taken down. Finding, however, that they were mistaken, and that he still retained his constancy, he was placed again upon the pile, where, as long as he had life and voice remaining, he kept repeating the seventh psalm.

II. At St. Lucar in Spain resided a carver named Rochus, whose principal business was to make images of saints and other popish idols. Becoming, however, convinced of the errors of the Romish persuasion, he embraced the Protestant faith, left off carving images, and for subsistence followed the business of a seal engraver only. He had, however, retained one image of the Virgin Mary for a sign; when an inquisitor passing by, asked if he would sell it; Rochus mentioned a price; the inquisitor objected to it, and offered half the money: Rochus replied, I would rather break it to pieces than take such a trifle. "Break it to pieces!" said the inquisitor, break it to pieces if you dare!"

At this expression Rochus, being provoked, immediately snatched up a chisel, and cut off the nose of the image. This was sufficient, the inquisitor went away in a rage, and soon after sent to have him apprehended. In vain did he plead that what he defaced was his own property, and that if it was not proper to do as he would with his own goods, it was not proper for the inquisitor to bargain for the image in the way of trade. Nothing, however, availed him; his fate was decided: he was condemned to be burnt, and the sentence was executed accordingly.

III. One Doctor Cacalla, his brother Francis, and his sister Blanch, were burnt at Valladolid, for having spoken against the inquisitors.

IV. A gentlewoman with her two daughters and her niece, were apprehended at Seville on account of their professing the Protestant religion. They were all put to the torture: and when that was over, one of the inquisitors sent for the youngest daughter, pretended to sympathize with her, and pity her sufferings; then binding himself with a solemn oath not to betray her, he said, "If you will disclose all to me, I promise you I will procure the discharge of your mother, sister, cousin, and yourself."

Now made confident by his oath, and intrapped by promises, she revealed the whole of the tenets they professed; when the perjured wretch, instead of acting as he had sworn, immediately ordered her to be put to the rack, saying, "Now you have revealed so much, I will make you reveal more." Refusing, however, to say any thing further, they were all ordered to be burnt, which sentence was executed at the next Auto de Fe.

V. The keeper of the castle of Triano, belonging to the inquisitors of Seville, happened to be of a disposition more mild and humane than is usual with persons in his situation. He gave all the indulgence he could to the prisoners, and shewed them every favour in his power with as much secrecy as possible. At length, however, the inquisitors became acquainted with his kindness, and determined to punish him severely for it, that other gaolers might be deterred from shewing the least traces of that compassion which ought to glow in the breast of every human being. With this view they superseded, threw him into a dismal dungeon, and used him with such dreadful barbarity that he lost his senses.

However, his deplorable situation, procured him no favour; for frantic as he was, they brought him from prison at an Auto de Fe to the usual place of punishment, with a sambenito (or garment worn by criminals) on, and a rope about his neck. His sentence was then read, and ran thus; that he should be placed upon an ass, led through the city, receive two hundred stripes, and then be condemned six years to the galleys.

This unhappy frantic wretch, just as they were about to begin his punishment, suddenly sprung from the back of the ass, broke the cords that bound him, snatched a sword from one of the guards, and dangerously wounded an officer of the inquisition. Being overpowered by multitudes, he was prevented from doing further mischief, seized, bound more securely to the ass, and punished according to his sentence. But so inexorable were the inquisitors, that for the rash effects of his madness an additional four years was added to his slavery in the galleys.

VI. A maid servant to another gaoler belonging to the inquisition was accused of humanity, and detected in bidding bidding the prisoners keep up their spirits. For these heinous crimes, as they were called, she was publicly whipped, banished her native place for ten years, and what is worse, had her forehead branded by means of red hot irons, with these words, "A favourer and aider of heretics."

VII. One John Pontic, a Spaniard by birth, a gentleman by education, and Protestant by profession, was, principally on account of his great estate, apprehended by the inquisitors, when the charges exhibited against him were as follow:

1. That he had said he abhorred the idolatry of worshipping the host.
2. That he shunned going to mass.
3. That he asserted the merits of Jesus Christ alone was a full justification for a Christian.
4. That he declared there was no purgatory; and
5. That he affirmed the pope's absolution not to be of any value.

All his effects, on these charges, were confiscated to the use of the inquisitors, and his body was burnt to ashes to gratify their revenge and indignation.

VIII. Also John Gonsalvo, originally a priest, but who now embraced the reformed religion, was with his mother, brother, and two sisters, seized upon by the inquisitors. Being condemned, they were led to execution, where they sung part of the 106th psalm.

They were ordered at the place of execution to say the creed, which they immediately complied with, but coming to these words, "The holy Catholic church," they were commanded to add the monosyllables "of Rome," which absolutely refusing, one of the inquisitors said, "Put an end to their lives directly;" when the executioners obeyed, and strangled them that very instant.

IX. There were four Protestant women who were seized upon at Seville, tortured, and in process of time ordered for execution. On the way thither they began to sing psalms; but the officers of the inquisition, thinking that the words of the psalms reflected on themselves, put gags into all their mouths, to make them silent. They were then burnt, and the houses where they resided ordered to be demolished.

X. A Protestant school-master of the name of Ferdinando, was apprehended by order of the inquisition, for instructing his pupils in the principles of Protestantism; and after being severely tortured, committed to the flames.

XI. There was a monk, who had abjured the errors of Popery, imprisoned at the same time as the above Ferdinando; but through the fear of death, and to procure mercy, he said he was willing to embrace his former communion. Ferdinando hearing of this, got an opportunity to speak to him, reproached him with his weakness, and threatened him with eternal perdition. The monk, sensible of his crime, returned to, promised to continue in the Protestant faith, and declared to the inquisitors that he solemnly renounced his intended recantation. Sentence of death was therefore passed upon him, and he was burned at the time that Ferdinando suffered.

XII. A Spanish Roman-Catholic, named Juliano, on travelling into Germany, became a convert to the Protestant religion: and having entertained no little zeal for the faith he had embraced, he undertook a very arduous task, which was to convey from Germany into his own country, a great number of Bibles, concealed in casks, and packed up like Rhenish wine. This important commission he succeeded in so far as to distribute the books. A pretended Protestant, however, who had purchased one of the Bibles, betrayed him, and laid an account of the whole affair before the inquisition. No sooner was this discovery made than Juliano was seized upon, and all possible means being used to find out the respective purchasers of these Bibles, eight hundred persons were apprehended upon the occasion. They were all indiscriminately tortured, and then most of them were sentenced to various punishments. Juliano was burnt, twenty were roasted upon spits, several imprisoned for life, some were publicly whipped, many sent to the galleys, and very few indeed released.

XIII. A Protestant taylor of Spain, named John Leon, travelled to Germany, and from thence to Geneva, where hearing that a great number of English Protestants were returning to their native country, he, and some more Spaniards, determined to go with them. The Spanish inquisitors being apprized of their intentions, sent a number of familiars so expeditiously in pursuit of them, that they overtook them at a sea-port in Zealand, one of the United-Provinces (which was then under the jurisdiction of Spain) just before they had embarked. Having thus succeeded in their commission, the poor prisoners were heavily fettered, handcuffed, gagged, and had their heads and necks covered with a kind of iron net work. In this miserable condition they were conveyed to Spain, thrown into a dismal dungeon, almost famished with hunger, barbarously tortured, and then burnt in a cruel manner.

XIV. A young lady having been put into a convent, absolutely refused to take the veil, or turn nun. On leaving the cloister she embraced the Protestant faith, which being known to the inquisitors, she was apprehended, and every method used to draw her back again to Popery. This proving ineffectual, her inexorable judges condemned her to the flames, and she was burnt according to her sentence, persisting in her faith to the very last moment.

XV. An eminent physician, and learned philosopher of the name of Christopher Losada, became extremely obnoxious to the inquisitors, on account of exposing the errors of Popery, and professing the tenets of Protestantism. For these reasons he was apprehended, imprisoned, and racked; but those severities not bringing him to confess the Roman-Catholic church to be the only true church, he was sentenced to the fire; the flames of which he bore with exemplary patience, and resigned his soul to that Creator by whom it was given.

XVI. Arias, a monk of St. Isidore's monastery at Seville, was a man of great abilities, but of a vicious disposition. He sometimes pretended to forsake the errors of the church of Rome, and become a Protestant, and soon after turned Roman-Catholic. Thus he continued a long time wavering between both persuasions, till God thought proper to touch his heart, and shew him the great danger of inconstancy in religious matters. He now became a true Protestant, and bewailed his former errors with contrition. The sincerity of his conversion being known, he was seized by the officers of the inquisition, severely tortured, and afterwards burnt at an Auto de Fe in a cruel manner.

XVII. There was a young lady named Maria de Coceicao, who resided with her brother at Lisbon, taken up by the inquisitors, and ordered to be put to the rack. The exquisite torments she felt staggered her resolution, and she fully confessed the charges against her. Hereupon the cords were immediately slackened, and she was re-conducted to her cell, where she remained till she had recovered the use of her limbs, and was then brought again before the tribunal, and ordered to ratify her confession, and sign it. This she absolutely refused to do, telling them, that what she had said was forced from her by the excessive pain she underwent. Incensed at this reply, the inquisitors ordered her again to be put to the rack, when the weakness of nature once more prevailed; and she repeated her former confession. She was immediately remanded to her cell till her wounds were again healed, when being a third time brought before the inquisitors, they in a stern manner ordered her to sign her first and second confessions. She answered as before, but added, "I have twice given way to the frailty of the flesh, and perhaps may, while on the rack, be weak enough to do so again; but depend upon it, if you torture me an hundred times, as soon as I am released from the rack I shall deny what was extorted from me by pain." The inquisitors ordered her to be racked a third time; and, during this last trial, she exceeded even her own expectations; bore the torments inflicted with the utmost fortitude, and could not be persuaded to answer any of the the questions put to her. As her courage and constancy increased, the inquisitors imagined that she would deem death a glorious martyrdom, and therefore, to disappoint her expectations, they condemned her to a severe whipping through the public streets, and banishment for ten years.

XVIII. A lady of a noble family in Seville, named Jane Bohorquia, was apprehended on the information of her sister, who had been tortured, and burnt for professing the Protestant religion. While on the rack, through the extremity of pain, that young lady confessed that she had frequently discoursed with her sister concerning Protestantism, and upon this extorted confession was Jane Bohorquia seized and imprisoned. Being pregnant at the beginning, they let her remain tolerably quiet till she was delivered, when they immediately took away the child, and put it to nurse, that it might be brought up a Roman-Catholic.

This unfortunate lady was not perfectly recovered from the weakness caused by her labour, when she was ordered to be racked, which was done with such severity, that she expired a week after of the wounds and bruises she received. Upon this occasion the inquisitors affected some remorse, and, in one of the printed acts of the inquisition, which they always publish at an Auto de Fe, this young lady is thus mentioned: "Jane Bohorquia was found dead in prison; after which, upon reviving her prosecution, the inquisitors discovered that she was innocent.—Be it therefore known, that no further prosecutions shall be carried on against her, and that her effects, which were confiscated, shall be given to the heirs at law."

Thus have the lords of the holy office of inquisition generously restored to her innocence, reputation, and estate. Strange inconsistency! to take the property, and torture the person before conviction of guilt, and then to compliment themselves for moderation, in returning what they had no right to seize, and forgiving one, who, by their own acknowledgment, had never offended them. One sentence, however, in the above ridiculous passage, wants explanation, viz. That no further prosecutions shall be carried on against her. This alludes to the absurd custom of prosecuting, and burning the bones of the dead: for when a prisoner dies in the inquisition, the process continues the same as if he was living; the bones are deposited in a chest, and if sentence of guilt is passed, they are brought out at the next Auto de Fe; the sentence is read against them with as much solemnity as against a living prisoner, and they are at length committed to the flames. In a similar manner are prosecutions carried on against prisoners who escape; and when their persons are far beyond the reach of the inquisitors, they are burnt in effigy.

XIX. Isaac Orobio, a learned physician, having beaten a Moorish servant for stealing, was accordingly accused by him of professing Judaism. Without considering the apparent malice of the servant, the inquisitors seized the master upon the charge. He was kept three years in prison before he had the least intimation of what he was to undergo, and then suffered the six modes of torture as follow:

1. A coarse linen coat was put on him, and then drawn so tight, that the circulation of his blood was nearly stopped, and the breath almost pressed out of his body. After this the strings were suddenly loosened, when the air forcing it's way hastily into his stomach, and the blood rushing into it's channels, he suffered the most incredible pains.

2. His thumbs were tied with small cords, so hard that the blood gushed from under the nails.

3. He was seated on a bench with his back against a wall, wherein small iron pullies were fixed. Ropes being fastened to several parts of his body and limbs, were passed through the pullies, and being suddenly drawn with great violence, his whole frame was forced into a distorted heap.

4. After having suffered for a considerable time the pains of the last mentioned position, the seat was snatched away, and he was left suspended against the wall in the most excruciating misery.

5. A little instrument with five knobs, and which went with springs, being placed near his face, he suddenly received five blows on the cheek, that put him to such pain as caused him to faint away.

6. The executioners fastened ropes round his wrists, and then drew them about his body. Placing him on his back with his feet against the wall, they pulled with the utmost violence, till the cords had penetrated to the bone.

He suffered the last torture three different times, and then lay seventy days before his wounds were healed. He was afterwards banished, and in his exile wrote the account of his sufferings, from which the foregoing particulars are chiefly extracted.

XX. A famous penman of Toledo, in Spain, and a Protestant, was fond of producing fine specimens of writings, and having them framed, to adorn the different apartments of his house. Among other curious examples of penmanship was a large piece, containing the Lord's prayer, creed, and ten commandments, thrown into verse, and finely written. This piece, which hung in a conspicuous part of the house, was one day seen by a person belonging to the inquisition, who observed that the verification of the commandments was not according to the church of Rome, but according to the Protestant church: for the Protestants retain the whole of the commandments as they are found in the Bible, but the Papists omit that part of the second commandment which forbids the worship of images. The inquisition soon had information of the whole, and this ingenious gentleman was seized, prosecuted, and burnt, only for ornamenting his house with a specimen of his skill and religion.

MR. MARTIN's case being not only singular in itself, but amply explained, and published under the immediate sanction of government, Mr. Martin being patronized by the highest characters both in church and state, we shall minutely enter into the particulars thereof.

In the year 1714, about Lent, Mr. Martin arrived at Malaga, with his wife, and four children. On the examination of his baggage, his Bible, and some other books were seized, and effectually lost to him.

He was accused in about three months time of being a Jew, for these curious reasons, that his own name was Isaac, and one of his sons was named Abraham.

As soon as he heard of the accusation, which was laid in the Bishop's Court, he informed the English consul of it, who said it was nothing but the malice of some of the Irish Papists, whom he advised him always carefully to shun. The clergy sent to Mr. Martin's neighbours to know their opinion concerning him: the result of which inquiry was this; We believe him not to be a Jew, but an heretic.

From this Mr. Martin was convinced that he had enemies at Malaga; but their malice did not appear formidable for some years. Being continually pestered by priests, particularly those of the Irish nation, in order to change his religion, he determined to dispose of what he had, and retire from a place which was become so disagreeable to him.

But when his resolution to leave Malaga had taken wind, at about nine o'clock at night (a late hour in that country) he heard a knocking at his door.

Mr. Martin demanded who was there? The persons without said they wanted to enter. He desired they would come again the next morning; but they replied, if he would not open the door they would break it open; and they were as good as their word, for it flew off the hinges while they were speaking to him.

When the barrier was removed, about fifteen persons entered, consisting of a commissioner, with several priests and familiars belonging to the inquisition. Mr. Martin would fain have gone to the English consul; but they told him the consul had nothing to do in the matter, and then said, where are your beads and fire-arms?

To which he replied, I am an English Protestant, and as such carry no private arms, nor make use of beads.

When they had taken away his watch, money, and other things, they carried him to the bishop's prison, and put on him a pair of heavy fetters. His distressed family was, at the same time, turned out of doors till the house was stripped; and when they had taken every thing away, they returned the key to his wife, that she and her children might solace themselves between the bare walls.

About four days after his commitment, Mr. Martín was told he must be sent to Grenada to be tried: he earnestly begged to see his wife and children before he went, but this humble request was cruelly denied.

Now being doubly fettered, he was mounted on a mule, and set out towards Grenada. By the way, the mule threw him upon a rocky part of the road, and almost broke his back. He was three days on the journey, as it is seventy-two miles of very rugged road from Malaga to Grenada.

Mr. Martin, on his arrival at Grenada, was detained at an inn till it was dark, for they never put any one into the inquisition during day-light. At night, Mr. Martin was taken to the inquisition, shewn up one pair of stairs, and led along a range of galleries till he arrived at a dungeon, which the gaoler unlocked, and staid with him till the under-gaoler fetched a lamp, and the things brought from Malaga by the carrier, which consisted of an old bed, a few clothes, and a box of books.

The gaoler nailed up the latter, and said, they must remain in that state till the lords of the inquisition chose to inspect them, for prisoners were not allowed to read books.

Then the gaoler took an inventory of every thing which Mr. Martin had about him, even to his very buttons; and having asked him a great number of frivolous questions, he, at length, gave him these orders: "You must observe as great silence here, as if you were dead; you must not speak, nor whistle, nor sing, nor make any noise that can be heard; and if you hear any body cry, or make a noise, you must be still, and say nothing, upon pain of 200 lashes."

Mr. Martin said he could not always be upon the bed, and asked if he might not have the liberty to walk about the room; the gaoler replied he might, but it must be very softly. After having given him some wine, bread, and half a dozen of walnuts, the gaoler left him till the morning.

At the time of Mr. Martin's imprisonment it was frosty weather, so that he lay extremely cold; for the walls of the dungeon were between two and three feet thick, the floor was bricked, and a great deal of wind came through a hole of about a foot in length, and five inches in breadth, which served as a window.

On the next morning the gaoler came to light his lamp, and bade him light a fire in order to dress his dinner. He then took him to a turn, or such a wheel as is usually found at the doors of convents, where a person on the other side, whom you cannot see, turns your provisions round to you. He had then given him, half a pound of mutton, two pounds of bread, some kidney beans, a bunch of raisins, and a pint of wine, which was the allowance for three days. He had likewise delivered to him for use, two pounds of charcoal, an earthen stove, a pipkin, some plates, a pitcher, an urinal, a broom, three baskets; one for bread, meat, and greens; a second for charcoal, and the other for dirt; and a wooden spoon.

Mr. Martin in a week's time was ordered to an audience: he followed the gaoler, and coming to a large room found a man sitting between two crucifixes; and another with a pen in his hand, who was, as he afterwards learned, the secretary.

The chief lord inquisitor was the person between the two crucifixes; he seemed about sixty years of age and was very lean. As soon as he saw Mr. Martin, he ordered him to sit down upon a little stool that fronted him, when the following examination took place, which we shall mark by the signatures Q. and A. the first letter implying the question which was asked by the inquisitor, and the last the answer thereto made by Mr. Martin.

Q. What was you brought here for?

A. My lord, I don't know.

Q. Can you speak Spanish?

A. I can speak Spanish, but not so well as English or French. If you please to send for an Irish or a French priest, I should be glad; for I am afraid I have not Spanish enough to answer your lordship in some things that you may demand of me.

Q. I find you speak Spanish enough; but what have you done? What is your name? What countryman are you? What religion are you of?

A. My lord, I don't know what I have done. My name is Isaac Martin; I am an Englishman, and a Protestant.

Q. Will you take an oath that you will answer the truth to what shall be demanded of you?

A. Yes, my lord, I will.

Q. Well, put your hand on that crucifix, and swear by the cross.

A. My lord, we swear upon scripture.

Q. It is no matter for scripture, put your hand upon the cross.

Mr. Martin then put his hand to the cross, and the other gravely began thus:

You must tell me what your father and mother's names were:—What their father and mother's names were:—What brothers and sisters they had:—What brothers and sisters you have; where they were born; and what business they followed, or do follow.

Mr. Martin answered all these questions to the best of his knowledge.

Q. You say you are an Englishman; we have great belief in them; they are generally people that speak the truth; I hope you will.

A. My lord, I don't know that I have done any thing that I should be afraid of: your lordship has given me my oath, and if you had not, I should have told the truth.

Q. Where was you born, Isaac? And in what parish?

A. My lord, I and my family were all born in London, but in different parishes.

Q. Are you a scholar? Have you studied Latin?

A. No my lord, I have had but a common education.

Q. What do you call a common education in your country? You have been at school, what did you learn there?

A. My lord, I learned to read, to write, and to cast accounts; that is what we call a common education.

Q. What sect are you of? For in England you have several religions, as you call them.

A. My lord, there are different opinions in England in matters of religion: I am of that which is called the church of England, and so was my father and mother.

Q. Was you baptized?

A. Yes, my lord, I hope I am a Christian.

Q. How are you baptized in England?

A. We are baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

Q. Do you take the sacrament in your religion?

A. Yes, my lord.

Q. How do you take it?

A. My lord, we take bread and wine, as our Saviour gave to his apostles.

Q. Do you confess your sins to your clergy, as we do in the church of Rome?

A. No, my lord, we confess them only to God Almighty.

Q. Do you know the Lord's Prayer, the Belief, and the Commandments?

A. Yes, my lord, and will give you an account of my religion if you please, and prove to you that I am a Christian, though I have been called a Jew and an heretic.

Q. What do you believe in your religion?

A. My lord, we believe the same creed that you have.

Q. Have you any bishops in your religion? Have you been confirmed?

A. My

A. My lord, we have archbishops and bishops, but I don't remember whether I have been confirmed.

Q. Isaac, you have been brought up in the dark; it is a pity, but you may enlighten yourself if you will.

A. My lord, I hope I have light enough to save myself if I live according to it.

Here Mr. Martin, through anxiety of mind, began to shed tears; which the inquisitor perceiving, proceeded to speak with great seeming tenderness.

Q. Don't cry, nor don't be afraid; here is nobody put to death here, nor harm done to any body. I hope your case is not so bad but it may be remedied; you are among Christians, and not among Turks.

A. My lord, I know very well that I am among Christians, and that the laws of Christians are merciful; but I have been used as if I had committed murder.

Q. Well! have patience, you shall have justice done you. You must think of what you have done or said during the time you lived at Malaga, and confess it; for that is the only way to get out of your troubles. But let us continue our examination: to be sure you was not brought here for nothing, was you?

A. My lord, I don't know what I was brought here for.

Q. You must think of that, and you must tell me how old you are; and likewise, as far as you can remember, what company you have kept, what business you have followed, what countries you have travelled in, and what languages you can speak.

A. My lord, I have been a traveller many years, and have made many trading voyages; sometimes in one country, and sometimes in another, and cannot remember how long I lived in every place, but I will tell you as well as I can.

Q. It is very well, Isaac, tell the truth.

Mr. Martin then gave a circumstantial account to the best of his memory.

Q. It is very well, Isaac, you have been a great traveller, you have been wild in your time.

A. Yes, my lord, too wild; for if I had staid at home as I ought to have done, I should not have been in this misery.

Q. In your religion do you believe in the Virgin Mary, the mother of God, and in the saints? Don't you worship them?

A. My lord, we believe that the Virgin Mary is the mother of Jesus Christ carnally, and believe she and the saints are happy, but do not worship them.

Q. What! don't you worship the mother of God, and the saints, that are always praying for us?

A. No, my lord, we worship only one God in three persons, and nothing else.

Q. [Speaking to his Secretary.] It is a pity that he hath been brought up in heresy, he talks pretty well.

[Addressing the prisoner.] What a pity it is that England has left the true faith, and has embraced heresy: formerly it produced many saints, but now it produces only schisms and heretics; and your bishops and clergy are a strange sort of people to marry as they do.

A. I believe, my lord, England produces as many good men as ever it did.

Q. Hold your tongue, you know nothing of those affairs; think of what you have done during your residence at Malaga, and that you may consider of these things, retire to your dungeon: I will send for you another time.

A. My lord, I hope your lordship will consider that I have a family; I beg therefore that your lordship will dispatch me as soon as possible.

Q. I will do all I can to dispatch you; go and think upon what you have done or said. I hope your case is not very bad, and can be remedied, if you think upon what I have said to you.

And thus concluded Mr. Martin's first examination, or audience, as it is called in the inquisition.

Now Mr. Martin tried to make a friend of the gaoler as much as possible, in order to pump what he could from him; but in this he could have but little success, for they are all sworn to secrecy. He, however, told him, that he was there for the good of his soul, and advised him, above all things, not to contradict the inquisitors.

THE SECOND AUDIENCE.

In about a week after, Mr. Martin being called to a second audience, the following questions and answers were the result.

Q. Well, Isaac, how do you do? Do you remember what you have done, or said, whilst you lived at Malaga? Have you reflected on what I said to you?

A. Yes, my lord, but I cannot remember every thing that has happened in four years time.

Q. Well! let us hear what you have remembered.

A. My lord, during my living at Malaga, I was attacked and insulted several times about my religion: I hope your lordship allows that an honest man ought to defend his religion?

Q. Yes, Isaac, he may defend it.

A. My lord, it is what I have done, and the same liberty have the Spaniards in my country; for if a bishop should attack them in matters of religion, they have liberty to defend themselves.

Q. How long have you been married?

A. Seven Years.

Q. Was your wife maid, or widow, when you married her?

A. A widow, my lord.

Q. What quarrels have you had with different people, and who were they?

Mr. Martin named four or five people with whom he had little contests.

Q. Do you think those people your enemies? If you do, tell me what reason you have for thinking so?

A. My lord, at my first arrival at Malaga, three Irishmen went to the bishop's court, to acquaint them that I was a Jew, though they hardly knew my name, or what religion I was of. Your lordship has heard it, I suppose. All the time that I lived at Malaga, they, upon divers occasions, shewed themselves my enemies. My friends oftentimes told me that they spoke ill of me behind my back; sometimes saying that I was a Jew, and sometimes an heretic; and that they would play me a trick one day, that I should not carry much money along with me if I left the place; and I find, my lord, that they have accomplished their design.

Q. Have you had no words about religion? Have you not blasphemed against our holy faith?

A. No, my lord, I am a better bred man than that. My religion does not permit such things: it is true, that I have had high words about religion when I have been attacked, but not to blaspheme your religion.

Q. Well! but what is the reason that you have so many enemies, can you tell?

A. I know no other reason, my lord, but that I am an English Protestant, and had better business than they had, which caused them to envy me ever since I came to Malaga.

Q. Well! but Isaac, have you no inclination to be a good Christian, and to be in the right way of salvation? You are a man of age and reason, and have a family: it is time to think of your soul.

A. My lord, I hope God will save me in the religion I have been brought up in: I have no inclination to change my religion; Jesus Christ allows of no persecution; I hope my lord, there is none here.

Q. No, Isaac, it is all voluntary; I would have you think upon it for the good of your soul, and your family. Do not you believe in the holy father the pope, that he is infallible, and that he can absolve people from their sins?

A. No, my lord, I believe that he is no more than another bishop, and can absolve no more than another clergyman.

Q. Don't you believe in purgatory?

A. No, my lord, I believe in no such thing.

Q. What, don't you believe that there is a place called purgatory, where the souls of those that die are retained to be purified before they can go to heaven?

A. No,

A. No, my lord, I believe that the blood of Christ is sufficient to cleanse us from our iniquities.

Q. Poor man, you have been brought up in heresy and ignorance from your youthful days. I am sorry for you, you will find yourself mistaken when it is too late. You have time to consider of it, and I would advise you to do it for your own good. Can you think of any thing else that you have done that they have sent you here for?

A. No, my lord; I have had some few words with people, but I believe that has not any connection with this affair.

Q. What words had you with the Spaniards at Malaga?

A. My lord, at first several desired me to speak the language for them, to help them to sell their goods to ships that came to load there; and I did, but there came so many, that I could not do business for myself, so that I desired them to excuse me and take somebody else; but they still importuned me so, that I was obliged to tell them that I would trouble myself no more about their business, and that I had business enough of my own to mind; at which they would sometimes fall into a passion, and generally reflect upon my religion, which I could not always digest.

Q. Very well, Isaac, have you any thing else to say relating to your affairs?

A. My lord, I don't know what to say.

Q. Well, go to your dungeon, and think of what you have done; for it will be a great help to your release. I will do you what service I can, but you must do what you can to serve yourself, and think upon what I have said to you.

Mr. Martin had soon after three other audiences, in all of which he was only asked the same questions as we have already inserted, which was to detect him in a falsehood, if he had told one, and to discover if he prevaricated in any part of his story.

The head gaoler told Mr. Martin one morning, that he must get his dungeon very clean, for he was to have a visit from one of the lords of the inquisition; at the same time he gave him some advice to throw into the fire when he heard him coming, in order to take away the stench. On hearing a noise on the stair-case, he did so, and the inquisitor, whose name was Don Petro Leonor, soon after made his appearance.

Now this inquisitor asked a great number of frivolous questions with much pomposity; then making a transition to England, he very liberally abused king Henry the Eighth, queen Elizabeth, and king William, the latter of whom he affirmed to have been of no religion, because he had read such an assertion in a French book. Changing from these, he attacked the archbishops, bishops, clergy, and people of England in general, and after abusing them with great liberality, he walked away with the most assumed dignity and consequence.

In a few days after, Mr. Martin was called to his sixth audience, when, after a few immaterial interrogatories, the inquisitor told him the charges against him should be read, and that he must give an immediate and prompt answer to each respective charge.

THE FIRST ACCUSATION.

That soon after your coming to Malaga, you went and abused the school-master for teaching your children the Christian doctrine; telling him that you would teach them your own religion, and that you sent them to school to learn to read and write, and not to learn religion.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, I will confess the truth; I hope your lordship requires nothing else. I did go to the school-master, and told him, that I sent my children to learn to read and write, and not to learn prayers; that I would have them brought up in my religion, and would teach them how to pray, but I did not abuse him. I believe, my lord, I have the liberty to bring up my children in my own faith without being called to an account for it.

The inquisitor seemed displeased at this reply, and bid the secretary write him down guilty of the first accusation.

THE SECOND ACCUSATION.

That at divers times it was remarked, that you did not pull off your hat, nor pay homage to images, but turned you back on them.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, in my religion we pay no respect to graven images. I profess myself to be a Protestant, it is against my conscience to bow to any; and I am not obliged by the articles of peace so to do. I believe your lordship knows what the word Protestant means.

The inquisitor told him, that as he lived in a country where it was done, he ought to comply with the custom of the place in which he resided. The secretary was then ordered to record the answer.

THE THIRD ACCUSATION.

You once said, walking in your own apartment with an English captain, an heretic, like yourself, that purgatory was but an invention of the church of Rome to get money. There was one present who could speak your language, and heard you say so.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, I cannot remember every thing that I have said during four years time. It may be, that I have said such a thing; but if I did, it was not to a Roman-Catholic. If there was one in the room that heard me say so, he must be an Irishman, who was not very welcome there, for he came more as a spy than any thing else.

The inquisitor asking if he thought he knew him, Mr. Martin named the person on whom his suspicion fell. The inquisitor then having blamed him for giving his tongue such liberties in Roman-Catholic countries, demanded if he was sorry for having said so; he replied, "My lord, if I have said amiss, I beg your lordship's pardon." When the inquisitor, turning to the secretary, said, Write down that the heretic begs pardon for the third accusation.

THE FOURTH ACCUSATION.

That you was once walking with another person, who pulled his hat off to a crucifix. You asked him why he pulled his hat off? He replied, to the crucifix; when you said, we have no such things in our country, and passed by without pulling off your hat.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, I remember the time very well; it is very true, I never pulled off my hat to a crucifix, unless it was carried in procession; and then I used to pull off my hat to it, not in respect to the image, but to cause no scandal.

Guilty of this accusation by his own confession.

THE FIFTH ACCUSATION.

That you have spoken several times in religious disputes against our faith; and though you have been frequently admonished to embrace the Roman-Catholic persuasion, without which no man can be saved, you would never give ear to such salutary advice.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, at my first arrival in the inquisition you allowed that a man might defend his religion: it is what I have done. As for being admonished to change it, that has happened very often; but I have no inclination to change.

Then the inquisitor asked him if he could not defend his own religion without speaking against the church of Rome? To which Mr. Martin made answer, that he really could not; "For, says he, in disputing with others, when they spoke against my religion, I naturally spoke against their's; and I brought proof of scripture for what I said."

He was recorded as guilty of this charge by his own confession.

THE SIXTH ACCUSATION.

That being on board an English ship, with your wife and others, a certain female admonished your wife to change her religion, when you bade her be quiet and mind her own religion. This was on a Friday, and you ate meat without regarding the day. Do you remember that, Isaac?

THE ANSWER.

Yes, my lord, we were very merry drinking Florence wine and punch, and that woman was always talking of religion religion to my wife, though she hardly knew what she said, and at best knew but little of the matter. I desired her to be quiet, and told her we did not come on board to talk of religion, but to be merry. But she continuing to talk on in the same manner, made us very uneasy, so that I bade her hold her tongue, and had a trifling quarrel with her. As for eating meat on a Friday, I generally do, and so did she, though she is a Roman-Catholic.

Hereupon the inquisitor turning to the secretary, expressed himself thus: Write down what the heretic says.

THE SEVENTH ACCUSATION.

That being in company with some English heretic captains at church, there were several people kneeling and praying to the image of the Virgin Mary. The captains asked if they prayed to the image? You answered, Yes, they know no better, for they are brought up in ignorance.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, I have been divers times walking with captains. I do not remember this particular time: it may be that some person heard me say so; but I am sure I spoke English, and I suppose it must be an Irishman that heard me say so.

The inquisitor was very severe upon this reply; but upon Mr. Martin's asking pardon, he said, "Secretary, write down that the heretic asks pardon; but (continues he, shaking his head) I wish asking pardon may do."

THE EIGHTH ACCUSATION.

That being walking with several merchants, the host passed by, when they took off their hats, and some kneeled; but you did not so much as take off your hat, which occasioned such great scandal, that some of the people were going to stab you.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, it is false: I have lived several years in Roman-Catholic countries, and know, that by the articles of peace, I am obliged to have my hat off on all occasions. During my residence at Malaga, I always took care not to cause any scandal; with respect to bowing or kneeling, I did not do it, nor am I obliged to do it, as it is expressly against my religion. As for people stabbing me, I have run those hazards many times on account of my religion.

The secretary was ordered to write down, that he denied the accusation.

THE NINTH ACCUSATION.

You have been threatened divers times with the pope's authority in these countries, and you have said that you did not value him, and that he had no authority over you.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, it is true I have said so.

This answer occasioned the following curious altercation:

Q. How came you to say so? Don't you value the holy father who is God on earth?

A. My lord, talking with some people who were very troublesome about religion, they threatened me with the authority of the pope, and being an English Protestant, I thought they had nothing to do with me.

Q. What! then you value nobody?

A. I beg your lordship's pardon; I value all mankind as being fellow-creatures; I value the pope as bishop of Rome, but not for what authority he has over me, for I believe he has not any.

Q. You are mistaken; I see who is the head of the church.

A. My lord, I see to my sorrow, that I was mistaken. Jesus Christ is the head of the church.

Q. What, then you allow no head upon earth?

A. No, my lord.

Q. Hold your tongue; you are an unbeliever; he is God upon earth.

The secretary was ordered to record Mr. Martin's several replies.

THE TENTH ACCUSATION.

That being walking with some captains of ships, there was a procession going by, when you bid them retire, and not mind it, though it was their design to see it: but you hindered them out of disrespect to the procession.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, processions are very frequent in Malaga. I have oftentimes been in company with captains who were never in Roman-Catholic countries before; and they, not knowing that people went in procession for devotion, would laugh, and not take their hats off: so that I desired them to retire to avoid confusion; I hope there is no harm in that, my lord.

THE ELEVENTH ACCUSATION.

That the procession (mentioned in accusation the tenth) went by, and the people kneeled down and worshipped; but you stood with your hat on, and took no notice of it.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, I remember nothing of the accusation, but believe it is false; or if I did not take off my hat, it was because the host was not there. But with respect to kneeling or bowing, I told your lordship I never do; your lordship tries me as a Roman-Catholic; I am a Protestant; I gave a short account of my religion to your lordship at my first coming. Was I a Roman-Catholic, I should certainly be guilty.

The answers to both the last accusations were ordered to be recorded.

THE TWELFTH ACCUSATION.

That being in your own house, an English captain asked you if you was a Jew; when you burst into a fit of laughter, and answered, you did not value what scandalous people said, for you was ready to give an account of your religion.

THE ANSWER.

It is true, my lord, I little valued what such scandalous people said, and was always ready to give an account of my faith. Nor did I think of being sent here, that it might be examined whether I was a Jew or not, when the clergy are so numerous at Malaga.

THE THIRTEENTH ACCUSATION.

That you refused to give any thing to such as begged alms for the souls that are in purgatory, and violently huffed them from your door.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, it is true; but do they mention the reason why I did so?

The inquisitor did not satisfy him, but bade him relate the reason, which he did, by informing him, that one person in particular, who went about begging alms for the souls in purgatory, did all he could to torment him, and the more Mr. Martin declared he would not disburse money for any such purpose, the more importunate the other became, calling him heretic, dog, and telling him that he would be damned, which at length overcame his temper, and made him, in some measure, return the fellow's abuse.

THE FOURTEENTH ACCUSATION.

That you have been heard to say you feared no ecclesiastical court of justice, nor even the inquisition itself, which you affirmed had nothing to do with you as an English Protestant.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, I have oftentimes said so.

The twelfth and thirteenth replies were recorded as delivered; but Mr. Martin being persuaded to entreat forgiveness for the fourteenth, the secretary was ordered to insert, "The heretic begs pardon."

THE FIFTEENTH ACCUSATION.

That you have had Jews in your house, without giving notice to the commissioners of the inquisition, that they might be taken up and prosecuted according to the laws of the country. How durst you do such things? Do you remember these circumstances?

THE ANSWER.

Yes, my lord, I do very well.

On this confession of the fact, the following dialogue took place.

Q. Then let us hear what you have to say for yourself.

A. My

A. My lord, there came a ship bound for Leghorn, with a passenger who came to my house: he spoke very good Spanish, and I believe, by his looks, was a Jew. He stayed with his captain about two hours at my house; I never saw him before or since. He might be a Christian for what I know, but being bound for Leghorn, and speaking Spanish, I thought him a Jew; that is all I know of the man. God knows what religion he was of.

Q. Do you know the person that has sent this accusation against you?

A. Yes, my lord, I believe I do; his name is A. H. a man of a very indifferent character.

THE SIXTEENTH ACCUSATION.

That it is confirmed by several people, that the said heretic, Isaac Martin, has, at divers times, shewn himself very disaffected against the holy faith of the church of Rome, and has hindered some people from embracing it; so that had it not been for the sake of his family, he would have been murdered long ago.

Then the remainder of this accusation goes in the first person, by way of petition from the accusers, thus:

"We recommend him to your holy office, as a dangerous and pernicious man against the holy faith of the church of Rome; and a great many report he is a Jew. We desire your tribunal will examine him with a great deal of strictness, according to the custom of your holy office, and give him such chastisement as your lordship shall think fit, as well in body as chattels."

The secretary having read this accusation, the inquisitor said, "Well! what have you to say for yourself? See what a character people give you! Sure you are a very wicked man!" To which Mr. Martin made the following

ANSWER.

My lord, I suppose those are very good Christians that give me this character; God knows best what to do with them; there are none of them can say I ever wronged any body at Malaga. I have always professed myself to be a Protestant; and for that reason, and no other, I have been brought here. I hope God will enable me to go through these afflictions. I am very well assured that your lordship knows I am no Jew. As for what character they give me, God knows best whether I deserve it or no. I have answered the truth to your examination to the best of my remembrance; and I believe your lordship knows it to be so, and know the people that informed against me are but people of a very indifferent character, which have always envied me ever since I lived at Malaga.

Q. Most of your accusers are your countrymen; sure they would not speak against you, if the things were not so?

A. My lord, those whom you reckon my countrymen are the worst enemies I have: I deny them for countrymen; they are Irishmen: it is true that Ireland belongs to the crown of England; but these people have deserted from our army, and are enemies to my religion, king, and country, and the worst that an English Protestant can have abroad. I wonder, my lord, that there is no merchant, or man of good repute, that has declared any thing against me.

Q. Hold your tongue, do you think that I will believe all you say? To be sure you have been a very wicked man by what is mentioned here, and you deny a great many things, and are so malicious, that you give what turn you please to things. I have heard of you four years ago; you are a sly man, but we have tortures to make people speak truth.

A. My lord, you may do what you please with me; I cannot help myself, for your lordship knows that I have declared the truth.

Q. You shall have a lawyer to defend your cause, but I believe it is very bad.

Then a lawyer was called in, to whom the inquisitor made an harangue, telling him, that Mr. Martin was a strong heretic; that he had been examined, and denied many things of which he had been accused. He then ordered the lawyer to write to Malaga concerning him, and concluded by saying, his case is very bad, yet might be remedied; but he is obstinate, and will not have it so.——The lawyer, to all his lordship said, only bowed, and answered Yes or No; but he did not speak to Mr. Martin, though it was pretended he was to plead for him.

When the lawyer was gone, the inquisitor said, "Go, you are guilty; you may repent what you have said; if you do not, take care: sign these papers, which are what you confess." Mr. Martin having signed the papers, was remanded to his dungeon.

When Mr. Martin's examination, upon the accusations against him, was resumed (which was by his own desire) the proceedings followed thus:

Q. Well, Isaac, what have you to say in your defence? You have demanded an audience.

A. My lord, I have nothing to say but what I have said already; I come to beg the favour of your lordship to dispatch me; I believe you have done examining me; I remember that it was desired I might be chastised both in body and wealth; I believe that my body has been chastised enough in suffering what I have suffered, and in being locked up in a dark dungeon by myself, where I live worse than a dog; as for what wealth God has given me, your lordship is welcome to it. If I am such a bad man as people report, fetter me, and send me, with my family, aboard any ship; let her be bound where she will, God will provide for us.

Q. Hold, Isaac, things are not done so soon as you think for; you have broken the articles of peace by your own confession.

A. My lord, I am very sorry if I have; I desire your lordship would shew them to me, that I may know in what I am guilty.

Q. I have them; you shall see them another time: there is a great deal to be said in your affair. Have you any thing else to say?

A. No, my lord, I desire to be tried by them (the articles of peace): you was pleased to tell me that you would quickly dispatch me.

Q. Go, go to your dungeon; and think of what you have done.

Mr. Martin, upon this occasion, says thus: "When I came to my dungeon, I was resolved to ask no more audience, and wondered that such a man, who sat upon a throne between two crucifixes, attributing to himself holiness and infallibility, should tell so many lies; and found, that there was no way of redemption, but by praying to God to give me strength to overcome the miseries that I was in, and in mercy to deliver me from their hands."

A few days after the third inquisitor, named Don Joseph Egnaraz, came, with his secretary, to see Mr. Martin, when the following conversation took place:

Q. How do you do, Isaac? Have you any thing to say in your defence? Can I serve you in any thing, tell me?

A. My lord, I have nothing to say but what I have said already: I think it is very hard to be kept here so long.

Q. Hark ye! you Englishmen think that we aim at your wealth, but you are mistaken, there is no such thing. You have confessed that you did not take your hat off to our images: you ought to do it, living in these Christian countries, whether you believe in them or no; for it shews ill-example if you do not.

A. My lord, we Protestants never do such things, it is against our religion and against our consciences so to do.

Q. You must do all in this country, and it is a thing that ought to be done. See if I can serve you in any thing?

A. If your lordship would be pleased to get me out of this misery, I should be very much obliged to you.

Q. There is time for all things. You have been brought up in heresy, you are here for the good of your soul, you must enlighten yourself in the true faith; I will do you all the service I can; have you any thing else to say?

A. My lord, I hope to be saved in the faith I am in.

Q. Well,

Q. Well, think upon what I have said to you. Good by to you.

Being again called up for the continuance of his trial, and the accusation against him, the following were the particulars.

Q. Well, Isaac, have you thought of any thing else in your affair, besides what you have already declared.

A. No, my lord, I have nothing to say, unless I repeat what I have said already, and I believe that will signify nothing.

Q. Here are several more accusations come against you that you must answer to.

A. It is very well, my lord, I will answer to them as well as I can.

The inquisitor read over the accusations, which consisted of what had already been answered, only altered, mangled, and misplaced, with some additional articles. After having done reading, he said,

Q. Well, Isaac, what have you to say now?

A. My lord, this is the same thing over again, only the accusations are altered and misplaced; I can quickly answer to them, and as for those that are added to them, they are almost all false, and the Devil has invented them.

Q. Hold, Isaac, you talk strangely.

A. My lord, I speak the truth; your lordship was pleased to tell me at my first coming that you would dispatch me very soon. I have been here above three months, and am no more likely to get out than the first day.

Q. Hold, hold; do you think that justice is done here as in your country, at random, and I don't know how. Here things are well examined, and justice is done, as it ought to be done.

A. My lord, I believe we have good justice done in England, but I beg your lordship's pardon; I do not understand this way of justice.

Q. I believe you do not, but it is no matter, remember, you are upon your oath, and answer to articles.

A. Must I answer to those that I have answered already?

Q. Yes, you must; and take care what you say.

A. Very well, my lord.

Mr. Martin then made a second answer to the accusations already exhibited against him; when the inquisitor ordered the secretary to continue the trial, with the accusations which had not yet been brought forth.

THE SEVENTEENTH ACCUSATION.

That you hindered your family from being brought up in the Christian faith, and if it was not for you they would be all Romans, and it is against the laws of the country to hinder them.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, it is false that my family had any inclination to be Romans; neither can any law oblige them to be so, or hinder me from bringing them up in my religion. Your lordship, five weeks ago, told me, that you would shew me the articles of peace, and that I had broke them. Pray let me see them, my lord.

Q. You shall see them another time. Answer to these articles.

A. My lord, all my family are as I am; I could never perceive that they were inclined to change their religion.

Q. What! do you deny this accusation?

A. Yes, my lord, I do; it is all false.

THE EIGHTEENTH ACCUSATION.

You used to shut your window shutters when the processions went by, to hinder your children from kneeling down, and would beat them if they shewed any inclinations to be Roman-Catholics.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, it is true that I have shut my shutters several times; for sometimes I had captains of ships in my house, that would not pull their hats off when they saw them. As for my children, they went to the window generally to laugh; and I oftentimes bade them not shew themselves till the procession went by, that no scandal might be given; and if I beat them, as it is said, I believe I have the liberty to do it if I please.

Q. No, you have not in some cases. How old are your children?

A. One is fifteen, another eight, and the other five years of age.

Q. They are of age to be brought up in the Christian faith.

A. I hope they are, my lord; but as for the two youngest, they can be brought up to any religion.

Q. Your daughter, and your son Abraham are of age, and you are but their father-in-law: they may be brought up in the Christian faith: you have nothing to do with them.

A. My lord, I hope that they are Christians; and I look upon them as if they were my own children.

Q. So then you would have them brought up in your religion?

A. Yes, my lord.

THE NINETEENTH ACCUSATION.

That your daughter being of age, hath often said in the neighbourhood, that she would be a Roman-Catholic, but was afraid you would beat her; and that you had sometimes beat her upon that account.

A. My lord, I have nothing to answer to such lies; it is as false as the Devil is false.

Q. What! have you nothing to say, Isaac, to this article?

A. No, my lord, I never knew my daughter inclinable to be a Roman, and I never did beat her upon that account. It is all false, and you may order your secretary to write down what you please.

THE TWENTIETH ACCUSATION.

That in Lent, and other fast days, you caused your family to eat meat, and forbade them to keep any fast days that were appointed by the church of Rome, and beat them if they did.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, those are poor accusations, and they are all false. I thank God my table afforded flesh and fish all the year round; I never troubled my head to see what the servants used to eat; and as for myself, wife, and children, we eat meat all the year, without any scruple of conscience. Your lordship knows that.

Q. You English mind nothing but eating and drinking, and living at your ease, without doing any penance.

A. My lord, I beg your pardon, we have souls to be saved as well as other nations. We are born in a plentiful country, and I believe we live as well as the people of any nation, and serve God as well.

Q. Your country was a good country formerly; it produced a great many saints, but now it produces no such thing.

A. My lord, I believe there are no saints now, but I am persuaded it produces as many good men as ever it did.

Q. Hold your tongue, you are all lost men; you are all fallen from the holy church, and there is no salvation for you if you do not return.

THE TWENTY-FIRST ACCUSATION.

That your children had often been at mass, and at prayers in the neighbourhood, and would have done it every day if you would have let them. But you beat them, and hindered them being Christians, and thereby endangered their souls.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, I never knew my children go to mass or prayers in the neighbourhood, or beat them upon that account; I hope God will save their souls in the religion to which they are brought up; though the church of Rome condemns them. The accusation is false.

Q. Why, you deny every thing almost.

A. I deny nothing but what is false, my lord.

Q. Well, but you may forget, Isaac.

A. No, my lord, I have nothing else to think of; and I do think these are very insignificant articles to allege against me, if the things were as they say. But they are false, and I believe they are scandalous people that have invented them.

Q. Hold your tongue! How durst you speak so?

A. It

A. It is very well, my lord, let your secretary write down any thing what you please; it is all false.

THE TWENTY-SECOND ACCUSATION.

That living at Lisbon you had several disputes about religion, and that you hid yourself for fear of being taken up by the inquisition as a Jew.

Come, answer; what have you to say to this article? It is of consequence.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, let your secretary write down what you please; I have nothing to answer to such scandalous reports. God knows that I am no Jew, and your lordship knows it very well. The Devil has invented this to frighten me; but God, that knows every thing, will revenge my cause.

Q. Well! but, Isaac, you see what they write against you; and all your family's names are ancient, and of the Mosaic law.

A. My lord, you have oftentimes reflected upon my name being Isaac, and my son's name being Abraham, but you don't talk of a child that I buried at Malaga, whose name was Peter; and one that I have whose name is Barnard, they are saints' names.

Q. Those are all Christian names.

A. And so are the others, my lord; we don't mind whether we give our children names out of the Old or New Testament. Besides, my lord, neither Abraham, nor Isaac, nor Jacob, were Jews.

Q. Yes, they were Jews; sure you're mistaken.

A. I beg your lordship's pardon, I am not mistaken.

Q. What were they then? let us hear.

A. My lord, they were Hebrews; they lived under the law of nature, as God inspired, and spoke to them; but were dead many years before God had given his laws to Moses.

Q. Hold your tongue, methinks you understand something of the Mosaic law.

A. My lord, thank God, I understand some of the old and some of the new laws; but not so much as I should. We have always the Old and the New Testament in our families, and we read in them to instruct us in our religion.

Q. Hold your tongue, you give a wrong sense to scripture; your knowing so much has brought you here; you had better known less, and believed the true faith.

A. My lord, I hope to be saved in what I believe; and if at Lisbon I was disputing of religion, it was not in defending the laws of Moses; for several Jews were burnt whilst I was there; therefore it proves, my lord, that the accusation is false, and that I would not run such hazards.

THE TWENTY-THIRD ACCUSATION.

That you bred schisms among the people, persuading them to turn heretics, and to leave the church of Rome, out of which no man can be saved.

THE ANSWER.

I wish your lordship, or any body else, would tell me whom I persuaded to change their religion. You may accuse me of any thing; hell can't invent greater lies. I can't think, my lord, who could have sent such accusations against me. When I talked of religion, it was generally with clergymen, and not with common people; for I know that they are not capable of it, as they know but little of the matter.

Q. They know enough, it is believing that saves us; and you won't believe, but deny almost every article.—Hold your tongue.

THE TWENTY-FOURTH ACCUSATION.

That your name being Isaac, and your son's name Abraham, you must be a Jew, or related to Jews.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, I have sufficiently answered upon this matter; this is nothing but repetitions: the Roman-Catholics, that are in Holland and Flanders, don't much mind whether their children have names out of the Old or out of the New Testament, and I knew a man at Malaga, who is a Flanderkin, and a Roman-Catholic, whose name is Jacob. As for my parents, I never knew any of them were Jews; let your secretary write what you please.

THE TWENTY-FIFTH ACCUSATION.

That you offered to dispose of your house, and to retire for fear of being taken up by the inquisition.

THE ANSWER.

My lord, it is true that I offered to dispose of my house, but not for fear of the inquisition, for I never thought it had any thing to do with English Protestants. If I had been afraid of it, I would never have come to live in the country: I had opportunities enough to go on board of English ships, and to retire if I had been afraid.

Q. What! then you thought the inquisition had nothing to do with the English Protestants? You are mistaken.

A. My lord, I see I am, to my sorrow.

Q. What did you design to do after you had disposed of your house?

A. My lord, to go to my own country; for I was tired of living abroad, especially at Malaga, where I could have no rest, but was daily affronted upon the account of my religion.

Q. You have a tongue, that you made use of to defend yourself.

A. My lord, I could not always bear their insolencies; but I find they have accomplished their design.

Q. Well, hold your tongue, you may help yourself still if you will.

THE TWENTY-SIXTH ACCUSATION.

That you took all opportunities of making game of the religion of the church of Rome. Well! what have you to say to that?

THE ANSWER.

My lord, I don't deny that; being in company with some Roman-Catholics, as they have made game of my religion, I have made game of their's; but it was in joke, and not in a profane way.

Q. Religion ought not to be mocked.

A. It is very true, my lord; but I never scandalized them as they did me, upon the account of my religion.

Q. What did they usually say to you? Let's hear.

A. My lord, you know that the church of Rome don't allow the heretics (as you call us) to be saved: in our faith we have charity for all men; we condemn nobody. I have oftentimes been told, that I and my family were damned, and that it was impossible for us to be saved. My lord, it is very hard to hear such words so often as I have. I sometimes gave them an answer that they did not like; for I could not always bear what they said. I hope to be saved through God's mercy, as well as they do.

Q. So, you say that when they made game of your religion, you made game of their's. Is not that what you say?

A. Yes, my lord.

Q. Well, hold your tongue, you are a sly man; you give what turn you please to things, and deny almost every thing: you will repent of this, if you don't take care. We have ways to make people confess who are obstinate. Sign these papers: these are the articles you confess, and these are what you deny.—But I won't believe you; I have heard of you a long while ago, and know now that you are a cunning pernicious man against the Roman-Catholic faith.

The lawyer then came in, when the inquisitor asked him a variety of frivolous questions; to which, as before, he answered, Yes and No, without so much as looking at his supposed client.

Mr. Martin being remanded to his dungeon, was shaved on Whitfun-eve (shaving is only allowed three times a year in the inquisition); and the next day one of the gaolers gave him some frankincense to be put into the fire, as he was to receive a visit from the lords of the inquisition. Two of them accordingly came, asked many trivial questions, concluding them, as usual, with, We will do you all the service we can. Mr. Martin complained greatly of their having promised him a lawyer to plead his cause; when, instead of a proper person, says he, "there was a man that you called a lawyer, but he never spoke to me, nor I to him: if all your lawyers are so quiet in this country, they are the quietest in the world, for he hardly said any thing but yes and no, to what your lordship said." To which one of the inquisitors gravely replied, "Lawyers are not allowed to speak here." At this the gaoler and secretary went out of the dungeon to laugh, and Mr. Martin could scarce refrain from smiling in their faces, to think that his cause was to be defended by a man, who scarce dared to open his lips. Mr. Martin, some time after, was ordered to dress himself very clean; as soon as he was ready, one of the gaolers came and told him, that he must go with him; but that first he must have a handkerchief tied about his eyes. This terribly frightened Mr. Martin, who now thought of nothing but the torture. The gaoler then led him for some time, till he heard a voice say, Stop, and pull off your clothes. He was then examined to know if he had been circumcised, and consequently was a Jew. Finding that he had not been circumcised, he was remanded to his dungeon.

In about a month after he was brought to a room filled with a great number of persons, had a rope put round his neck, and was led by it to the altar of the great church. Here his sentence was pronounced, which was, That for the crimes of which he stood convicted, the lords of the holy office had ordered him to be banished out of the dominions of Spain, upon the penalty of 200 lashes, and being sent five years to the galleys; and that he should at present receive 200 lashes through the common streets of the city of Grenada.

Now Mr. Martin was sent again to his dungeon that night, and the next morning the executioner came, stripped him, tied his hands together, put a rope about his neck, and led him out of the inquisition. He was then mounted on an ass, and received his 200 lashes, amidst not only the shouts, but peltings of the people; which latter greatly incommoded him. He remained a fortnight after this in gaol, his back being very sore all the time; at length he was sent to Malaga, to his great joy. Here he was put in gaol for some days, till he could be sent on board an English ship: which had no sooner happened, than news was brought of a rupture between England and Spain, and that ship, with many others, was stopped. Mr. Martin not being considered as a prisoner of war, was put on board of a Hamburg trader, and his wife and children soon came to him; but he was obliged to put up with the loss of his effects, which had been embezzled by the inquisition: for this, however, he thought himself amply recompensed, by setting foot, once more, in his native country.

The case of Mr. Martin was published by the desire of, and authenticated by, the right honourable Mr. Secretary Craggs, the archbishop of Canterbury, the archbishop of York, the bishops of London, Winchester, Ely, Norwich, Sarum, Chichester, St. Asaph, Lincoln, Bristol, Peterborough, Bangor, &c. &c. &c.

A singular Discovery of some private Enormities of the INQUISITION.

WHEN the crown of Spain was contested for in the beginning of the present century, by two princes, who equally pretended to the sovereignty, France espoused the cause of one competitor, and England of the other.

Then the duke of Berwick, a natural son of James II. who abdicated England, commanded the Spanish and French forces, and defeated the English at the celebrated battle of Almanza. The army was then divided into two parts; the one consisting of Spaniards and French, headed by the duke of Berwick, advanced towards Catalonia; the other body, consisting of French troops only, commanded by the duke of Orleans, proceeded to the conquest of Arragon.

When the troops approached the city of Arragon, the magistrates came to offer the keys to the duke of Orleans; but he told them, haughtily, they were rebels, and that he would not accept the keys, for he had orders to enter the city through a breach.

Accordingly he made a breach in the walls with his cannon, and then entered the city through it, together with his whole army. When he had made every necessary regulation here, he departed to subdue other places, leaving a strong garrison, at once to over-awe and defend, under the command of his lieutenant-general M. De Legal. This gentleman, though brought up a Roman-Catholic, was totally free from superstition: he united great talents with great bravery; and was, at once, the accomplished gentleman and skilful officer.

Before his departure, the duke had ordered that heavy contributions, in the following manner, should be levied upon the city.

1. That the magistrates and principal inhabitants should pay a thousand crowns per month for the duke's table.

2. That every house should pay one pistole, which would monthly amount to 18,000 pistoles.

3. That every convent and monastery should pay a donative, proportionable to its riches and rents.

The two last contributions to be appropriated to the maintenance of the army.

The money levied upon the magistrates and principal inhabitants, and upon every house, was paid as soon as demanded; but when the proper persons applied to the heads of the convents and monasteries, they found that the ecclesiastics were not so willing, as other people, to part from their cash.

Of the Donatives to be raised by the Clergy:

The college of Jesuits was to pay 2000 pistoles.

_____ Carmelites	—	1000
_____ Augustins	—	1000
_____ Dominicans	—	1000

M. De Legal sent to the Jesuits a peremptory order to pay the money immediately. The superior of the Jesuits returned for answer, that for the clergy to pay money to the army was against all ecclesiastical immunities; and that he knew of no argument which could authorize such a procedure. M. De Legal then sent four companies of dragoons to quarter themselves in the college, with this sarcastic message:

"To convince you of the necessity of paying the money, I have sent four substantial arguments to your college, drawn from the system of military logic; and, therefore, hope you will not need any further admonition to direct your conduct."

The Jesuits, greatly perplexed at these proceedings, dispatched an express to court to the king's confessor, who was of their order; but the dragoons were much more expeditious in plundering and doing mischief, than the courier in his journey: so that the Jesuits, seeing every thing going to rack and ruin, thought proper to adjust the matter amicably, and paid the money before the return of the messenger. The Augustins and Carmelites taking warning by what had happened to the Jesuits, prudently went and paid the money, and by that means escaped the study of military arguments, and of being taught logic by the dragoons.

On the other hand, the Dominicans, who are all familiars of, or agents dependent on the inquisition, imagined, that that very circumstance would be their protection; but they were mistaken, for M. De Legal neither feared nor respected the inquisition. The chief of the Dominicans sent word to the military commander, that his order was poor, and had not any money whatever to pay the donative; for, says he, the whole wealth of the Dominicans consists only in the silver images of the apostles and saints, as large as life, which are placed in our church, and which to remove would be accounted sacrilege.

This insinuation was meant to terrify the French commander, whom the inquisitors imagined would not dare to be so prophane as to wish for the possession of the precious idols.

However, he sent word that the silver images would make admirable substitutes for money, and would be more in character in his possession, than in that of the Dominicans themselves, "For, says he, while you posselfs them, in the manner you do at present, they stand up in niches, useles and motionless, without being of the least benefit to mankind in general, or even to yourselves; but, when they come into my possession, they shall be useful, I will put them in motion; for I intend to have them coined, when they may travel like the apostles, be beneficial in various places, and circulate for the universal service of mankind."

Now the inquisitors were astonished at this treatment, which they never expected to receive, even from crowned heads; they therefore determined to deliver their precious images in a solemn procession, that they might excite the people to an insurrection. The dominican friars were accordingly ordered to march to De Legal's house, with the silver apostles and saints, in a mournful manner, having lighted tapers with them, and bitterly crying all the way, Heresy, heresy.

When M. De Legal heard of these proceedings, he ordered four companies of grenadiers to line the street which led to his house; each grenadier was ordered to have his loaded fuzee in one hand, and a lighted taper in the other; so that the troops might either repel force with force, or do honour to the farcical ceremony.

The friars did all they could to raise a tumult, but the common people were too much afraid of the troops under arms to obey them; the silver images were, therefore, of necessity, delivered up to M. De Legal, who sent them to the mint, and ordered them to be immediately coined.

As the project of raising an insurrection failed, the inquisitors determined to excommunicate M. De Legal, unless he would release their precious silver saints from imprisonment in the mint, before they were melted down, or otherwise mutilated. The French commander absolutely refused to release the images, but said they should certainly travel and do good; upon which the inquisitors drew up the form of excommunication, and ordered their secretary to go and read it to M. De Legal.

This commission the secretary punctually performed, and read the excommunication deliberately and distinctly. The French commander heard it with great patience, and politely told the secretary he would answer it next day.

As soon as the secretary of the inquisition was gone, M. De Legal ordered his own secretary to prepare a form of excommunication, exactly like that sent by the inquisition; but to make this alteration, instead of his name, to put in those of the inquisitors.

The next morning he ordered four regiments under arms, and commanded them to accompany his secretary and act according to his direction.

The secretary went to the inquisition, and insisted upon admittance; which, after a great deal of altercation, was granted. As soon as he entered, he read, in an audible voice, the excommunication sent by M. De Legal, against the inquisitors. The inquisitors were all present, and heard it with astonishment, never having before met with any individual who dared behave so bold. They loudly cried out against De Legal, as an heretic; and said this was a most daring insult against the catholic faith. But, to surprise them still more, the French secretary told them, they must remove from their present lodgings; for the French commander wanted to quarter the troops in the inquisition, as it was the most commodious place in the whole city.

Hereupon the inquisitors exclaimed loudly, when the secretary put them under a strong guard, and sent them to a place appointed by M. De Legal to receive them. The inquisitors, finding how things went, begged that they might be permitted to take their private property, which was granted, and they immediately set out for Madrid, where they made the most bitter complaints to the king; but the monarch told them, he could not grant them any redress, as the injuries they had received were from his grandfather, the king of France's troops, by whose assistance alone he could be firmly established in his kingdom. "Had it been my own troops, said he, I would have punished them; but as it is, I cannot pretend to exert any authority."

M. De Legal's secretary, in the mean time, set open all the doors of the inquisition, and released the prisoners, who amounted in the whole to 400; and among these were 60 beautiful young women, who appeared to form a seraglio for the three principal inquisitors.

Now this discovery, which laid the enormity of the inquisitors so open, greatly alarmed the archbishop, who desired M. De Legal to send the women to his palace, and he would take proper care of them; and at the same time he published an ecclesiastical censure against all such as should ridicule, or blame, the holy office of the inquisition.

Word was sent by the French commander to the archbishop, that the prisoners had either ran away, or were so securely concealed by their friends, or even by his own officers, that it was impossible for him to send them back again; and, therefore, the inquisition having committed such atrocious actions, must now put up with their exposure and shame.

One of the ladies thus happily delivered from captivity, was afterwards married to the very French officer, who opened the door of her dungeon, and released her from confinement. This lady related the following circumstances to her husband, and to M. Gavin (author of the Master Key to Popery); from the latter of whom we have selected the most material particulars, which are as follow.

"I went one day, says the lady, with my mother, to visit the countess Attarals, and I met there Don Francisco Tirregon, her confessor, and second inquisitor of the holy office.

"After we had drank chocolate, he asked me my age, my confessor's name, and many intricate questions about religion. The severity of his countenance frightened me, which he perceiving, told the countess to inform me, that he was not so severe as he looked for. He then caressed me in a most obliging manner, presented his hand, which I kissed with great reverence and modesty; and, as he went away, he made use of this remarkable expression: My dear child, I shall remember you till the next time. I did not, at the time, mark the sense of the words; for I was inexperienced in matters of gallantry, being, at that time, but fifteen years old. Indeed, he unfortunately did remember me, for the very same night, when our whole family were in bed, we heard a great knocking at the door.

"The maid, who laid in the same room with me, went to the window, and inquired who was there.—The answer was, THE HOLY INQUISITION. On hearing this I screamed out, Father! father! dear father, I am ruined for ever! My father got up, and came to me to know the occasion of my crying out; I told him the inquisition were at the door. On hearing this, instead of protecting me, he hurried me down stairs as fast as possible; and, lest the maid should be too slow, opened the street door himself; under such abject and slavish fears are bigoted minds! as soon as he knew they came for me, he fetched me with great solemnity, and delivered me to the officers with much submission.

"I was hurried into a coach, with no other clothing than a petticoat and a mantle, for they would not let me stay to take any thing else. My fright was so great, I expected to die that very night; but judge my surprise, when I was ushered into an apartment, decorated with all the elegance that taste, united with opulence, could bestow.

"Soon after the officers left me, a maid servant appeared with a silver salver, on which were sweet-meats and cinnamon water. She desired me to take some refreshments before I went to bed; I told her I could not, but should be glad if she could inform me whether I was to be put to death that night or not. To be put to death! exclaimed she, you do not come here to be put to death, but to live like a princess, and you shall want for nothing in the world, but the liberty of going out; so pray don't be afraid, but go to bed and sleep easy; for to-morrow you shall see wonders within this house; and as I am chosen to be your waiting-maid, I hope you'll be very kind to me."

"I was going to ask some questions, but she told me she must not answer any thing more till the next day, but but assured me that nobody would come to disturb me: I am going, said she, about a little business, but I will come back presently, for my bed is in the closet next your's; so she left me for about a quarter of an hour, and then returned. She then said, madam, pray let me know when you will be pleased to have your chocolate ready in the morning?

"This greatly surprised me, so that without replying to her question, I asked her name;—she said, my name is Mary. Mary, then, said I, for heaven's sake, tell me whether I am brought here to die or not?—I have told you already, replied she, that you come here to be one of the happiest ladies in the world.

"Now we went to bed, but the fear of death prevented me from sleeping the whole night; Mary waked, she was surprised to find me up, but soon rose, and after leaving me for about half an hour, she brought in two cups of chocolate, and some biscuits on a silver plate.

"I drank one cup of chocolate, and desired her to drink the other, which she did; when we had done, I said, Well, Mary, can you give me any account of the reasons for my being brought here? To which she answered, Not yet, madam, you must have patience, and immediately slipped out of the room.

"In about half an hour after, she brought a great quantity of elegant clothes, suitable to a lady of the highest rank, and told me, I must dress myself. Among several trinkets which accompanied the clothes, I observed, with surprise, a snuff-box, in the lid of which was a picture of Don Francisco Tirregon. This unravelled to me the mystery of my confinement, and at the same time roused my imagination to contrive how to evade receiving the present. If I absolutely refused it, I thought immediate death must ensue; and to accept it, was giving him too much encouragement against my honour. At length I hit upon a medium, and said to Mary, Pray present my respects to Don Francisco Tirregon, and tell him, that, as I could not bring my clothes along with me last night, modesty permits me to accept of these garments, which are requisite to keep me decent; but since I do not take snuff, I hope his lordship will excuse me in not accepting his box.

"Mary went with my answer, and soon returned with Don Francisco's picture elegantly set in gold, and richly embellished with diamonds. This message accompanied it: "That his lordship had made a mistake; his intent not being to send me a snuff-box, but his picture." I was at a great loss what to do; when Mary said, Pray, madam, take my poor advice; accept of the picture, and every thing else which his lordship sends you; for if you do not, he can compel you to what he pleases, and put you to death when he thinks proper, without any body being able to defend you. But if you are obliging to him, continued she, he will be very kind, and you will be as happy as a queen; you will have elegant apartments to live in, beautiful gardens to range in, and agreeable ladies to visit you: therefore, I advise you to send a civil answer, or even not to deny a visit from his lordship, or perhaps you may repent of your disrespect.

"O, my God! exclaimed I, must I sacrifice my honour to my fears, and give up my virtue to his despotic power? Alas! what can I do? To resist, is vain. If I oppose his desires, force will obtain what chastity refuses. I now fell into the greatest agonies, and told Mary to return what answer she thought proper.

"She said, she was glad of my humble submission, and ran to acquaint Don Francisco with it. In a few minutes she returned, with joy in her countenance, telling me his lordship would honour me with his company to supper. "And now give me leave, madam, says she, to call you mistress, for I am to wait upon you. I have been in the holy office 14 years, and know all the customs perfectly well; but as silence is imposed upon me, under pain of death, I can only answer such questions as immediately relate to your own person. But I would advise you never to oppose the holy father's will; or if you see any young ladies about, never ask them any questions. You may divert yourself sometimes among them, but must never tell them any thing: three days hence you will dine with them; and at all times you may have music, and other recreations. In fine, you will be so happy, that you will not wish to go abroad; and when your time is expired, the holy fathers will send you out of this country, and marry you to some nobleman." After saying these words she left me, overwhelmed with astonishment, and scarce knowing what to think. As soon as I recovered myself I began to look about, and finding a closet, I opened it, and perceived that it was filled with books: they were chiefly upon historical and profane subjects, but not any on religious matters. I chose out a book of history, and so passed the interval with some degree of satisfaction, till dinner time.

"Dinner was served up with the greatest elegance, and consisted of all that could gratify the most luxurious appetite. When dinner was over, Mary left me, and told me, if I wanted any thing I might ring a bell, which she pointed out to me.

"I read a book to amuse myself during the afternoon, and at seven in the evening Don Francisco came to visit me in his night gown and cap, not with the gravity of an inquisitor, but with the gaiety of a gallant.

"He saluted me with great respect, and told me, That he came to see me in order to shew the great respect he had for my family, and to inform me, that it was my lovers who had procured my confinement, having accused me in matters of religion; and that the informations were taken, and the sentence pronounced against me, to be burnt alive in a dry pan, with a gradual fire; but that he, out of pity and love to my family, had stopped the execution of it.

"These words were like daggers to my heart; I dropped at his feet, and said, "Ah, my lord! have you stopped the execution for ever?" He replied, "That belongs to yourself only," and abruptly wished me good night.

"When he was gone I burst into tears, when Mary came and asked what could make me cry so bitterly. To which I answered, Oh, Mary! what is the meaning of the dry pan and gradual fire? for I am to die by them.

"Alas, madam, said she, never fear, you shall see, ere long, the dry pan and gradual fire; but they are made for those who oppose the holy father's will, not for you who are so good as to obey it. But pray, said she, was Don Francisco very obliging? I don't know, said I, for he frightened me out of my wits by his discourse: he saluted me with civility, but left me in an abrupt manner.

"Well, said Mary, you do not yet know his temper: he is extremely obliging to them that are kind to him; but if they are disobedient, he is as unmerciful as Nero. So, for your own sake, take care to oblige him in all respects: and now, dear madam, pray go to supper and be easy. I went to supper, indeed, and afterwards to bed; but I could neither eat or sleep, for the thoughts of the dry pan and gradual fire deprived me of appetite, and banished drowsiness.

"The next morning early, Mary said; that as nobody was stirring, if I would promise her secrecy, she would shew me the dry pan and gradual fire; so taking me down stairs, she brought me to a large room, with a thick iron door, which she opened. Within it was an oven, with fire in it at the time, and a large brass pan upon it, with a cover of the same, and a lock to it. In the next room there was a great wheel, covered on both sides with thick boards; opening a little window in the centre, Mary desired me to look in with a candle; there I saw all the circumference of the wheel set with sharp razors, which made me shudder.

"Mary then took me to a pit, which was full of venomous animals. On my expressing great horror at the sight, she said, "Now, my good mistress, I'll tell you the use of these things. The dry pan is for heretics, and those who oppose the holy father's will and pleasure; they are put alive into the pan, being first stripped naked; and the cover being locked down, the executioner begins to put a small fire into the oven, and by degrees he augments it, till the body is reduced to ashes. The wheel is designed for those who speak against the pope, or or the holy fathers of the inquisition ; for they are put into that machine through the little door, which is locked after them, and then the wheel is turned swiftly, till they are all cut to pieces. The pit is for those who condemn the images, and refuse to give proper respect to ecclesiastical persons ; for they are thrown into the pit, and so become the food of poisonous animals."

" We went back again to my chamber, and Mary said, that another day she would shew me the torments designed for other transgressors ; but I was in such agonies at what I had seen, that I begged to be terrified with no more such sights. She soon after left me, but not without enjoining my strict obedience to Don Francisco ; for if you do not comply with his will, says she, the dry pan and gradual fire will be your fate.

" The horrors which the sight of these things, and Mary's expressions, impressed on my mind, almost bereaved me of my senses, and left me in such a state of stupefaction, that I seemed to have no manner of will of my own.

" The next morning Mary said, now let me dress you as nice as possible, for you must go and wish Don Francisco good-morrow, and breakfast with him. When I was dressed, she conveyed me through a gallery into his apartment, where I found that he was in bed. He ordered Mary to withdraw, and to serve up breakfast in about two hours time. When Mary was gone, he commanded me to undress myself, and come to bed to him. The manner in which he spoke, and the dreadful ideas with which my mind was filled, so terribly frightened me, that I pulled off my clothes, without knowing what I did, and stepped into bed, insensible of the indecency I was transacting : so totally had the care of self-preservation absorbed all my other thoughts, and so entirely were the ideas of delicacy obliterated by the force of terror !

" Thus, to avoid the dry pan, did I entail upon myself perpetual infamy ; and to escape the so much dreaded gradual fire, give myself up to the flames of lust. Wretched alternative, where the only choice is an excruciating death, or everlasting pollution !

Mary came at the expiration of two hours, and served us with chocolate in the most submissive manner ; for she knelt down by the bed-side to present it. When I was dressed, Mary took me into a very delightful apartment, which I had never yet seen. It was furnished with the most costly elegance ; but what gave me the greatest astonishment was, the prospect from its windows, of a beautiful garden, and a fine meandering river. Mary told me, that the young ladies she had mentioned would come to pay their compliments to me before dinner, and begged me to remember her advice, in keeping a prudent guard over my tongue.

" In a few minutes a great number of very beautiful young ladies, richly dressed, entered the room, and successively embracing me, wished me joy. I was so surprised, that I was unable to answer their compliments ; which one of the ladies perceiving, said, " Madam, the solitude of this place will affect you in the beginning, but when you begin to feel the pleasures and amusements you may enjoy, you will quit those pensive thoughts. We, at present, beg the honour of you to dine with us to-day, and henceforward three days in a week." I returned them suitable thanks in general terms, and so went to dinner, in which the most exquisite and savory dishes, of various kinds, were served up with the most delicate and pleasant fruits and sweetmeats. The room was long, with two tables on each side, and a third in the front. I reckoned fifty-two young ladies, the eldest not exceeding twenty-four years of age. There were five maid servants, besides Mary to wait upon us ; but Mary confined her attention to me alone. After dinner we retired to a capacious gallery, where some played on musical instruments, a few diverted themselves with cards, and the rest amused themselves with walking about. Mary, at length, entered the gallery, and said, Ladies, this is a day of recreation, and so you may go into whatever rooms you please, till eight o'clock in the evening.

" They unanimously agreed to adjourn to my apartment. Here we found a most elegant cold collation, of which all the ladies partook, and passed the time in innocent conversation, and harmless mirth : but none mentioned a word concerning the inquisition, or the holy fathers, or gave the least distant hint concerning the cause of their confinement.

" At eight o'clock Mary rang a bell, which was a signal for all to retire to their respective apartments, and I was conducted to the chamber of Don Francisco, where I slept.

" The next morning Mary brought me a richer dress than any I had yet had ; and as soon as I retired to my apartment, all the ladies came to wish me good-morning, dressed much richer than the preceding day. We passed the time till eight o'clock in the evening, in much the same manner as we had done the day before. At that time the bell rung, the separation took place, and I was conducted to Don Francisco's chamber. The next morning I had a garment richer than the last, and they accosted me in apparel still more sumptuous than before. The transactions of the two former days were repeated on the third, and the evening concluded in a similar manner.

" On the fourth morning Mary came into Don Francisco's chamber, and told me I must immediately rise, for a lady wanted me in her own chamber. She spoke with a kind of authority which surprised me ; but as Don Francisco did not speak a syllable, I got up and obeyed. Mary then conveyed me into a dismal dungeon, not eight feet in length ; and said, sternly, to me, This is your room, and this lady your bed-fellow and companion. At which word she bounced out of the room, and left me in the utmost consternation.

" After remaining a considerable time in the most dreadful agonies, tears came to my relief, and I exclaimed, " What is this place, dear lady ! Is it a scene of enchantment, or is it a hell upon earth ? Alas ! I have lost my honour, and my soul for ever !"

" The lady took me by the hand, and said, in a sympathizing tone of voice, " Dear sister (for this is the name I shall henceforth give you) forbear to cry and grieve, for you can do nothing by such an extravagant behaviour, but draw upon yourself a cruel death. Your misfortunes, and those of all the ladies you have seen, are exactly of a piece : you suffer nothing but what we have suffered before you ; but we dare not shew our grief, for fear of greater evils. Pray take courage, and hope in God, for he will surely deliver us from this hellish place ; but be sure you discover no uneasiness before Mary, who is the only instrument either of our torments, or comfort. Have patience until we go to bed, and then I will venture to tell you more of the matter.

" My perplexity and vexation were inexpressible ; but my new companion, whose name was Leonora, prevailed on me to disguise my uneasiness from Mary. I dissembled tolerably well when she came to bring our dinners ; but could not help remarking, in my own mind, the difference between this repast, and those I had before partook of. This consisted only of plain, common food, and of that a scanty allowance, with only one plate, and one knife and fork for us both, which she took away as soon as we had dined.

" When we were in bed, Leonora was as good as her word ; and upon my solemn promise of secrecy, thus began to open her mind to me : " My dear sister, you think your case very hard, but, I assure you, all the ladies in the house have gone through the same. In time you will know all their stories, as they hope to know your's. I suppose Mary has been the chief instrument of your fright, as she has been of our's ; and I warrant she has shewn you some horrible places, though not all : and that, at the very thought of them, you were so terrified, that you chose the same way we have done, to redeem yourself from death. By what hath happened to us, we know that Don Francisco hath been your Nero, your tyrant ; for the three colours of clothes are the distinguishing tokens of the three holy fathers. The red silk belongs to Don Francisco, the blue to Don Guerrero, and the green to Don Aliaga ; and and they always give those colours (after the farce of changing garments, and the short-lived recreations are over) to those ladies whom they bring here for their respective uses. We are strictly commanded to express all the demonstrations of joy, and to be very merry for three days, when a young lady first comes amongst us, as we did with you, and as you must now do with others. But afterwards we live like the most wretched prisoners, without seeing any body but Mary, and the other maid-servants, over whom Mary hath a kind of superiority, for she acts as house-keeper. We all dine in the great hall three days in a week; and when any one of the inquisitors hath a mind for one of his slaves, Mary comes about nine o'clock, and leads her to his apartment. Some nights Mary leaves the doors of our chambers open, and that is a token that one of the inquisitors hath a mind to come that night; but he comes so silent, that we are ignorant whether he is our patron or not. If one of us happens to be with child, she is removed into a better chamber till she is delivered; but during the whole of her pregnancy, she never sees any body but the person appointed to attend her. As soon as the child is born it is taken away, and carried we know not whither; for we never hear a syllable mentioned about it afterwards. I have been in this house six years, was not fourteen when the officers took me from my father's house, and have had one child. There are, at this present time, fifty-two young ladies in the house; but we annually lose six or eight, though we know not what becomes of them, or whither they are sent. This, however, does not diminish our number, for new ones are always brought in to supply the place of those who are removed from hence; and I remember, at one time, to have seen seventy-three ladies here together. Our continual torment is to reflect that when they are tired of any of the ladies, they certainly put to death those they pretend to send away; for it is natural to think, that they have too much policy to suffer their atrocious and infernal villanies to be discovered, by enlarging them. Hence our situation is miserable indeed, and we have only to pray that the Almighty will pardon those crimes, which we are compelled to commit. Therefore, my dear sister, arm yourself with patience, for that is the only palliative to give you comfort, and put a firm confidence in the providence of Almighty God."

"This discourse of Leonora greatly affected me; but I found every thing to be as she told me in the course of time, and I took care to appear as cheerful as possible before Mary. In this manner I continued eighteen months, during which time eleven ladies were taken from the house; but in lieu of them we got nineteen new ones, which made our number just sixty, at the time we were so happily relieved by the French officers, and providentially restored to the joys of society, and to the arms of our parents and friends.

"On that happy day, the door of my dungeon was opened by the gentleman who is now my husband, who, with the utmost expedition, sent both Leonora and me to his father's; and (soon after the campaign was over) when he returned home, he thought proper to make me his wife, in which situation I enjoy a recompence for all the miseries I before suffered."

How evident it is, from the foregoing narrative that the inquisitors are a set of libidinous villains, lost to every just idea of religion, and totally destitute of humanity. Those who possess wealth, beauty, or liberal sentiments, are sure to find enemies in them. Avarice, lust, and prejudice, are their ruling passions; and they sacrifice every law, human and divine, to gratify their predominant desire. Their supposed piety is affectation; their pretended compassion hypocrisy; their justice depends on their will; and their equitable punishments are founded on their prejudices. None are secure from them; all ranks fall equally victims to their pride, their avarice, their aversion, or their power.

It may appear strange to many, that crowned heads, and eminent nobles, have not attempted to crush the power of the inquisition, and reduce the authority of those ecclesiastical tyrants, from whose merciless fangs neither their families nor themselves are safe.

However, astonishing as it is, superstition hath, in this case, always overcome common sense, and custom operated against reason. One prince, indeed, which was Don Carlos, the amiable son of Philip the Second, king of Spain, and grandson of the celebrated emperor Charles V. intended to abolish the inquisition, but he lost his life before he became king, and consequently before he had the power so to do; for the very intimation of his design procured his destruction.

This Don Carlos possessed all the good qualities of his grandfather, without any of the bad ones of his father; and was a prince of great vivacity, admirable learning, and the most amiable disposition. He had sense enough to see into the errors of Popery, and abhorred the very name of the inquisition. He inveighed publicly against the institution, ridiculed the affected piety of the inquisitors, did all he could to expose their atrocious deeds, and even declared, that if he ever came to the crown, he would abolish the inquisition, and exterminate all the agents thereof.

Such threats were sufficient to irritate the inquisitors against the prince: they, accordingly, bent their minds to vengeance, and determined on his destruction.

Now the inquisitors employed all their agents and emissaries to spread abroad the most artful insinuations against the prince; and, at length, raised such a spirit of discontent among the people, that the king was under the necessity of removing Don Carlos from court. Not content with this, they pursued even his friends, and obliged the king likewise to banish Don John, duke of Austria, his own brother, and consequently uncle to the prince; together with the prince of Parma, nephew to the king, and cousin to the prince, because they well knew that both the duke of Austria, and the prince of Parma, had a most sincere and inviolable attachment to Don Carlos.

A short time after, the prince having shewn great lenity and favour to the Protestants in the Netherlands, the inquisition loudly exclaimed against him, declaring, that as the persons in question were heretics, the prince himself must necessarily be one, since he gave them countenance. In short, they gained so great an ascendancy over the mind of the king, who was absolutely a slave to superstition, that, shocking to relate, he sacrificed the feelings of nature to the force of bigotry, and for fear of incurring the anger of the inquisition, gave up his only son, passing the sentence of death on him with his own lips.

Indeed, the prince had what was termed an indulgence; that is, he was permitted to chuse the manner of his death. Roman like, the unfortunate young hero chose bleeding, and the hot bath; when the veins of his arms and legs being opened, he expired gradually, falling a martyr to the malice of the inquisitors, and his father's stupid bigotry.

The cruel PERSECUTION of Dr. ÆGIDIO.

DR. ÆGIDIO was educated at the university of Alcalá, where he took his several degrees, and particularly applied himself to the study of the sacred scriptures and school divinity. The professor of theology dying, he was elected into his place, and acted so much to the satisfaction of every one, that his reputation for learning and piety was throughout Europe declared.

The doctor however had his enemies, and these laid a complaint against him to the inquisitors, who sent him a citation, and when he appeared to it, cast him into a dungeon.

Now as the greatest part of those who belonged to the cathedral church at Seville, and many persons belonging to the bishopric of Dorset, highly approved of the doctrines of Ægidio, which they thought perfectly consonant with true religion, they petitioned the emperor in his his behalf. Though the monarch had been educated a Roman-Catholic, he had too much sense to be a bigot; and therefore sent an immediate order for his liberation.

Soon after, he visited the church of Valladolid, did every thing he could to promote the cause of religion, and returning home he soon after fell sick, and died in an extreme old age.

Now the inquisitors having been disappointed of gratifying their malice against him, while living, determined (as the emperor's whole thoughts were engrossed by a military expedition) to wreak their vengeance on him when dead. Therefore, soon after he was buried, they ordered his remains to be dug out of the grave; and a legal process being carried on, they were condemned to be burnt, which was accordingly executed.

An Account of the PERSECUTION of Dr. CONSTANTINE.

DR. CONSTANTINE, an intimate acquaintance of the already mentioned Dr. Ægidio, was a man of uncommon natural abilities and profound learning; exclusive of several modern tongues, he was acquainted with the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, and perfectly well knew not only the sciences called abstruse, but those arts which come under the denomination of polite literature.

The doctor's eloquence rendered him a pleasing, and the soundness of his doctrines a profitable preacher; and he was so popular, that he never preached but to a crowded audience. He had many opportunities of rising in the church, but never would take advantage of them; for if a living of greater value than his own was offered him, he would refuse it, saying, I am content with what I have; and he frequently preached so forcibly against simony, that many of his superiors, who were not so delicate upon the subject, took umbrage at his doctrines upon that score.

When fully confirmed in Protestantism by Dr. Ægidio, he preached boldly such doctrines only as were agreeable to gospel purity, and uncontaminated by the errors which had at various times crept into the Romish church. For these reasons he had many enemies among the Roman-Catholics, and some of them were determined on his utter ruin.

One Scobaria, a worthy gentleman, having erected a school for divinity lectures, appointed Dr. Constantine to be reader therein. He immediately undertook the task, and read lectures, by portions, on the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles; but while beginning to expound the book of Job, the inquisitors seized him.

When brought to examination, he answered with such precaution that they could not find any explicit charge against him, but remained doubtful in what manner to proceed, when the following circumstances occurred, which served for a salvo:

The doctor had deposited with a woman, named Isabella Martin, several books, which to him were very valuable, but which he knew were exceptionable in the eyes of the inquisition.

Being informed against as a Protestant, this woman was apprehended, and, after a small process, her goods were ordered to be confiscated. Previous, however, to the officers coming to her house, the woman's son had removed away several chests full of the most valuable articles; and among these were the books of Dr. Constantine.

But a treacherous servant having given intelligence of this to the inquisitors, an officer was dispatched to the son to demand the chests. The son, supposing the officer only came for Constantine's books, said, I know what you come for, and I will fetch them to you immediately. He then fetched Dr. Constantine's books and papers, when the officer was greatly surprised to find what he did not look for. He, however, told the young man, that he was glad these books and papers were produced, but nevertheless he must fulfil the end of his commission, which was, to carry him and the goods he had embezzled before the inquisitors, which he did accordingly; for the young man knew it would be in vain to expostulate or resist, and therefore submitted to his fate with quietness.

When the inquisitors were thus possessed of Constantine's books and writings, they soon found matter sufficient to form charges against him. When he was brought to a re-examination, they presented one of his papers, and asked him if he knew the hand-writing? Perceiving it was his own, he guessed the whole matter, confessed the writing, and justified the doctrine it contained; saying, "In that and all my other writings, I have never departed from the truth of the gospel, but have always kept in view the pure precepts of Christ, as he delivered them to mankind."

Having been detained upwards of two years in prison, Dr. Constantine was at last seized with a bloody flux, which put an end to his miseries in this world. The process, however, was carried on against his body, which was publicly burnt at the ensuing Auto de Fe.

An Account of Mr. NICHOLAS BURTON's Martyrdom.

MR. BURTON was a merchant of London, who traded into Spain. Being at Cadiz, a familiar of the inquisition called upon him one day at his lodgings, pretending that he wanted to send a quantity of merchandize to London. Having asked as many questions as he thought proper, he departed, and the next day one of the inquisitorial officers took Mr. Burton into custody.

The president, on his examination, demanded if he had, by words or writing, said or insinuated any thing disrespectful to the Roman-Catholic persuasion.

Mr. Burton replied in the negative; saying, That he was sensible, in whatever country we were, respect ought to be paid to the religion of that country: that such knowledge to him was essential, who, as a merchant, was obliged to visit various countries, and conform to all their religious and civil ceremonies.

However, this defence availed him nothing: they proceeded to torture him, in order to gain information. Failing in this, they condemned him for invincible obstinacy, and at the next Auto de Fe he was burnt. When the flames first touched him, he bore the torments with such exemplary patience, and appeared with so smiling a countenance, that one of the priests, enraged at his serenity, said with great malice and absurdity, "The reason why he does not seem to feel, is to me very evident; the Devil has already got his soul, and his body is of course deprived of the usual sensations."

Several others of the English in Spain were, about the time of Mr. Burton's martyrdom, put to death by the inquisitors; particularly John Baker, William Burgate, and William Burges were burnt, and William Hooker was stoned to death; freely giving up their lives for him, who shed his blood for their redemption.

Particulars of WILLIAM GARDENER.

WILLIAM GARDENER was born at Bristol, received a tolerable education, and was, at a proper age, placed under the care of one Paget, an eminent merchant.

When he was twenty-six years of age, he was, by his master, sent to Lisbon, to act as factor. Here he applied himself to the study of the Portuguese language, executed his business with assiduity and fidelity, and behaved with the most engaging affability to all persons with whom he had the least concern. He conversed privately with a few, whom he knew to be zealous Protestants; and, at the same time, cautiously avoided giving the least offence to any who were Roman-Catholics: but he had not gone into any of the Popish churches as yet.

There

There being a marriage concluded between the king of Portugal's son and the Infanta of Spain, upon the wedding-day, the bridegroom, bride, and the whole court went to the cathedral church, attended by multitudes of all ranks of people, and among the rest William Gardener, who stayed during the whole ceremony, and was greatly shocked at the superstitions he beheld.

His mind was strongly impressed with the erroneous worship which he had seen; he was miserable, to behold a whole country sunk into such idolatry, when the truth of the gospel might be so easily obtained. He, therefore, took the inconsiderate, though laudable design, into his head, of making a reform in Portugal, or perishing in the attempt; and determined to sacrifice his prudence to his zeal, though upon the occasion he became a martyr.

For this purpose he settled all his worldly affairs, paid his debts, closed his books, and consigned over his merchandize. On the ensuing Sunday he went again to the cathedral church, and placed himself near the altar, with a New Testament in his hand.

In a short time the king and the court appeared, and a cardinal began mass: at that part of the ceremony in which the people adore the wafer, Gardener could hold out no longer, but springing towards the cardinal, he snatched the host from him, and trampled it under his feet.

The whole congregation were now thunderstruck, and one person drawing a dagger, wounded Gardener in the shoulder, and would, by repeating the blow, have finished him, had not the king called to him to forbear.

When Gardener was carried before the king, the monarch asked him what countryman he was: to which he replied, I am an Englishman by birth, a Protestant by religion, and a merchant by occupation. What I have done is not out of contempt to your royal person, God forbid it should, but out of an honest indignation, to see the ridiculous superstitions and gross idolatries which are here practised.

Thinking that he had been stimulated by some other person to act as he had done, the king demanded who was his abettor, to which he replied, "My own conscience alone. I would not hazard what I have done for any man living, but I owe that and all other services to my Creator."

Hereupon Gardener was sent to prison, and a general order issued to apprehend all Englishmen in Lisbon. This order was in a great measure put into execution (some few escaping) and many innocent persons were tortured to make them confess if they knew any thing of the matter; in particular, a person who resided in the same house with Gardener, was treated with unparalleled barbarity, to make him confess something which might throw a light upon the business.

Then Gardener himself was tormented in the most excruciating manner: but in the midst of all his torments he gloried in the deed. Being ordered for death, a large fire was kindled near a gibbet, Gardener was drawn up to the gibbet by pulleys, and then let down near the fire, but not so close as to touch it; for they burnt or rather roasted him by slow degrees. Yet he bore his sufferings patiently, and cheerfully resigned his soul to the Lord.

We must observe, that some of the sparks were blown from the fire, which consumed Gardener, towards the haven, burnt one of the king's ships of war, and did other considerable damage. The Englishmen who were taken up on this occasion were, soon after Gardener's death, all discharged, except the person that resided in the same house with him, who was detained two years before he could procure his freedom.

thern and western islands; after which he visited France, Germany, Switzerland, and Spain. He set out on his travels in the month of March 1609, and the first place he went to was Paris, where he stayed for some time. He then prosecuted his travels through Germany and other parts, and at length arrived at Malaga in Spain, the seat of all his embarrassments.

While he resided here, he contracted with the master of a French ship for his passage to Alexandria, but was prevented from going by the following circumstances. In the evening of the 17th of October 1620, the English fleet, at that time on a cruise against the Algerine rovers, came to anchor before Malaga, which threw the people of the town into the greatest consternation, as they imagined them to be Turks. The morning, however, discovered the mistake, and the governor of Malaga perceiving the cross of England in their colours, went on board Sir Robert Mansell's ship, who commanded on that expedition, and after staying some time returned, and silenced all the people's fears.

Many persons from on board the fleet came ashore the next day. Among these were several well known by Mr. Lithgow, who, after reciprocal compliments, spent some days together in festivity and the amusements of the town. They then invited Mr. Lithgow to go on board, and pay his respects to the admiral. He accordingly accepted the invitation, was kindly received by him, and detained till the next day, when the fleet sailed. The admiral would willingly have taken Mr. Lithgow with him to Algiers; but having contracted for his passage to Alexandria, and his baggage, &c. being in the town, he could not accept the proposal.

When Mr. Lithgow got on shore he proceeded towards his lodgings by a private way (being to embark the same night for Alexandria) when, in passing through a narrow uninhabited street, he found himself suddenly surrounded by nine serjeants, or officers, who threw a black cloak over him, and forcibly conducted him to the governor's house. After some little time the governor appeared, when Mr. Lithgow earnestly begged he might be informed of the cause of such violent treatment. The governor only answered by shaking his head, and gave orders that the prisoner should be strictly watched till he (the governor) returned from his devotions; directing, at the same time, that the captain of the town, the alcaid major, and town notary, should be summoned to appear at his examination, and that all this should be done with the greatest secrecy, to prevent the knowledge thereof reaching the ears of the English merchants who resided in the town at that time.

All these orders were strictly discharged, and on the governor's return, he with the officers having seated themselves, Mr. Lithgow was brought before them for examination. The governor began by asking several questions, namely, of what country he was, whither bound, and how long he had been in Spain. The prisoner, after answering these, and other questions, was conducted to a closet, where, in a short space of time, he was visited by the town-captain, who inquired whether he had ever been at Seville, or was lately come from thence; and patting his cheek with an air of friendship, conjured him to tell the truth: "For, said he, your very countenance shews there is some hidden matter in your mind, which prudence should direct you to disclose." Finding himself, however, unable to extort any thing from the prisoner, he left him, and reported the same to the governor and the other officers; on which Mr. Lithgow was again brought before them, a general accusation was laid against him, and he was compelled to swear that he would give true answers to such questions as should be proposed.

Then the governor proceeded to inquire the quality of the English commander, and the prisoner's opinion what were the motives that prevented his accepting an invitation from him to come on shore. He demanded, likewise, the names of the English captains in the Squadron, and what knowledge he had of the embarkation, or preparation for it before its departure from England. The answers given to the several questions asked,

A particular Account of the LIFE and SUFFERINGS of Mr. WILLIAM LITHGOW, a Native of Scotland.

WILLIAM LITHGOW was descended from a good family, and having a natural propensity to travelling, he rambled, when very young, over the nor-asked, were set down in writing by the notary; but the junto seemed surprised at his denying any knowledge of the fitting out of the fleet, particularly the governor, who said he lied, that he was a traitor and spy, and came directly from England to favour and assist in the designs that were projected against Spain; and that he had been for that purpose nine months in Seville, in order to procure intelligence of the time the Spanish navy was expected from the Indies. They exclaimed against his familiarity with the officers of the fleet, and many other English gentlemen, between whom, they said, unusual civilities had passed, but all these transactions had been noticed with peculiar attention.

In short, to sum up the whole, and put the truth past all doubt, they said, he came from a council of war, held that morning on board the admiral's ship, in order to put in execution the orders assigned him. They upbraided him with being accessory to the burning of the island of St. Thomas, in the West-Indies; "Wherefore, said they, these Lutherans, and sons of the Devil, ought to have no credit given to what they say or swear."

Mr. Lithgow in vain endeavoured to obviate every accusation laid against him, and to obtain belief from his prejudiced judges. He begged permission to send for his cloak-bag, which contained his papers, and might serve to shew his innocence. This request they complied with, thinking it would discover some things of which they were ignorant. The cloak-bag was accordingly brought, and being opened, among other things, was found a licence from king James the First, under the sign manual, setting forth the bearer's intention to travel into Egypt; which was treated by the haughty Spaniards with great contempt. The other papers consisted of passports, testimonials, &c. of persons of quality. All these credentials, however, seemed rather to confirm than abate the suspicions of these prejudiced judges, who, after seizing all the prisoner's papers, ordered him again to retire.

During the interim, a consultation was held to fix the place where the prisoner should be confined. The alcade, or chief judge, was for putting him in the town prison; but this was objected to, particularly by the corrigidore, who said, in Spanish, "In order to prevent the knowledge of his confinement from reaching his countrymen, I will take the matter on myself, and be answerable for the consequences;" upon which it was agreed, that he should be confined in the governor's house, and the greatest secrecy observed.

Upon this determination, one of the serjeants went to Mr. Lithgow, and begged his money, with liberty to search him. As it was needless to make any resistance, the prisoner quietly complied, when the serjeant (after rifling his pockets of eleven ducatoons) stripped him to his shirt; and searching his breeches, he found, enclosed in the waistband, two canvas bags, containing one hundred and thirty-seven pieces of gold. The serjeant immediately took the money to the corrigidore, who, after having told it over, ordered him to clothe the prisoner, and shut him up close till after supper.

When it was midnight the serjeant and two Turkish slaves released Mr. Lithgow from his then confinement, but it was to introduce him to one much more horrible. They conducted him through several passages, to a chamber in a remote part of the palace, towards the garden, where they loaded him with irons, and extended his legs by means of an iron bar above a yard long, the weight of which was so great that he could neither stand or sit, but was obliged to lie continually on his back. They left him in this condition for some time, when they returned with a refreshment of food, consisting of a pound of boiled mutton and a loaf, together with a small quantity of wine; which was not only the first, but the best and last of the kind, during his confinement in this place. After delivering these articles, the serjeant locked the door, and left Mr. Lithgow to contemplate his fate in private.

He received a visit from the governor the next day, who promised him his liberty, with many other advantages, if he would confess being a spy; but on his protesting that he was entirely innocent, the governor left him in a rage, saying, He should see him no more till further torments constrained him to confess; commanding the keeper, to whose care he was committed, that he should permit no person whatever to have access to, or commune with him; that his sustenance should not exceed three ounces of musty bread, and a pint of water every second day; that he should be allowed neither bed, pillow, nor coverlid. "Close up, said he, this window in his room with lime and stone; stop up the holes of the door with double mats: let him have nothing that bears any likeness to comfort." These, and several other orders of the like severity were given, to render it impossible for his condition to be known to any of his countrymen.

The unfortunate Lithgow continued in this wretched and melancholy state without seeing any person for several days, in which time the governor received an answer to a letter he had written, relative to the prisoner, from Madrid; and, pursuant to the instructions given him, began to put in practice the cruelties devised, which they hastened, because Christmas holidays approached, it being then the forty-seventh day since his confinement.

Between two and three o'clock in the morning, he heard the noise of a coach in the street, and some time after heard the opening of the prison doors, not having had any sleep for two nights; hunger, pain, and melancholy reflections having prevented him from resting.

Immediately after the prison doors were opened, the nine serjeants, who had first seized him, with the notary, entered the place where he lay, and without uttering a word conducted him in his irons, through the house into the street, where a coach waited, and into which they laid him at the bottom on his back, not being able to sit. Two of the serjeants rode with him, and the rest walked by the coach side, but all observed the most profound silence. They drove him to a vine-press house, about a league from the town, to which place a rack had been privately conveyed before; and here they shut him up for that night.

About day-break the next morning, arrived the governor and the alcade, into whose presence Mr. Lithgow was immediately brought, to undergo another examination. The prisoner desired he might have an interpreter, which was allowed to strangers by the laws of that country, but this was refused, nor would they permit him to appeal to Madrid, the superior court of judicature. After a long examination, which lasted from morning till night, there appeared in all his answers so exact a conformity with what he had before said, that they declared he had learned them by heart, there not being the least prevarication. They, however, pressed him again to make a full discovery; that is, to accuse himself of crimes never committed, the governor adding, "You are still in my power; I can set you free if you comply: if not, I must deliver you to the alcade." Mr. Lithgow still persisting in his innocence, the governor ordered the notary to draw up a warrant for delivering him to the alcade to be tortured immediately.

Pursuant to this order, he was conducted by the serjeants to the end of a stone gallery, where the rack was placed. The encarouador, or executioner, immediately struck off his irons, which put him to very great pain, the bolts being so close rivetted, that the sledge hammer tore away above half an inch of his heel, in forcing off the bolt; the anguish of which, together with his weak condition (not having the least sustenance for three days) occasioned him to groan bitterly; upon which the merciless alcade said, "Villain, traitor, this is but the earnest of what you shall endure."

As soon as his irons were off he fell on his knees, uttering a short prayer, that God would be pleased to enable him to be steadfast, and undergo courageously the grievous trial he had to encounter. The alcade and notary having placed themselves in chairs, he was stripped naked, and fixed upon the rack, the office of these gentlemen being to be witness of, and set down the confessions and tortures endured by the unhappy sufferer.

It is morally impossible to describe all the various tortures inflicted upon him. Suffice it to say, that he lay on the rack for above five hours, during which time he received above sixty different tortures of the most hellish nature; and had they continued them a few minutes longer, he must have inevitably expired.

When these cruel persecutors were satisfied for the present, the prisoner was taken from the rack, and his irons being again put on, he was conducted to his former dungeon, having received no other nourishment than a little warm wine, which was given him rather to prevent his dying, and reserve him for future punishments, than from any principle of charity or pity.

As a confirmation of this, orders were given for a coach to pass every morning before day by the prison; that the noise made by it might give fresh terrors and alarms to the unhappy prisoner, and deprive him of all possibility of obtaining the least sleep.

In this horrid situation he continued, almost starved for want of the common necessities to preserve his wretched existence, till Christmas-Day, when he received some relief from Mariane, waiting-woman to the governor's lady. This woman having obtained leave to visit him, carried with her some refreshments, consisting of honey, sugar, raisins, and other articles: and so affected was she at beholding his situation, that she wept bitterly, and at her departure expressed the greatest concern at not being able to give him further consolation.

Mr. Lithgow was kept in this loathsome dungeon till he was almost devoured with vermin. They crawled about his beard, lips, eye-brows, &c. so that he could scarce open his eyes; and his mortification was increased by not having the use of his hands or legs to defend himself, from his being so miserably maimed by the tortures. So cruel was the governor, that he even ordered the vermin to be swept on him twice in every eight days. He, however, obtained some little mitigation of this part of his punishment, from the humanity of a Turkish slave that attended him, who, at times, when he could do it with safety, destroyed the vermin, and contributed every refreshment to him that he was capable of.

Mr. Lithgow at length received from this slave that information which gave him little hopes of ever being released, but, on the contrary, that he should finish his life under new tortures. The substance of this information was, that an English seminary priest, and a Scotch cooper, had been for some time employed by the governor to translate from the English into the Spanish language, all his books and observations; and that it was commonly said in the governor's house, that he was an arch and dangerous heretic.

He was greatly alarmed at this information, and began, not without reason, to apprehend that they would soon finish him, more especially as they could neither, by torture, or any other means, bring him to vary from what he had all along said at his different examinations.

About two days after he had received the above information, the governor, an inquisitor, and a canonical priest, accompanied by two Jesuits, entered his dungeon, and being seated, after several idle questions, the inquisitor asked Mr. Lithgow if he was a Roman-Catholic, and acknowledged the pope's supremacy? He answered, that he neither was the one, nor did the other; adding, that he was surprised at being asked such questions, since it was expressly stipulated by the articles of peace between England and Spain, that none of the English subjects should be liable to the inquisition, or any way molested by them on account of diversity in religion, &c. In the bitterness of his soul he made use of some warm expressions not suited to his circumstances: "As you have almost murdered me, said he, for pretended treason, so now you intend to make a martyr of me for my religion." He also expostulated with the governor on the ill-return he made the king of England, whose subject he was, for the princely humanity exercised towards the Spaniards in 1588, when their armada was shipwrecked on the Scotch coast, and thousands of the Spaniards found relief, who must have otherwise perished in a miserable manner.

Now the governor admitted the truth of what Mr. Lithgow said, but replied with an haughty air, that the king, who then only ruled Scotland, was actuated more by fear than love, and therefore did not deserve any thanks. One of the Jesuits said, there was no faith to be kept with heretics. The inquisitor then rising, addressed himself to Mr. Lithgow in the following words: "You have been taken up as a spy, accused of treachery, and tortured, as we acknowledge, innocently; (which appears by the account lately received from Madrid of the intentions of the English) yet it was the divine power that brought those judgments upon you, for presumptuously treating the blessed miracle of Loretto with ridicule, and expressing yourself in your writings irreverently of his holiness, the great agent and Christ's vicar upon earth; therefore you are justly fallen into our hands by their special appointment: thy books and papers are miraculously translated by the assistance of Providence influencing thy own countrymen."

When this trumpery was ended, they gave the prisoner eight days to consider and resolve whether he would become a convert to their religion; during which time the inquisitor told him, he, with other religious orders, would attend, to give him such assistance thereto as he might want. One of the Jesuits said, first making the sign of the cross upon his breast, "My son, behold, you deserve to be burnt alive; but by the grace of our lady of Loretto, whom you have blasphemed, we will both save your soul and body."

The inquisitor, with the three ecclesiastics, returned in the morning, when the former asked the prisoner what difficulties he had on his conscience that retarded his conversion; to which he answered, "He had not any doubts in his mind, being confident in the promises of Christ, and assuredly believing his revealed will signified in the gospels, as professed in the reformed Catholic Church, being confirmed by grace, and having infallible assurance thereby of the true Christian faith." To these words the inquisitor replied, "Thou art no Christian, but an absurd heretic, and without conversion a member of perdition." The prisoner then told him, it was not consistent with the nature and essence of religion and charity, to convince by opprobrious speeches, racks, and torments, but by arguments deduced from the scriptures; and that all other methods would with him be totally fruitless.

So enraged was the inquisitor at the replies made by the prisoner, that he struck him on the face, used many abusive speeches, and attempted to stab him, which he had certainly done had he not been prevented by the Jesuits: and from this time he never visited the prisoner again.

The two Jesuits returned the next day, and putting on a very grave supercilious air, the superior asked him, what resolution he had taken? To which Mr. Lithgow replied, that he was already resolved, unless he could shew substantial reasons to make him alter his opinion. The superior, after a pedantic display of their seven sacraments, the intercession of saints, transubstantiation, &c. boasted greatly of their church, her antiquity, universality, and uniformity; all which Mr. Lithgow denied: "For, said he, the profession of the faith I hold hath been ever since the first days of the apostles, and Christ had ever his own church, however obscure, in the greatest time of your darkness."

Now the Jesuits, finding their arguments had not the desired effect, that torments could not shake his constancy, nor even the fear of the cruel sentence he had reason to expect would be pronounced and executed on him, after severe menaces, left him. On the eighth day after, being the last of their inquisition, when sentence is pronounced, they returned again, but quite altered, both in their words and behaviour. After repeating much the same kind of arguments as before, they, with seeming tears in their eyes, pretended they were sorry from their hearts he must be obliged to undergo a terrible death; but above all, for the loss of his most precious soul; and falling on their knees, cried out, "Convert, convert, O dear brother, for our blessed lady's sake convert!" To which he answered, "I fear neither death nor fire, being prepared for both."

The first effects Mr. Lithgow felt of the determination of this bloody tribunal was, a sentence to receive that night eleven different tortures, and if he did not die in the execution of them, which might be reasonably expected from the maimed and disjointed condition he was in, he was, after Easter holidays, to be carried to Grenada, and there burnt to ashes. The first part of the sentence was executed with great barbarity that night; and it pleased God to give him strength both of body and mind, to stand fast to the truth, and to survive the horrid punishments which were thus inflicted.

When these barbarians had glutted themselves for the present, with exercising on the unhappy prisoner the most distinguished cruelties, they again put irons on, and conveyed him to his former dungeon. The next morning he received some little comfort from the Turkish slave before mentioned, who secretly brought him in his shirt sleeve, some raisins and figs, which he licked up in the best manner his strength would permit with his tongue. It was to this slave Mr. Lithgow attributed his surviving so long in such a wretched situation; for he found means to convey some of these fruits to him twice every week. It is very extraordinary, and worthy of note, that this poor slave, bred up from his infancy, according to the maxims of his prophet and parents, in the greatest detestation of Christians, should be so affected at the miserable situation of Mr. Lithgow, that he fell ill, and continued so for upwards of 40 days. During this period, Mr. Lithgow was attended by a negro woman, a slave, who found means to furnish him with refreshments still more amply than the Turk, being conversant in the house and family. She brought him some victuals, and with it some wine in a bottle, every day.

Now so far elapsed was the time, and the horrid situation so truly loathsome, that Mr. Lithgow waited, with anxious expectation for the day, which, by putting an end to his life, would also end his torments. But his melancholy expectations were, by the interposition of Providence, happily rendered abortive, and his deliverance from the following circumstances obtained.

A Spanish gentleman of quality came from Grenada to Malaga; who, being invited to an entertainment by the governor, he informed him of what had befallen Mr. Lithgow, from the time of his being apprehended as a spy, and described the various sufferings he had endured. He likewise told him, that after it was known the prisoner was innocent, it gave him great concern. That on this account he would gladly have released him, restored his money and papers, and made some atonement for the injuries he had received; but that, upon an inspection into his writings, several were found of a very blasphemous nature, highly reflecting on their religion. That on his refusing to abjure these heretical opinions, he was turned over to the inquisition, who finally condemned him.

Now, while the governor was relating this tragical tale, a Flemish youth, servant to the Spanish gentleman, who waited at table, was struck with amazement and pity at the sufferings of the stranger described. On his return to his master's lodgings, he began to revolve in his mind what he had heard, which made such an impression on him that he could not rest in his bed. In the short slumbers he had, his imagination painted to him the person described, on the rack, and burning in the fire. In this anxiety he passed the night; and when the morning came, without disclosing his intentions to any person whatever, he went into the town, and inquired for an English factor. He was directed to the house of one Mr. Wild, to whom he related the whole of what he had heard pass, the preceding evening, between his master and the governor; but could not tell Mr. Lithgow's name. Mr. Wild, however, conjectured it was him, by the servant's remembering the circumstance of his being a traveller, and his having had some acquaintance with him.

Mr. Wild, on the departure of the Flemish servant, immediately sent for the other English factors, to whom he related all the particulars relative to their unfortunate countryman. After a short consultation it was agreed, that an information of the whole affair should be sent, by express, to sir Walter Aston, the English ambassador to the king of Spain, then at Madrid. This was accordingly done, and the ambassador having presented a memorial to the king and council of Spain, he obtained an order for Mr. Lithgow's enlargement, and his delivery to the English factory. This order was directed to the governor of Malaga; and was received by the whole assembly of the bloody inquisition with the greatest surprise and aversion.

Mr. Lithgow was released from his confinement on the eve of Easter-Sunday, when he was carried from his dungeon on the back of the slave that had attended him to the house of one Mr. Busbich, where all proper comforts were given him. It fortunately happened, that there was at this time a Squadron of English ships in the road, commanded by sir Richard Hawkins, who being informed of the past sufferings, and present situation of Mr. Lithgow, came the next day a-shore, with a proper guard, and received him from the merchants. He was instantly carried in blankets on board the Vanguard, and three days after was removed to another ship, by direction of the general sir Robert Mansel, who ordered that he should have proper care taken of him. The factory presented him with clothes, and all necessary provisions, besides which they gave him 200 reals in silver; and sir Richard Hawkins sent him two double pistoles.

Sir Richard Hawkins demanded the delivery of his papers, money, books, &c. before his departure from the Spanish coast, but could not obtain any satisfactory answer on that head.

It is here worth the reader's while to reflect, how manifestly Providence interfered in behalf of this poor man, when he was just on the brink of destruction; for by his sentence, from which there was no appeal, he would have been taken, in a few days, to Grenada, and burnt to ashes: and that a poor ordinary servant, who had not the least knowledge of him, nor was any ways interested in his preservation, should risque the displeasure of his master, and hazard his own life, to disclose a thing of so momentous and perilous a nature, to a strange gentleman, on whose secrecy depended his own existence. By such secondary means does Providence frequently interfere in behalf of the virtuous and oppressed; of which this is a most distinguished proof.

Having lain twelve days in the road, the ship weighed anchor, and in about two months arrived safe at Deptford. The next morning Mr. Lithgow was carried on a feather bed to Theobalds, in Hertfordshire, where, at that time, were the king and royal family. His majesty happened to be that day engaged in hunting, but on his return in the evening, Mr. Lithgow was presented to him, and related the particulars of his sufferings, and his happy delivery. The king was so affected at the narrative, that he expressed the deepest concern, and gave orders that he should be sent to Bath, and his wants properly supplied from his royal munificence. By these means, under God, after some time, Mr. Lithgow was restored, from the most wretched spectacle, to a great share of health and strength; but he lost the use of his left arm, and several of the smaller bones were so crushed and broken, as to be rendered ever after unserviceable.

Though every effort was used, Mr. Lithgow could never obtain any part of his money or effects, though his majesty, and the ministers of state, interested themselves in his behalf. Gondamore, the Spanish ambassador, indeed, promised that all his effects should be restored, with the addition of 1000l. English money, as some atonement for the tortures he had undergone, which last was to be paid him by the governor of Malaga. These engagements, however, were but mere promises; and though the king was a kind of guarantee for the well performance of them, the cunning Spaniard found means to elude the same. He had, indeed, too great a share of influence in the English council during the time of that pacific reign, when England suffered herself, by most of the states and kings in Europe, to be bullied into slavish compliance.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in ITALY.

NOW we shall commence our account of the persecutions in Italy, a country which has been, and still is,

1. The centre of Popery,
2. The seat of the pontiff, and
3. The source of the various errors which have spread themselves over other countries, deluded the minds of thousands, and diffused the clouds of superstition and bigotry over the human understanding.

We shall, in pursuing our narrative, include the most remarkable persecutions that have happened, and the cruelties which have been wantonly made use of.

1. By the immediate order of the pope,
2. Through the power of the inquisition,
3. At the instigation of particular orders of the clergy, and
4. By the bigotry of the Italian princes.

The first PERSECUTIONS under the PAPACY in ITALY.

THE first persecutions under the papacy began in Italy in the 12th century, at the time that Adrian, an Englishman, was pope, being occasioned by the following circumstances:

One Arnold, a learned man, and an excellent orator of Brixia, came to Rome, and boldly preached against the corruptions and innovations which had crept into the church. His doctrine was so clear, consistent, and breathed forth such a pure spirit of piety, that the senators, and many of the people, highly approved of, and admired his discourses.

Adrian was so greatly enraged at this, that he commanded Arnold instantly to leave the city, as an heretic. Arnold, however, did not comply, for the senators, and some of the principal people took his part, and resisted the pope's authority.

Now Adrian laid the city of Rome under an interdict, which caused the whole body of clergy to interpose; and, at length, persuaded the senators and people to give up the point, and suffer Arnold to be banished. This being agreed to, he received his sentence of exile, and retired to Germany, where he continued to preach against the pope, and to expose the gross errors of the Romish church.

On this account, Adrian thirsted for his blood, and made several attempts to get him into his hands; but Arnold, for a long time, avoided every snare laid for him. At length, Frederic Barbarossa arriving at the imperial dignity, requested that the pope would crown him with his own hand. This Adrian complied with, and at the same time asked a favour of the emperor, which was, to put Arnold into his hands. The emperor very readily delivered up the unfortunate preacher, who soon fell a martyr to Adrian's vengeance, being hanged, and his body burnt to ashes, at Apulia. The same fate attended several of his old companions and friends.

A Spaniard, named Encenas, was sent to Rome, to be brought up in the Roman-Catholic faith; but having conversed with some of the reformed, and read several treatises which they had put into his hands, he became a Protestant. This, at length, being known, one of his own relations informed against him, when he was burnt by order of the pope and a conclave of cardinals. The brother of Encenas had been taken up much about the same time, for having a New Testament, in the Spanish language, in his possession; but before the time appointed for his execution, he found means to escape out of prison; and retired to Germany.

One Faninus, a learned layman, by reading controversial books, became of the reformed religion. An information being exhibited against him to the pope, he was apprehended, and cast into prison. His wife, children, relations, and friends, visited him in his confinement, and so far wrought upon his mind, that he renounced his faith, and obtained his release. But he was no sooner free from confinement, than his mind felt the heaviest of chains, the weight of a guilty conscience. His horrors were so great, that he found them insupportable, till he had returned from his apostacy, and declared himself fully convinced of the errors of the church of Rome. To make amends for his falling off, he now openly and strenuously did all he could to make converts to Protestantism, and was pretty successful in his endeavours. These proceedings occasioned his second imprisonment; but he had his life offered him if he would recant again. This proposal he rejected with disdain, saying, that he scorned life upon such terms. Being asked why he would obstinately persist in his opinions, and leave his wife and children in distress; he replied, I shall not leave them in distress, I have recommended them to the care of an excellent trustee. What trustee? said the person who had asked the question, with some surprise: to which Faninus answered, Jesus Christ is the trustee I mean, and I think I could not commit them to the care of a better. On the day of execution he appeared remarkably cheerful, which one observing, said, It is strange you should appear so merry upon such an occasion, when Jesus Christ himself, just before his death, was in such agonies, that he sweated blood and water. To which Faninus replied: Christ sustained all manner of pangs and conflicts, with hell and death, on our accounts; and thus, by his sufferings, freed those who really believe in him from the fear of them. He was then strangled, and his body, being burnt to ashes, the wind scattered them about.

Also Dominicus, a learned soldier, having read several controversial writings, became a zealous Protestant, and retiring to Placentia, preached the gospel in its utmost purity, to a very considerable congregation. At the conclusion of his sermon one day, he said, "If the congregation will attend to-morrow, I will give them a description of Anti-christ, and paint him out in his proper colours."

An immense number of people attended the next day; but just as Dominicus was beginning his sermon, a civil magistrate went up to his pulpit, and took him into custody. He readily submitted; but as he went along with the magistrate, made use of this expression: I wonder the Devil hath let me alone so long. When he was brought to examination, this question was put to him: Will you renounce your doctrines? To which he replied: My doctrines! I maintain no doctrines of my own; what I preach are the doctrines of Christ, and for those I will forfeit my blood, and even think myself happy to suffer for the sake of my Redeemer. Every method was taken to make him recant from his faith, and embrace the errors of the church of Rome; but when persuasions and menaces were found ineffectual, he was sentenced to death, and hanged in the market-place accordingly.

A Protestant gentleman, named Galeacius, who resided near the castle of St. Angelo, was apprehended on account of his faith. Great endeavours being used by his friends, he recanted, and subscribed to several of the superstitious doctrines propagated by the church of Rome. Becoming, however, sensible of his error, he publicly renounced his recantation. Being apprehended for this, he was condemned to be burnt; and agreeable to the order, was chained to a stake, where he was left several hours before the fire was put to the faggots, in order that his wife, relations, and friends, who surrounded him, might induce him to give up his opinions. Galeacius, however, now retained his constancy of mind, and entreated the executioner to put fire to the wood that was to burn him. This, at length, he did, and Galeacius was soon consumed in the flames, which burnt with amazing rapidity, and deprived him of sensation in a very short time.

Not long after this gentleman's death, a great number of Protestants were put to death in various parts of Italy, on account of their faith, giving a sure proof of their sincerity in their martyrdoms.

An Account of the several PERSECUTIONS in CALABRIA.

ABOUT the 14th century, many of the Waldenses of Pragela and Dauphiny emigrated to Calabria, and settling in some waste lands, by the permission of the nobles of that country, they soon, by the most industrious cultivation, made several wild and barren spots appear with all the beauties of fertility and verdure.

The lords of Calabria were highly pleased with their new subjects and tenants, as they were honest, quiet, and industrious; but the priests of the country exhibited several negative complaints against them; for not being able to accuse them of any thing bad which they did do, they founded accusations on what they did not do, and charged them,

1. With not being Roman-Catholics.
2. With not making any of their boys priests.
3. With not making any of their girls nuns.
4. With not going to mass.
5. With not giving wax tapers to their priests as offerings.
6. With not going on pilgrimages.
7. With not bowing to images.

However, the Calabrian lords quieted the priests, by telling them, that these people were extremely harmless; that they gave no offence to the Roman-Catholics, and cheerfully paid the tithes to the priests, whose revenues were considerably increased by their coming into the country, and who, of consequence, ought to be the very last persons to make a complaint.

Matters went on tolerably well after this for a few years, during which the Waldenses formed themselves into two corporate towns, annexing several villages to the jurisdiction of them. At length, they sent to Geneva for two clergymen; one to preach in each town, as they determined to make a public profession of their faith. Intelligence of this affair being carried to pope Pius the Fourth, he determined to exterminate them from Calabria, without further delay.

For this purpose he sent cardinal Alexandrino, a man of a very violent temper, and a furious bigot, together with two monks, to Calabria; where they were to act as inquisitors. These authorized persons came to St. Xist, one of the towns built by the Waldenses, and having assembled the people, told them, that they should receive no injury, or violence, if they would accept of preachers appointed by the pope; but if they would not, they should be deprived both of their properties and lives; and that their intentions might be known, mass should be publicly said that afternoon, at which they were ordered to be present.

But the people of St. Xist, instead of attending mass, fled into the woods with their families, and thus disappointed the cardinal and his coadjutors. The cardinal then proceeded to La Garde, the other town belonging to the Waldenses, where, not to be served as he had been at St. Xist, he ordered the gates to be locked, and all avenues guarded. The same proposals were then made to the people of La Garde, as had been made to the inhabitants of St. Xist, but with this additional piece of artifice: the cardinal assured them that the inhabitants of St. Xist had immediately come into his proposals, and agreed, that the pope should appoint them preachers. This falsehood succeeded; for the people of La Garde, thinking what the cardinal had told them to be truth, said, they would exactly follow the example of their brethren at St. Xist.

Thus the cardinal having gained his point by deluding the people of one town, sent for two troops of soldiers, with a view to murder those of the other. He, accordingly, dispatched the soldiers into the woods, to hunt down the inhabitants of St. Xist like wild beasts, and gave them strict orders to spare neither age or sex, but to kill all they came near. The troops entered the woods, and many fell a prey to their ferocity, before the Waldenses were properly apprized of their design. At length, however, they determined to sell their lives as dear as possible, when several conflicts happened, in which the half-armed Waldenses performed prodigies of valour, and many were slain on both sides. The greatest part of the troops being killed in the different rencounters, the rest were compelled to retreat, which so enraged the cardinal, that he wrote to the viceroy of Naples for reinforcements.

Hereupon the viceroy ordered a proclamation to be made throughout all the Neapolitan territories, that all out-laws, deserters, and other proscribed persons, should be freely pardoned for their respective offences, on condition of making a campaign against the inhabitants of St. Xist, and continuing under arms till those people were utterly destroyed.

Several persons, of desperate fortunes, came in upon this proclamation, and being formed into light companies, were sent to scour the woods, and put to death all they could meet with of the reformed religion. The viceroy himself likewise joined the cardinal, at the head of a body of regular forces; and, in conjunction, they did all they could to harass the poor people in the woods. Some they caught, and hanged up upon trees, cut down boughs, and burnt them, or ripped them open, and left their bodies to be devoured by wild beasts, or birds of prey. Many they shot at a distance, but the greatest number they hunted down by way of sport. A few hid themselves in caves; but famine destroyed them in their retreat; and thus all these poor people perished, by various means, to glut the bigoted malice of their barbarous enemies.

No sooner were the inhabitants of St. Xist exterminated, than those of La Garde engaged the attention of the cardinal and viceroy. It was offered, that if they would embrace the Roman-Catholic persuasion, themselves and families should not be injured, but their houses and properties should be restored, and none would be permitted to molest them; but, on the contrary, if they refused this mercy, as it was termed, the utmost extremities would be used, and the most cruel deaths the certain consequence of their non-acquiescence.

In spite of the promises on one side, and menaces on the other, these worthy people unanimously refused to renounce their religion, or embrace the errors of Popery. This exasperated the cardinal and viceroy so much, that thirty of them were ordered to be put immediately to the rack, as a terror to the remainder.

The thirty who were put to the rack were treated with such severity, that several died under the tortures: one Charlin, in particular, was so cruelly used, that his belly burst, his bowels came out, and he expired in the greatest agonies. These barbarities, however, did not answer the purposes for which they were intended; for those who remained alive after the rack, and those who had not felt the rack, remained equally constant in their faith, and boldly declared, that no tortures of body, or terrors of mind, should ever induce them to renounce their God, or worship idols.

There were several then, by the cardinal's order, stripped stark naked, and whipped to death with iron rods; some were hacked to pieces with large knives; others were thrown down from the top of a large tower; and many were covered over with pitch, and burnt alive.

Among the monks who attended the cardinal, there was one naturally of a savage and cruel disposition, who requested of him, that he might shed some of the blood of these poor people with his own hands; his request being granted, the barbarous man took a large sharp knife, and cut the throats of fourscore men, women, and children, with as little remorse as a butcher would have killed so many sheep. Every one of these bodies were then ordered to be quartered, the quarters placed upon stakes, and then fixed in different parts of the country, within a circuit of about thirty miles.

The four principal men of La Garde were hanged, and the clergyman was thrown from the top of his church steeple. He was terribly mangled, but not quite killed by the fall; at which time the viceroy passing by, said, Is the dog yet living? Take him up, and give him to the hogs: when, brutal as this sentence may appear, it was accordingly executed.

There were sixty women racked so violently, that the cords pierced their arms and legs quite to the bone: when, being remanded to prison, their wounds mortified, and they died in the most miserable manner. Many others were put to death by various cruel means; and if any Roman-Catholic, more compassionate than the rest, interceded for any of the reformed, he was immediately apprehended, and shared the same fate, as a favourer of heretics.

Now, the viceroy being obliged to march back to Naples, on some affairs of moment which required his presence, and the cardinal having been recalled to Rome, the marquis of Butiane was ordered to put the finishing stroke to what they had begun; which he, at length, effected, by acting with such barbarous rigour, that there was not a single person of the reformed religion left living in all Calabria.

A great number of inoffensive and harmless people were thus deprived of their possessions, robbed of their property, driven from their homes, and, at length, murdered, by various means, only because they would not sacrifice their consciences to the superstitions of others, embrace idolatrous doctrines which they abhorred, and accept of teachers whom they could not believe. Tyranny is of three kinds, viz. That which enslaves the person, that which seizes the property, and that which prescribes and dictates to the mind. The two first sorts may be termed civil tyranny, and have been practised by arbitrary sovereigns in all ages, who have delighted in tormenting the persons, and stealing the properties of their unhappy subjects. But the third sort, viz. prescribing and dictating to the mind, may be called ecclesiastical tyranny: and this is the worst kind of tyranny, as it includes the other two sorts; for the Romish clergy not only torture the bodies, and seize the effects of those they persecute, but take the lives, torment the minds, and, if possible, would tyrannize over the very souls of the unhappy victims in their power.

SEVERAL of the Waldenses, to avoid the persecutions to which they were continually subjected in France, went and settled in the vallies of Piedmont, where they increased surprisingly, and flourished exceedingly for a considerable time.

Notwithstanding they were harmless in their behaviour, inoffensive in their conversation, and paid tithes to the Romish clergy, yet the latter could not be contented, but wished to give them some disturbance: they, accordingly, complained to the archbishop of Turin, that the Waldenses of the vallies of Piedmont were heretics, for the reasons as follow:

1. That they did not believe in the doctrines of the church of Rome.
2. That they made no offerings for prayers for the dead.
3. That they did not go to mass.
4. That they did not confess, and receive absolution.
5. That they did not believe in purgatory, or pay money to get the souls of their friends out of it.

The archbishop ordered a persecution to be commenced upon these charges, and many fell martyrs to the superstitious rage of the monks and priests.

One of the reformed at Turin had his bowels torn out, and put into a basin before his face, where they remained, in his view, till he expired. At Revel, Cate-lin Girard being at the stake, desired the executioner to give him up a stone; which he refused, thinking that he meant to throw it at somebody; but Girard assuring him that he had no such design, the executioner complied; when Girard looking earnestly at the stone, said, When it is in the power of a man to eat and digest this solid stone, the religion for which I am about to suffer shall have an end, and not before. He then threw the stone on the ground, and submitted cheerfully to the flames. A great many more of the reformed were oppressed, or put to death, by various means, till the patience of the Waldenses being tired out, they flew to arms in their own defence, and formed themselves into regular bodies.

Provoked at this, the archbishop of Turin procured a number of troops, and sent against them; but in most of the skirmishes and engagements the Waldenses were successful, which partly arose from their being better acquainted with the passes of the vallies of Piedmont than their adversaries, and partly from the desperation with which they fought; for they well knew, if they were taken, they should not be considered as prisoners of war, but, as heretics, should be tortured to death.

Philip, the seventh duke of Savoy, and supreme lord of Piedmont, determined at length to interpose his authority, and stop these bloody wars, which so greatly disturbed his dominions. He was not willing to disoblige the pope, or affront the archbishop of Turin; nevertheless, he sent them both messages, importing, that he could not any longer tamely see his dominions overrun with troops, who were directed by priests instead of officers, and commanded by prelates in the place of generals; nor would he suffer his country to be depopulated, while he himself had not been even consulted upon the occasion.

Perceiving the resolution of the duke, the priests did all they could to prejudice his mind against the Waldenses; but the duke told them, that though he was unacquainted with the religious tenets of these people, yet he had always found them quiet, faithful, and obedient, and was therefore determined they should be persecuted no longer.

Accordingly the priests had recourse to the most palpable and absurd falsehoods: they assured the duke that he was mistaken in the Waldenses, for they were a wicked set of people, and highly addicted to intemperance, uncleanness, blasphemy, adultery, incest, and many other abominable crimes; and that they were even monsters in nature, for their children were born with black throats, with four rows of teeth, and bodies covered all over with hair.

But the duke was not so devoid of common sense as to give credit to what the priests said, though they affirmed, in the most solemn manner, the truth of their assertions. He, however, sent twelve very learned and sensible gentlemen into the Piedmontese vallies, to examine into the real characters of the people.

These gentlemen, after travelling through all their towns and villages, and conversing with people of every rank among the Waldenses, returned to the duke, and gave him the most favourable account of those people; affirming, before the faces of the priests who vilified them, that they were harmless, inoffensive, loyal, friendly, industrious, and pious: that they abhorred the crimes of which they were accused; and that, should an individual, through his depravity, fall into any of those crimes, he would, by their laws, be punished in the most exemplary manner. With respect to the children, the gentlemen said, the priests had told the most gross and ridiculous falsties, for they were neither born with black throats, teeth in their mouths, or hair on their bodies, but were as fine children as could be seen. "And to convince your highness of what we have said (continued one of the gentlemen) we have brought twelve of the principal male inhabitants, who are come to ask pardon in the name of the rest, for having taken up arms without your leave, though even in their own defence, and to preserve their lives from their merciless enemies. And we have likewise brought several women, with children of various ages, that your highness may have an opportunity of personally examining them as much as you please."

Having accepted the apology of the twelve delegates, conversed with the women, and examined the children, the duke graciously dismissed them. He then commanded the priests, who had attempted to mislead him, immediately to leave the court; and gave strict orders, that the persecution should cease throughout his dominions.

For many years the Waldenses had enjoyed peace, till Philip, the seventh duke of Savoy, died, when his successor happened to be a very bigoted Papist. About the same time, some of the principal Waldenses proposed, that their clergy should preach in public, that every one might know the purity of their doctrines; for hitherto they had preached only in private, and to such congregations as they well knew to consist of none but persons of the reformed religion.

When informed of these proceedings, the new duke was greatly exasperated, and sent a considerable body of troops into the vallies, swearing, that if the people would not change their religion, he would have them flayed alive. The commander of the troops soon found the impracticability of conquering them with the number of men he had with him: he, therefore, sent word to the duke, that the idea of subjugating the Waldenses, with so small a force, was ridiculous; that those people were better acquainted with the country than any that were with him; that they had secured all the passes, were well armed, and resolutely determined to defend themselves; and, with respect to flaying them alive, he said, that every skin belonging to those people would cost him the lives of a dozen of his subjects.

Alarmed at this information, the duke withdrew the troops, determining to act not by force, but by stratagem. He, therefore, ordered rewards for the taking of any of the Waldenses, who might be found straying from their places of security; and these, when taken, were either flayed alive, or burnt.

Hitherto the Waldenses had only the New Testament, and a few books of the Old, in the Waldensian tongue; but they determined now to have the sacred writings complete in their own language. They, therefore, employed a Swiss printer to furnish them with a complete edition of the Old and New Testament in the Waldensian tongue, which he did for the consideration of fifteen hundred crowns of gold, paid him by those truly pious people.

Pope Paul the Third, a bigoted Papist, ascending the pontifical chair, immediately solicited the parliament of Turin to persecute the Waldenses, as the most pernicious of all heretics.

To this the parliament readily agreed, when several were suddenly apprehended and burnt, by their order. Among these was Bartholomew Hektor, a bookseller and stationer of Turin, who was brought up a Roman-Catholic, but having read some treatises written by the reformed clergy, he was fully convinced of the errors of the church of Rome; yet his mind was, for some time, wavering, and he hardly knew what persuasion to embrace.

After some serious consideration, he at last fully embraced the reformed religion, and was apprehended, as we have already mentioned, and burnt by order of the parliament of Turin.

Now a consultation was held by the parliament of Turin, in which it was agreed, to send deputies to the vallies of Piedmont, with propositions as follow:

1. That if the Waldenses would come to the bosom of the church of Rome, and embrace the Roman-Catholic religion, they should enjoy their houses, properties, and lands, and live with their families, without the least molestation.

2. That to prove their obedience, they should send twelve of their principal persons, with all their ministers and school-masters, to Turin, to be dealt with at discretion.

3. That the pope, the king of France, and the duke of Savoy, approved of, and authorized the proceedings of the parliament of Turin, upon this occasion.

4. That if the Waldenses of the vallies of Piedmont refused to comply with these propositions, persecution should ensue, and certain death be their portion.

The Waldenses answering these propositions respectively, made the following very noble replies:

1. That no consideration whatever should make them renounce their religion.

2. That they would never consent to commit their best and most respectable friends, to the custody and discretion of their worst and most inveterate enemies.

3. That they valued the approbation of the King of kings, who reigns in heaven, more than any temporal authority.

4. That their souls were more precious than their bodies.

These spirited and pointed replies greatly exasperated the parliament of Turin: they continued, with more avidity than ever, to kidnap such Waldenses as did not act with proper precaution, who were sure to suffer the most cruel deaths. Among these it unfortunately happened, that they got hold of Jeffery Varnagle, minister of Angrogne, whom they accused as an heretic, and committed to the flames.

Then they solicited a considerable body of troops of the king of France, in order to exterminate the reformed entirely from the vallies of Piedmont; but just as the troops were going to march, the Protestant princes of Germany interposed, and threatened to send troops to assist the Waldenses, if they should be attacked. The king of France, not caring to enter into a war, remanded the troops, and sent word to the parliament of Turin, that he could not spare any troops at present to act in Piedmont. The members of the parliament were greatly vexed at this disappointment, and the persecution gradually ceased; for as they could only put to death such of the reformed as they caught by chance, and as the Waldenses daily grew more cautious, their cruelty was obliged to subside, for want of objects on whom to exercise it.

When the Waldenses had enjoyed a few years tranquillity, they were again disturbed by the following means: the pope's nuncio coming to Turin to the duke of Savoy upon business, told that prince he was astonished he had not yet either rooted out the Waldenses from the vallies of Piedmont entirely, or compelled them to enter into the bosom of the church of Rome. That he could not help looking upon such conduct with a suspicious eye, and that he really thought him a favourer of those heretics, and should report the affair accordingly to his holiness the pope.

Inflamed by this reflection, and unwilling to be misrepresented to the pope, the duke determined to act with the greatest severity, in order to shew his zeal, and to make amends for former neglect by future cruelty. He, accordingly, issued express orders for all the Waldenses to attend mass regularly, on pain of death. This they absolutely refused to do, on which he entered the Piedmontese vallies, with a formidable body of troops, and began a most furious persecution, in which great numbers were hanged, drowned, ripped open, tied to trees, and pierced with prongs, thrown from precipices, burnt, stabbed, racked to death, worried by dogs, crucified with their heads downwards, &c. &c.

All who fled had their goods plundered, and their houses burnt to the ground: they were particularly cruel when they caught a minister or a school-master, whom they put to such exquisite tortures, as are almost incredible to conceive. If any whom they took seemed wavering in their faith, they did not put them to death, but sent them to the galleys, to be made converts by dint of hardships.

On this occasion, the most cruel persecutors that attended the duke were three in number, viz. 1. Thomas Incomel, an apostate; for he was brought up in the reformed religion, but renounced his faith, embraced the errors of Popery, and turned monk. He was a great libertine, given to unnatural crimes, and sordidly solicitous for the plunder of the Waldenses. 2. Corbis, a man of a very ferocious and cruel nature, whose business was to examine the prisoners. 3. The provost of justice, who was very anxious for the execution of the Waldenses, as every execution put money into his pocket.

Now these three persecutors were unmerciful to the last degree; and wherever they came, the blood of the innocent was sure to flow. Exclusive of the cruelties exercised cised by the duke, by these three persons, and the army, in their different marches, many local barbarities were committed. At Pignerol, a town in the vallies, was a monastery, the monks of which finding they might injure the reformed with impunity, began to plunder the houses, and pull down the churches of the Waldenses. Not meeting with any opposition, they next seized upon the persons of those unhappy people, murdering the men, confining the women, and putting the children to Roman-Catholic nurses.

In like manner the Roman-Catholic inhabitants of the valley of St. Martin did all they could to torment the neighbouring Waldenses: they destroyed their churches, burnt their houses, seized their properties, stole their cattle, converted their lands to their own use, committed their ministers to the flames, and drove the Waldenses to the woods, where they had nothing to subsist on but wild fruits, the bark of trees, roots, &c. &c.

A few Roman-Catholic ruffians having seized a minister as he was going to preach, determined to take him to a convenient place, and burn him. His parishioners having intelligence of the affair, the men armed themselves, pursued the ruffians, and seemed determined to rescue their minister; which the ruffians no sooner perceived, than they stabbed the poor gentleman, and leaving him weltering in his blood, made a precipitate retreat. The astonished parishioners did all they could to recover him, but in vain; for the weapon had touched the vital parts, and he expired as they were carrying him to his dwelling.

The monks of Pignerol having a great inclination to get a minister of a town in the vallies, called St. Germain, into their power, hired a band of ruffians for the purpose of apprehending him. These fellows were conducted by a treacherous person, who had formerly been a servant to the clergyman, and who perfectly well knew a secret way to the house, by which he could lead them without alarming the neighbourhood. The guide knocked at the door, and being asked who was there, answered in his own name. The clergyman, not expecting any injury from a person on whom he had heaped favours, immediately opened the door; but perceiving the ruffians, he started back, and fled to a back door; but they rushed in, followed and seized him. Having murdered all his family, they made him proceed towards Pignerol, goading him all the way with pikes, lances, swords, &c. He was kept a considerable time in prison, and then fastened to the stake to be burnt; when two women of the Waldenses, who had renounced their religion to save their lives, were ordered to carry faggots to the stake to burn him; and as they laid them down, to say, Take these, thou wicked heretic, in recompence for the pernicious doctrines thou hast taught us. These words they both repeated to him: to which he calmly replied, I formerly taught you well, but you have since learned ill. The fire was then put to the faggots, and he was speedily consumed, calling upon the name of the Lord as long as he retained his voice.

Seeing the troops of ruffians, belonging to the monks, did great mischief about the town of St. Germain, murdering and plundering many of the inhabitants, the reformed of Lucerne and Angrogne sent some bands of armed men to the assistance of their brethren of St. Germain. These bodies of armed men frequently attacked the ruffians, and often put them to the rout, which so terrified the monks, that they left their monastery of Pignerol for some time, till they could procure a body of regular troops for their protection.

Now the duke, not thinking himself so successful as he at first imagined he should be, greatly augmented his forces, ordered the bands of ruffians, belonging to the monks, should join him, and commanded, that a general gaol-delivery should take place, provided the persons released would bear arms, and form themselves into light companies, to assist in the extermination of the Waldenses.

As soon as the Waldenses were informed of the proceedings, they secured as much of their properties as they could, and quitting the vallies, retired to the rocks and caves among the Alps; for it is to be understood, that the vallies of Piedmont are situated at the foot of those prodigious mountains, called the Alps, or the Alpine Hills.

Now the army began to plunder and burn the towns and villages wherever they came; but the troops could not force the passes to the Alps, which were gallantly defended by the Waldenses, who always repulsed their enemies; but if any fell into the hands of the troops, they were sure to be treated in the most barbarous and severe manner.

A soldier having caught one of the Waldenses, hit his right ear off, saying, I will carry this member of that wicked heretic with me into my own country, and preserve it as a rarity. He then stabbed the man, and threw him into a ditch.

A party of the troops found a venerable man upwards of an hundred years of age, together with his granddaughter, a maiden, of about eighteen, in a cave. They butchered the poor old man in a most inhuman manner, and then attempted to ravish the girl, when she started away, and fled from them; but they pursuing her, she threw herself from a precipice, and expired.

The Waldenses, in order the more effectually to be able to repel force by force, entered into a league with the Protestant powers in Germany, and with the reformed of Dauphiny and Pragela. These were, respectively to furnish bodies of troops; and the Waldenses determined, when thus reinforced, to quit the mountains of the Alps, where they must soon have perished, as the winter was coming on, and to force the duke's army to evacuate their native vallies.

At length, the duke of Savoy was tired of the war; it had cost him great fatigue and anxiety of mind, a vast number of men; and very considerable sums of money. It had been much more tedious and bloody than he expected, as well as more expensive than he could at first have imagined, for he thought the plunder would have discharged the expences of the expedition; but in this he was mistaken, for the pope's nuncio, the bishops, monks, and other ecclesiastics, who attended the army and encouraged the war, sunk the greatest part of the wealth that was taken, under various pretences. For these reasons, and the death of his duchess, of which he had just received intelligence, and fearing that the Waldenses, by the treaties they had entered into, would become more powerful than ever, he determined to return to Turin with his army, and to make peace with the Waldenses.

Happily he executed this resolution, though greatly against the will of the ecclesiastics, who were the chief gainers, and the best pleased with revenge. Before the articles of peace could be ratified, the duke himself died soon after his return to Turin; but on his death-bed he strictly enjoined his son to perform what he had intended, and to be as favourable as possible to the Waldenses.

Charles-Emanuel, the duke's son, succeeded to the dominions of Savoy, and gave a full ratification of peace to the Waldenses, according to the last injunctions of his father, though the ecclesiastics did all they could to dissuade him from his noble purpose.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in VENICE.

WHEN the state of Venice was free from inquisitors, a great number of Protestants fixed their residence there, and many converts were made by the purity of the doctrines they professed, and the inoffensiveness of the conversation they made use of.

As soon as the pope was informed of the great increase of Protestantism, he, in the year 1542, sent inquisitors to Venice, to make an inquiry into the matter, and apprehend such as they might deem obnoxious persons. Hence a severe persecution began, and many worthy persons were martyred for serving God with purity, and scorning the trappings of idle superstition.

The modes by which the Protestants were deprived of life were several; but one particular method, which was

was first invented upon this occasion, we shall describe: As soon as sentence was passed, the prisoner had an iron chain, which ran through a great stone, fastened to his body; he was then laid flat upon a plank, with his face upwards, and rowed between two boats to a certain distance at sea, when the boats separated, and, by the weight of the stone, he was sunk to the bottom.

When any denied the jurisdiction of the inquisitors at Venice, they were sent to Rome, where, being committed purposely to damp prisons, and never called to an hearing, their flesh mortified, and they there died in a most miserable manner.

Anthony Ricetti, a citizen of Venice, being apprehended as a Protestant, was sentenced to be drowned in the manner we have already described. A few days previous to the time appointed for his execution, his son went to him, and begged him to recant, that his life might be saved, and himself not left fatherless. To which the father replied, A good Christian is bound to relinquish not only goods and children, but life itself for the glory of his Redeemer: therefore I am resolved to sacrifice every thing in this transitory world, for the sake of salvation in a world that will last to eternity. The lords of Venice likewise sent him word, that if he would embrace the Roman-Catholic religion, they would not only give him his life, but redeem a considerable estate which he had mortgaged, and freely present him with it. This, however, he absolutely refused to comply with, sending word to the nobles, that he valued his soul beyond all other considerations; and being told that a fellow-prisoner, named Francis Sega, had recanted, he answered, If he has forsaken God, I pity him; but I shall continue steadfast in my duty. Finding all endeavours to persuade him to renounce his faith ineffectual, he was executed according to his sentence, dying cheerfully, and recommending his soul fervently to the Almighty Creator.

All that Ricetti had been told concerning the apostacy of Francis Sega was absolutely false, for he had never offered to recant, but steadfastly persisted in his faith: and was executed, a few days after Ricetti, in the very same manner.

A Protestant gentleman of very great learning, named Francis Spinola, being apprehended by order of the inquisitors, was carried before their tribunal. A treatise on the Lord's Supper was then put into his hands, and he was asked if he knew the author of it. To which he replied, I confess myself to be the author of it, and at the same time solemnly affirm, that there is not a line in it but what is authorized by, and consonant to, the Holy Scriptures. On this confession he was committed close prisoner to a dungeon for several days.

When brought to a second examination, he charged the pope's legate, and the inquisitors, with being merciless barbarians, and then represented the superstitions and idolatries practised by the church of Rome in so glaring a light, that not being able to refute his arguments, they sent him back to his dungeon, to make him repent of what he had uttered.

They asked him, on his third examination, if he would recant his errors? To which he answered, That the doctrines he maintained were not erroneous, being purely the same as those which Christ and his apostles had taught, and which were handed down to us in the Sacred Writings. The inquisitors then sentenced him to be drowned, which was executed in the manner already described. He went to meet death with the utmost serenity, seeming to wish for dissolution, and declaring, that the prolongation of this life did but tend to retard that real happiness which could be only expected in the other world.

An interesting Account of several remarkable Individuals, who were martyred in different Parts of Italy, for their Religion.

JOHN MOLLIIUS was born at Rome, of reputable parents. At twelve years of age they placed him in the monastery of Grey Friars, where he made such a rapid progress in arts, sciences, and languages, that he was permitted to take priest's orders at the early age of eighteen years.

Mollius was then sent to Ferrara, where, after pursuing his studies six years longer, he was made theological reader in the university of that city. He now, unhappily, exerted his great talents to disguise the gospel truths, and to varnish over the errors of the church of Rome. After some years residence at Ferrara, he removed to the university of Bononia, where he became a professor. Having read some treatises written by ministers of the reformed religion, he grew fully sensible of the errors of Popery, and soon became in his heart a zealous Protestant.

This man now determined to expound, according to the purity of the gospel, St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, in a regular course of sermons. The concourse of people that continually attended his preaching was surprising; but when the priests found the tenor of his doctrines, they dispatched an account of the affair to Rome; when the pope sent a monk, named Cornelius, to Bononia, to expound the same epistle, according to the tenets of the church of Rome. The people, however, found such a disparity between the two preachers, that the audience of Mollius increased, and Cornelius was forced to preach to empty benches.

Hereupon Cornelius wrote an account of his bad success to the pope, who immediately sent an order to apprehend Mollius, who was seized upon accordingly, and kept in close confinement. The bishop of Bononia sent him word, that he must recant, or be burnt; but he appealed to Rome, and was accordingly removed there.

Here he begged to have a public trial, but that the pope absolutely denied him, and commanded him to give an account of his opinions in writing, which he did under the following heads:

- |   |  |
|---|--|
| 1. Original sin.                            | 8. Mass.                                     |
| 2. Free-will.                               | 9. Auricular confession.                     |
| 3. The infallibility of the church of Rome. | 10. Prayers for the dead.                    |
| 4. The infallibility of the pope.           | 11. The host.                                |
| 5. Justification by faith.                  | 12. Prayers to saints.                       |
| 6. Purgatory.                               | 13. Going on pilgrimages.                    |
| 7. Transubstantiation.                      | 14. Extreme unction.                         |
|   | 15. Performing service in an unknown tongue. |

And all these he confirmed from scripture authority. The pope, upon this occasion, for political reasons, spared him for the present, but soon after, in 1553, had him apprehended, and put to death; he being first hanged, and his body burnt to ashes.

In 1554, Francis Gamba, a Lombard, of the Protestant persuasion, was apprehended, and condemned to death by the senate of Milan. At the place of execution, a monk presented a cross to him; to whom he said, My mind is so full of the real merits and goodness of Christ, that I want not a piece of senseless stick to put me in mind of him. For this expression his tongue was bored through, and he was afterwards committed to the flames.

In 1555, Algerius, a student in the university of Padua, and a man of great learning, having embraced the reformed religion, did all he could to convert others. For these proceedings he was accused of heresy to the pope, and being apprehended, was committed to the prison at Venice, where, being allowed the use of pen, ink, and paper, he wrote to his converts at Padua a celebrated epistle as follows:

L E T T E R

"DEAR FRIENDS,

"I Cannot omit this opportunity of letting you know the sincere pleasure I feel in my confinement; to suffer for Christ is delectable, indeed: to undergo a little transitory pain in this world, for his sake, is cheaply purchasing purchasing a reversion of eternal glory, in a life that is everlasting.

"Hence, I have found honey in the entrails of a lion; a paradise in a prison; tranquillity in the house of sorrow: where others weep, I rejoice; where others tremble and faint, I find strength and courage. The Almighty alone confers these favours on me; be his the glory and the praise.

"How different do I find myself from what I was before I embraced the truth in its purity; I was then dark, doubtful, and in dread; I am now enlightened, certain, and full of joy. He that was far from me is present with me; he comforts my spirit, heals my griefs, strengthens my mind, refreshes my heart, and fortifies my soul. Learn, therefore, how merciful and amiable the Lord is, who supports his servants under temptations, expels their sorrows, lightens their afflictions, and even visits them with his glorious presence, in the gloom of a dismal dungeon.

"Your sincere friend,

"ALGERIUS."

When the pope was informed of Algerius's great learning, and surprising natural abilities, he thought it would be of infinite service to the church of Rome, if he could induce him to forsake the Protestant cause. He, therefore, sent for him to Rome, and tried, by the most profane promises, to win him to his purpose. But finding his endeavours ineffectual, he ordered him to be burnt, which sentence was accordingly executed.

In 1559, John Alloysius, being sent from Geneva to preach in Calabria, was there apprehended as a Protestant, carried to Rome, and burnt by order of the pope; and James Bovellus was burnt at Messina for the same reason.

In 1560, pope Pius the Fourth ordered all the Protestants to be severely persecuted throughout the Italian states, when great numbers of every age, sex, and condition, suffered martyrdom. Concerning the cruelties practised upon this occasion, a learned and humane Roman-Catholic thus speaks of them, in a letter to a noble lord: "I cannot, my lord, forbear disclosing my sentiments, with respect to the persecution now carrying on: I think it cruel and unnecessary; I tremble at the manner of putting to death, as it resembles more the slaughter of calves and sheep, than the execution of human beings. I will relate to your lordship a dreadful scene, of which I was myself an eye-witness: seventy Protestants were cooped up in one filthy dungeon together; the executioner went in among them, picked out one from among the rest, blindfolded him, led him out to an open place before the prison, and cut his throat with the greatest composure. He then calmly walked into the prison again, bloody as he was, and with the knife in his hand selected another, and dispatched him in the same manner; and this, my lord, he repeated till the whole number were put to death. I leave it to your lordship's feelings to judge of my sensations upon the occasion; my tears now wash the paper upon which I give you the recital. Another thing I must mention, the patience with which they met death: they seemed all resignation and piety, fervently praying to God, and cheerfully encountering their fate. I cannot reflect without shuddering, how the executioner held the bloody knife between his teeth; what a dreadful figure he appeared, all covered with blood, and with what unconcern he executed his barbarous office."

There was a young Englishman at Rome, who happened to be one day passing by a church, when the procession of the host was just coming out. A bishop carried the host, which the young man perceiving, he snatched it from him, threw it upon the ground, and trampled it under his feet, crying out, Ye wretched idolaters, that neglect the true God to adore a morsel of bread. This action so provoked the people, that they would have torn him to pieces upon the spot; but the priests having persuaded them to let him abide by the sentence of the pope, they restrained their fury.

As soon as the affair was represented to the pope, he was so greatly exasperated that he ordered the prisoner to be burnt immediately; but a cardinal dissuaded him from this hasty sentence, saying, it was better to punish him by slow degrees, and to torture him, that they might find out if he had been instigated by any particular person to commit an act so atrocious.

This being approved, he was tortured with the most exemplary severity, notwithstanding which they could only get these words from him, "It was the will of God that I should do what I did."

Accordingly the pope passed this sentence upon him:

1. "That he should be led, naked to the middle, through the streets of Rome, by the executioner.
2. "That he should wear the image of the devil upon his head.
3. "That his breeches should be painted with the representation of flames.
4. "That he should have his right hand cut off.
5. "That after having been carried about thus in procession, he should be burnt."

Having heard his sentence pronounced, he implored God to give him strength and fortitude to go through it. As he passed through the streets he was greatly derided by the people, to whom he said some severe things respecting the Romish superstition. But a cardinal, who attended the procession, over-hearing him, ordered him to be gagged.

As soon as he came to the church door, where he trampled on the host, the hangman cut off his right hand, and fixed it on a pole. Then two tormentors, with flaming torches, scorched and burnt his flesh all the rest of the way. At the place of execution he kissed the chains that were to bind him to the stake. A monk presenting the figure of a saint to him, he struck it aside, and then being chained to the stake, fire was put to the faggots, and he was burnt to ashes in an instant.

Shortly after the last mentioned execution, a venerable old man, who had long been a prisoner in the inquisition, was condemned to be burnt, and brought out for execution. When he was fastened to the stake, a priest held a crucifix to him, on which he said, "If you do not take that idol from my sight, you will constrain me to spit upon it." The priest rebuked him for this with great severity; but he bade him remember the first and second commandments, and refrain from idolatry, as God himself had commanded. He was then gagged, that he should not speak any more, and fire being put to the faggots, he suffered martyrdom in the flames with great fortitude.

Summary of the PERSECUTIONS in the Marquisate of SALUCES.

IN 1561 the marquisate of Saluces, on the south side of the vallies of Piedmont, was principally inhabited by Protestants; when the marquis, who was proprietor of it, began a prosecution against them at the instigation of the then pope. He began by banishing the ministers, and if any of them refused to leave their flocks, they were sure to be imprisoned, and severely tortured; however, he did not proceed so far as to put any to death.

A little after the marquisate fell into the possession of the duke of Savoy, who sent circular letters to all the towns and villages, that he expected the people should all conform to go to mass.

Upon receiving this letter, the inhabitants of Saluces returned the following general epistle for answer.

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR HIGHNESS,

"WE humbly entreat your permission to continue in the practice of the religion which we have always professed, and which our fathers have professed before us. In this we shall acquit our consciences, without offending any; for we are sensible that our religion is founded on the Holy Scriptures, by whose precepts we are commanded not to injure our neighbours.

"We likewise implore your protection; for as Jews, infidels, and other enemies to Christ, are suffered to live in your dominions unmolested, we hope the same indulgence gence may be granted to Christians, whose very faith obliges them to be harmless, honest, inoffensive, and loyal.

"We remain your highness's respectful, obedient, and faithful subjects,

"THE PROTESTANT INHABITANTS OF THE MARQUISATE OF SALUCES."

This letter being read, the duke did not interrupt the Protestants for some time; but, at length, he sent them word, that they must either conform to go to mass, or leave his dominions in fifteen days. The Protestants, upon this unexpected edict, sent a deputy to the duke to obtain its revocation, or at least to have it moderated. But their remonstrances were in vain, and they were given to understand that the edict was peremptory.

There were some weak enough to go to mass, in order to avoid banishment, and preserve their property; others removed, with all their effects to different countries; and many neglected the time so long, that they were obliged to abandon all they were worth, and leave the marquise in haste. Those, who unhappily staid behind, were seized, plundered, and put to death without mercy.

A particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in the Vallies of PIEDMONT, in the Seventeenth Century.

WHEN pope Clement the Eighth sent missionaries into the vallies of Piedmont, to induce the Protestants to renounce their religion, these missionaries having erected monasteries in several parts of the vallies, became exceedingly troublesome to those of the reformed, where the monasteries appeared not only as fortresses to curb, but as sanctuaries for all such to fly to, as had injured them in any degree.

The Protestants petitioned the duke of Savoy against these missionaries, whose insolence and ill-usage were become intolerable; but instead of getting any redress, the interest of the missionaries so far prevailed, that the duke published a decree, in which he declared, that one witness should be sufficient in a court of law against a Protestant; and that any witness, who convicted a Protestant of any crime whatever should be entitled to an hundred crowns as a reward.

Upon the publication of a decree of this nature, it may be easily imagined, that many Protestants fell martyrs to perjury and avarice; for several villanous Papists would swear any thing against the Protestants for the sake of the reward, and then fly to their own priests for absolution from their false oaths. If any Roman-Catholic, of more conscience than the rest, blamed these fellows for their atrocious crimes, they themselves were in danger of being informed against, and punished as favourers of heresy, which they called Protestantism.

Now these missionaries did all they could to get the books of the Protestants into their power, in order to burn them; when the Protestants doing their utmost endeavours to conceal their books, the missionaries wrote to the duke of Savoy, who, for the heinous crime of not surrendering their bibles, prayer-books, and religious treatises, sent a number of troops to be quartered on them. These military gentry did great mischief in the houses of the Protestants, and destroyed such quantities of provisions, as occasioned the ruin of many families.

Now, to encourage, as much as possible, the apostacy of the Protestants, the duke of Savoy published a proclamation, wherein he said, "To encourage the heretics to turn Catholics, it is our will and pleasure, and we do hereby expressly command, that all such as shall embrace the holy Roman faith, shall enjoy an exemption from all and every tax for the space of five years, commencing from the day of their conversion." The duke of Savoy likewise established a court, called, The council for extirpating the heretics. This court was to enter into inquiries concerning the ancient privileges of the Protestant churches, and the decrees which had been, from time to time, made in favour of the Protestants. But the investigation of these things was carried on with the most manifest partiality; old charters were wrested to a wrong sense, and sophistry was used to pervert the meaning of every thing, which tended to favour the reformed.

These severities not seeming sufficient, the duke, soon after, published another edict, in which he strictly commanded, that no Protestant should act as a school-master, or tutor, either in public or private, or dare to teach any art, science, or language, directly or indirectly, to persons of any persuasion whatever.

Another, equally severe, immediately followed this edict, which decreed, that no Protestant should hold any place of profit, trust, or honour; and to wind up the whole, the certain token of an approaching persecution came forth in a final edict, by which it was positively ordered, that all Protestants should diligently attend mass.

The publication of an edict, containing such an injunction, may be compared to unfurling the bloody flag; for murder and rapine were certain to follow. One of the first objects that attracted the notice of the Papists, was Mr. Sebastian Bafan, a zealous Protestant, who was seized by the missionaries, confined, tormented for fifteen months, and then committed to the flames.

Before the persecution, the missionaries employed kidnappers to steal away the Protestants' children, that they might privately be brought up Roman-Catholics; but now they took away the children by open force, and if they met with any resistance, the wretched parents were immediately murdered.

The duke of Savoy, to give greater vigour to the persecution, called a general assembly of the Roman-Catholic nobility and gentry, when a solemn edict was published against the reformed, containing many heads, and including several reasons for extirpating the Protestants; among which the following were the principal.

For the preservation of the papal authority.

That the church livings may be all under one mode of government.

To make an union among all parties.

In honour of all the saints, and of the ceremonies of the church of Rome.

This severe edict was followed by a most cruel order, published on January 25, A. D. 1655, under the duke's sanction, by Andrew Gastaldo, doctor of civil laws. This order set forth, "That every head of a family, with the individuals of that family, of the reformed religion, of what rank, degree, or condition soever, none excepted, inhabiting and possessing estates in Lucerne, St. Giovanni, Bibiana, Campiglione, St. Secondo, Lucernetta, La Torre, Fenile, and Bricheraffio, should, within three days after the publication thereof, withdraw and depart, and be withdrawn out of the said places, and translated into the places and limits tolerated by his highness during his pleasure; particularly Bobbio, Angrogna, Villaro, Rorata, and the county of Bonetti.

"And all this to be done on pain of death, and confiscation of house and goods, unless within the limited time they turned Roman-Catholics."

Such a speedy flight, in the midst of winter, may be conceived as no agreeable task, especially in a country almost surrounded by mountains. The sudden order affected all, and things, which would have been scarcely noticed at another time, now appeared in the most conspicuous light. Women with child, or women just lain-in, were not objects of pity on this order for sudden removal, for all were included in the command; and it unfortunately happened, that the winter was remarkably rigorous and severe.

However, the Papists drove the people from their habitations at the time appointed, without even suffering them to have sufficient clothes to cover them; and many perished in the mountains through the severity of the weather, or for want of food. Some, however, who remained behind after the decree was published, met with the severest treatment, being murdered by the Popish inhabitants, or shot by the troops who were quartered in the vallies. A particular description of these cruelties is given in a letter, written by a Protestant, who was upon the spot, and who happily escaped the carnage.

carnage. "The army, says he, having got footing, became very numerous, by the addition of a multitude of the neighbouring Popish inhabitants, who finding we were the destined prey of the plunderers, fell upon us with an impetuous fury. Exclusive of the duke of Savoy's troops, and the Popish inhabitants, there were several regiments of French auxiliaries, some companies belonging to the Irish brigades, and several bands formed of outlaws, smugglers, and prisoners, who had been promised pardon and liberty in this world, and absolution in the next, for assisting to exterminate the Protestants from Piedmont.

"This armed multitude being encouraged by the Roman-Catholic bishops and monks, fell upon the Protestants in a most furious manner. Nothing now was to be seen but the face of horror and despair; blood stained the floors of the houses, dead bodies bestrewed the streets, groans and cries were heard from all parts. Some armed themselves, and skirmished with the troops; and many, with their families, fled to the mountains. In one village they cruelly tormented 150 women and children after the men were fled, beheading the women, and dashing out the brains of the children. In the towns of Villaro and Bobbio, most of those that refused to go to mass, who were upwards of fifteen years of age, they crucified with their heads downwards; and the greater number of those who were under that age were strangled."

A woman of sixty years of age, named Sarah Rastignole des Vignes, being seized by some soldiers, they ordered her to say a prayer to some saints; which she refusing, they thrust a sickle into her belly, ripped her up, and then cut her head off.

A handsome young woman, of the name of Martha Constantine, was treated with great indecency and cruelty by several of the troops, who first ravished, and then killed her, by cutting off her breasts. These they fried, and set before some of their comrades, who eat them without knowing what they were. When they had done eating, the others told them what they had made a meal of, in consequence of which a quarrel ensued, swords were drawn, and a battle took place. Several were killed in the fray, the greater part of whom were those concerned in the horrid massacre of the woman, and who had practised such an inhuman deception on their deluded comrades.

A man at Thrassinieré was seized by some of the soldiers, who ran the points of their swords through his ears, and through his feet. They then tore off the nails of his fingers and toes with red-hot pincers, tied him to the tail of an ass, and dragged him about the streets; and, finally, fastened a cord round his head, which they twisted with a stick in so violent a manner as to wring it from his body.

A Protestant, of about eighty years of age, named Peter Simonds, was tied neck and heels, and then thrown down a precipice. In the fall the branch of a tree caught hold of the ropes that fastened him, and suspended him in the mid-way, so that he languished for several days, and at length miserably perished of hunger.

One Elay Garcino, refusing to renounce his religion, was cut into small pieces; the soldiers, in ridicule, saying, they had minced him. A woman, named Armand, had every limb separated from each other, and then the respective parts were hung upon a hedge. Two old women were ripped open, and left in the fields upon the snow, where they perished; and a very old woman, who was deformed, had her nose and hands cut off, and was left in that manner to bleed to death.

There were several men, women, and children, flung from the rocks, and dashed to pieces. Magdalen Bertino, a Protestant woman of La Torre, was stripped stark naked, her head tied between her legs, and thrown down one of the precipices; and Mary Raymondet, of the same town, had her flesh sliced from her bones till she expired in the greatest agony.

Likewise Magdalen Pilot, of Villaro, was cut to pieces in the cave of Castolus; Ann Charboniere had one end of a stake thrust up her body; and the other end being fixed in the ground, she was left in that manner to perish; and Jacob Perrin the elder, of the church of Villaro, and David, his brother, were flayed alive.

Giovanni Andrea Michialin, an inhabitant of La Torre, was apprehended, with four of his children; three of them were hacked to pieces before him, the soldiers asking him, at the death of every child, if he would renounce his religion? which he constantly refused. One of the soldiers then took up the last and youngest by the legs, and putting the same question to the father, he replied as before, when the inhuman brute dashed out the child's brains. The father, however, at the same moment started from them, and fled: the soldiers fired after him, but missed him; and he, by the swiftness of his heels, escaped to the Alps, where he took refuge.

Account of the PERSECUTIONS in the Vallies of PIEDMONT, in the Seventeenth Century.

GIOVANNI PELANCHION, for refusing to turn Papist, was tied by one leg to the tail of a mule, and dragged through the streets of Lucerne, amidst the acclamations of an inhuman mob, who kept stoning him, and crying out, He is possessed with the Devil, so that neither stoning, nor dragging him through the streets, will kill him, for the Devil keeps him alive. They then took him to the river side, chopped off his head, and left that and his body unburied, upon the bank of the river.

The daughter of Peter Fontaine, a beautiful child of ten years of age, named Magdalene, was ravished and murdered by the soldiers. Another girl, of about the same age, they roasted alive at Villa Nova; and a poor woman, hearing the soldiers were coming towards her house, snatched up the cradle in which her infant son was asleep, and fled towards the woods. The soldiers, however, saw and pursued her, when she lightened herself by putting down the cradle and child, which the soldiers no sooner came to, than they murdered the infant, and continuing the pursuit, found the mother in a cave, where they first ravished, and then cut her to atoms.

Jacopo Michelino, chief elder of the church of Bobbio, and several other Protestants, were hung up by means of hooks fixed in their bellies, and left to expire in the most excruciating agony.

Likewise, Giovanni Rostagnal, a venerable Protestant, upwards of fourscore years of age, had his nose and ears cut off, and slices cut from the fleshy parts of his body, till he bled to death.

The following seven persons, Daniel Saleagio and his wife, Giovanni Durant, Lodwich Durant, Bartholomew Durant, Daniel Revel, and Paul Reynaud, had their mouths stuffed with gunpowder, which being set fire to, their heads were blown to pieces.

Also, Jacob Birone, a school-master of Rorata, for refusing to change his religion, was stripped quite naked; and after having been very indecently exposed, had the nails of his toes and fingers torn off with red hot pincers, and holes bored through his hands with the point of a dagger. He then had a cord tied round his middle, and was led through the streets with a soldier on each side of him. At every turning the soldier on his right-hand side cut a gash in his flesh, and the soldier on his left-hand side struck him with a bludgeon, both saying, at the same instant, Will you go to mass? Will you go to mass? He still replied in the negative to these interrogatories, and being at length taken to the bridge, they cut off his head on the balustrades, and threw both that and his body into the river.

A very pious Protestant, named Paul Garnier, had his eyes put out, was then flayed alive, and being divided into four parts, his quarters were placed on four of the principal houses of Lucerne. He bore all his sufferings with the most exemplary patience, praised God as long as he could speak, and plainly evinced, what confidence and resignation a good conscience can bestow.

Daniel Cardon, of Rocappiata, being apprehended by by some soldiers, they cut his head off, and having fried his brains, eat them. Two poor old blind women, of St. Giovanni, were burnt alive; and a widow of La Torre, with her daughter, were driven into the river, and stoned to death there.

There was one Paul Giles, who, on attempting to run away from some soldiers, was shot in the neck: they then slit his nose, sliced his chin, stabbed him, and gave his carcase to the dogs.

When some of the Irish troops had taken eleven men of Garcigliana prisoners, they made a furnace red-hot, and forced them to push each other in till they came to the last man, whom they themselves pushed in.

A man about ninety years of age, named Michael Gonet, was burnt to death; Baptista Oudri, another old man, was stabbed; and Bartholomew Franche had holes made in his heels, through which ropes being put, he was dragged by them to the gaol, where his wounds mortified, and accelerated his dissolution.

Magdalene de la Peire being pursued by some of the soldiers, and taken, was thrown down a precipice, and dashed to pieces. Margaret Revella, and Mary Pravillerin, two very old women, were burnt alive; and Michael Bellino, with Ann Bocharno, were decapitated.

Both the son and daughter of a counsellor of Giovanni, were rolled down a steep hill together, and suffered to perish in a deep pit at the bottom. A tradesman's family, consisting of himself, his wife, and an infant in arms, were cast from a rock, and dashed to pieces; and Joseph Chairet, and Paul Carniero, were flayed alive.

When Cypriania Bustia was asked if he would renounce his religion, and turn Roman-Catholic, he replied, I would rather renounce life, or turn dog: to which a priest answered, for that expression you shall both renounce life, and be given to the dogs. They, accordingly, dragged him to prison, where he continued a considerable time without food, till he was famished; after which they threw his corpse into the street before the prison, and it was devoured in a most shocking manner by dogs.

Joseph Pont was cut through the middle of his body; Margaret Soretta was stoned to death, and then thrown into the river; and Antonio Bertina had his head cleft asunder.

While Daniel Maria, and his whole family, were ill of a fever, several Papist ruffians broke into his house, telling him they were practical physicians, and would give them all present ease, which they did, by knocking the whole family on the head and murdering them.

There were three infant children of a Protestant, named Peter Fine, covered with snow, and stifled; an elderly widow, named Judith, was beheaded; and a beautiful young woman was stripped naked, and had a stake driven through her body, of which she died.

The wife of Peter Besson, named Lucy, a woman far gone in her pregnancy, who lived in one of the villages of the Piedmontese vallies, determined, if possible, to escape from such dreadful scenes as every where surrounded her: she, accordingly, took two young children, one in each hand, and set off towards the Alps. But on the third day of the journey she was taken in labour among the mountains, and delivered of an infant, who perished through the extreme inclemency of the weather, as did the other two children; for all three were found dead by her, and herself just expiring, by the person to whom she related the above circumstances.

One Francis Gros, the son of a clergyman, had his flesh slowly cut from his body into small pieces, and put into a dish before him: two of his children were minced before his sight; and his wife was fastened to a post, that she might behold all these cruelties practised on her husband and offspring. The tormentors, at length, being tired of exercising their cruelties, cut off the heads of both husband and wife, and then gave the flesh to the dogs of the whole family.

The sieur Thomas Margher fled to a cave, when the soldiers shut up the mouth, and he perished with famine. Judith Revelin, with seven children, were barbarously murdered in their beds; and a widow, of near fourscore years of age, was by soldiers hewn to pieces.

Jacob Roseno was ordered to pray to the saints, which he absolutely refused to do: some of the soldiers beat him violently with bludgeons to make him comply, but he still refusing, several of them fired at him, and lodged a great many balls in his body. As he was almost expiring they cried to him, Will you call upon the saints? Will you pray to the saints? To which he answered, No! No! No! when one of the soldiers, with a broad sword, clove his head asunder, and put an end to his sufferings in this world; but no doubt his integrity and fortitude has insured him everlasting happiness.

A soldier, attempting to ravish a young woman, named Susanna Giacquin, she made a stout resistance, and in the struggle, pushed him over a precipice, when he was dashed to pieces by the fall. His comrades, instead of admiring the virtue of the young woman, and applauding her for so nobly defending her chastity, fell upon her with their swords, and cut her to atoms.

A poor peasant of La Torre, named Giovanni Pullius, being apprehended as a Protestant by the soldiers, was ordered by the marquis of Pianezza, to be executed in a place near the convent. When he came to the gallows, several monks attended, and did all they could to persuade him to renounce his religion. But he told them, he never would embrace idolatry, and that he was happy in being thought worthy to suffer for the name of Christ. They then put him in mind of what his wife and children, who depended upon his labour, would suffer after his decease: to which he replied, I would have my wife and children, as well as myself, to consider their souls more than their bodies, and the next world before this; and with respect to the distress I may leave them in, God is merciful, and will provide for them while they are worthy of his protection. Finding the inflexibility of this poor man, the monks cried, Turn him off, turn him off: which the executioner did almost immediately, and the body being afterwards cut down, was flung into the river with indignity.

An elder of the church of Rossana, named Paul Clement, being apprehended by the monks of a neighbouring monastery, was carried to the market-place of that town, where some Protestants having just been executed by the soldiers, he was shewn the dead bodies, in order that the sight might intimidate him. On beholding the shocking objects, he said calmly, You may kill the body, but you cannot prejudice the soul of a true believer; but, with respect to the dreadful spectacles which you have here shewn me, you may rest assured, that God's vengeance will overtake the murderers of those poor people, and punish them for the innocent blood they have spilt. The monks were so exasperated at this reply, that they ordered him to be hung up directly; and while he was hanging, the soldiers amused themselves in standing at a distance, and shooting at the body as if it were a mark set up for sport.

Daniel Rambaut, of Villaro, the father of a numerous family, was apprehended, and, with several others, committed to prison, in the gaol of Payfana. Here he was visited by several priests, who, with continual importunities, did all they could to persuade him to renounce the Protestant religion, and turn Papist; but this he peremptorily refused, and the priests finding his resolution, pretended to pity his numerous family, and told him, that he might yet have his life, if he would subscribe to the belief of the Romish articles as follow:

1. "The real presence in the host.
2. "Transubstantiation.
3. "Purgatory.
4. "The pope's infallibility.
5. "That masses said for the dead will release souls from purgatory.
6. "That praying to saints will procure the remission of sins."

Hereupon Daniel Rambaut told the priests, that neither his religion, his understanding, or his conscience, would suffer him to subscribe to any of these proposed articles, for very sufficient reasons, viz.

1. "That to believe the real presence in the host, is a shocking union of both blasphemy and idolatry.
2. "That to fancy the words of consecration performs what the Papists call transubstantiation, by converting the wafer and wine into the real and identical body and blood of Christ, which was crucified, and which afterwards ascended into heaven, is too gross an absurdity for even a child to believe, who was come to the least glimmering of reason; and that nothing but the most blind superstition could make the Roman-Catholics put a confidence in any thing so completely ridiculous.

3. "That the doctrine of purgatory was more inconsistent and absurd than a fairy tale.

4. "That the pope's being infallible was an impossibility, and the pope arrogantly laid claim to what could belong to God only, as a perfect being.

5. "That saying masses for the dead was ridiculous, and only meant to keep up a belief in the fable of purgatory, as the fate of all is finally decided, on the departure of the soul from the body.

6. "That praying to saints for the remission of sins, is misplacing adoration; as the saints themselves have occasion for an intercessor in Christ. Therefore as God only can pardon our errors, we ought to sue to him alone for pardon."

So highly offended were the priests at M. Rambaut's answers to the articles to which they would have had him subscribe, that they determined to shake his resolution by the most cruel method imaginable: they ordered one joint of his fingers to be cut off every day, till all his fingers were gone: they then proceeded in the same manner with his toes; afterwards they alternately cut off, daily, a hand and a foot; but finding that he bore his sufferings with the most admirable patience, increased both in fortitude and resignation, and maintained his faith with steadfast resolution, and unshaken constancy, they stabbed him to the heart, and then gave his body to the dogs to be devoured.

A Protestant gentleman of considerable eminence, whose name was Peter Gabriola, being seized by a troop of soldiers, and refusing to renounce his religion, they hung a great number of little bags of gunpowder about his body, and then setting fire to them blew him up.

Anthony, the son of Samuel Catieris, a poor dumb lad, who was extremely inoffensive, was cut to pieces by a party of the troops; and soon after the same ruffians entered the house of Peter Moniriat, and cut off the legs of the whole family, leaving them to bleed to death, as they were unable to assist themselves, or help each other in that melancholy plight.

Daniel Benech being apprehended, had his nose slit, his ears cut off, and was then divided into quarters, each quarter being hung upon a tree; and Mary Moninohad her jaw bones broke, and was then left to languish till she was starved to death.

A handsome widow, named Mary Pelanchion, belonging to the town of Villaro, was seized by a party of the Irish brigades, who having beat her cruelly, and ravished her, dragged her to a high bridge which crossed the river, and stripped her naked in a most indecent manner; hung her by the legs to the bridge, with her head downwards towards the water, and then going into boats, they fired at her till she died.

Also, Mary Nigrino, and her daughter, who was an idiot, were cut to pieces in the woods, and their bodies left to be devoured by wild beasts: Susanna Bales, a widow of Villaro, was immured till she perished through hunger; and Susanna Calvio, running away from some soldiers, and hiding herself in a barn, they set fire to the straw, by which she was burnt to death.

A child named Daniel Bertino was burnt; Paul Armand was hacked to pieces; Daniel Michialino had his tongue plucked out, and was left to perish in that condition; and Andreo Bertino, a very old man, who was lame, was mangled in a most shocking manner, and at length had his belly ripped open and his bowels carried about on the point of a halbert.

A Protestant lady, whose name was Constantia Bellione, being apprehended on account of her faith, was asked by a priest if she would renounce the Devil and go to mass; to which she replied, "I was brought up in a religion, by which I was always taught to renounce the Devil; but should I comply with your desire, and go to mass, I should be sure to meet him there in a variety of shapes." The priest was highly incensed at what she said, and told her to recant, or she should suffer cruelly. The lady, however, boldly answered, that she valued not any sufferings he could inflict, and in spite of all the torments he could invent, she would keep her conscience pure and her faith inviolate. The priest then ordered slices of her flesh to be cut off from several parts of her body, which cruelty she bore with the most singular patience, only saying to the priest, what horrid and lasting torments will you suffer in hell, for the trifling and temporary pains which I now endure. Exasperated at this expression, and willing to stop her tongue, the priest ordered a file of musqueteers to draw up and fire upon her, by which she was soon dispatched, and sealed her martyrdom with her blood.

Judith Mandon, a young woman, for refusing to change her religion and embrace Popery, was fastened to a stake, and sticks thrown at her from a distance, in the very same manner as that barbarous custom which was formerly practised on Shrove-Tuesday of shying at cocks as it was termed. By this inhuman proceeding, her limbs were beat and mangled in a most terrible manner, and at last one of the bludgeons dashed the poor creature's brains out.

Paul Genre and David Paglia, attempting to escape to the Alps, with each his son, were pursued and overtaken by the soldiers in a large plain. Here they hunted them for their diversion, goading them with their swords, and making them run about till they dropped down with fatigue. When they found that their spirits were quite exhausted, and that they could not afford them any more barbarous sport, by running, the soldiers hacked them to pieces, and left their mangled bodies on the spot.

Michael Greve, a young man of Bobbio, was apprehended in the town of La Torre, and being led to the bridge, was thrown over into the river. As he could swim very well, he swam down the stream, thinking to escape, but the soldiers and mob followed on both sides the river, and kept stoning him, till receiving a blow on one of his temples, he was stunned, and consequently sunk and was drowned.

One David Armand was ordered to lay his head down on a block, when a soldier, with a large hammer, beat out his brains. David Baridona being apprehended at Villaro, was carried to La Torre, where refusing to renounce his religion, he was tormented by means of brimstone matches being tied between his fingers and toes, and set fire to, and afterwards, by having his flesh plucked off with red hot pincers, till he expired; and Giovanni Barolina, with his wife, were thrown into a pool of stagnant water, and compelled, by means of pitch-forks and stones, to duck down their heads till they were suffocated with the stench.

Several soldiers went to the house of Joseph Garniero, and before they entered, fired in at the window, to give notice of their approach. A musquet ball entered one of Mrs. Garniero's breasts, as she was suckling an infant with the other. On finding their intentions, she begged hard that they would spare the life of the infant, which they promised to do, and sent it immediately to a Roman-Catholic nurse. They then took the husband and hanged him at his own door, and having shot the wife through the head, they left her body weltering in it's blood, and her husband hanging on the gallows they erected.

An elderly man, named Isaiah Mondon, and a pious Protestant, fled from the merciless persecutors to a cleft in a rock, where he suffered the most dreadful hardships; for, in the midst of the winter, he was forced to lay on the bare stone, without any covering; his food was the roots he could scratch up near his miserable habitation; and the only way by which he could procure drink, was to put snow in his mouth till it melted. Here, however, some of the inhuman soldiers found him, and after having beaten him unmercifully, they drove him towards Lucerne, goading him with the points of their swords. Being exceedingly weakened by his manner of living, and his spirits exhausted by the blows he had received, he fell down in the road. They again beat him to make him proceed; when, on his knees, he implored them to put him out of his misery, by dispatching him. This they at last agreed to do; and one of them stepping up to him, shot him through the head with a pistol, saying, "There, heretic, take thy request."

A worthy Protestant, of the name of Mary Revel, received a shot in her back, as she was walking along the street. She dropped down with the wound, but recovering sufficient strength, she raised herself upon her knees, and lifting her hands towards heaven, prayed in a most fervent manner to the Almighty; when a number of soldiers, who were near at hand, fired a whole volley of shot at her, many of which took place, and in an instant put an end to her miseries.

A number of men, women, and children, secreted themselves in a large cave, where they continued for some weeks in safety. It was the custom for two of the men to go when it was necessary, and by stealth procure provisions. These were, however, one day watched, by which the cave was discovered, and, soon after, a troop of Roman-Catholics appeared before it. The Papists that assembled upon this occasion were neighbours, and intimate acquaintances of the Protestants in the cave; and some of them were even related to each other. The Protestants, therefore, came out, and implored them, by the ties of hospitality, by the ties of blood, and as old acquaintances and neighbours, not to murder them. But superstition overcomes every sensation of nature and humanity; so that the Papists, blinded by bigotry, told them, they could not shew any mercy to heretics, and, therefore, bad them all prepare to die. Hearing this, and knowing the fatal obstinacy of the Roman-Catholics, the Protestants all fell prostrate, lifted their hands and hearts to heaven, prayed with great sincerity and fervency, and then bowing down, put their faces close to the ground, and patiently awaited their fate, which was soon decided, for the Papists fell upon them with unremitting fury, and having cut them to pieces, committed to the cave their mangled bodies and limbs.

As Giovanni Salvagiot was passing by a Roman-Catholic church, for not taking off his hat, he was followed by some of the congregation, who fell upon and murdered him; and Jacob Barrel and his wife, having been taken prisoners by the earl of St. Secondo, one of the duke of Savoy's officers, he delivered them up to the soldiery, who cut off the woman's breasts, and the man's nose, and then shot both through the head.

A Protestant, named Anthony Guiguo, of a wavering disposition, went to Periero, with an intent to renounce his religion, and embrace Popery. This design he communicated to some priests, who highly commended it, and a day was fixed upon for his public recantation. In the mean time, Anthony grew fully sensible of his perfidy, and his conscience tormented him so much, night and day, that he determined not to recant, but to make his escape. This he effected, but being soon missed and pursued, he was taken. The troops on the way did all they could to bring him back to his design of recantation; but finding their endeavours ineffectual, they beat him violently on the road, when coming near a precipice, he took an opportunity of leaping down it, and was dashed to piece-meal.

A Protestant, who was a gentleman of considerable fortune at Bobbio, being highly provoked by the insolence of a priest, retorted with great severity; and, among other things, said, that the pope was Antichrist, mass idolatry, purgatory a farce, and absolution a cheat. To be revenged, the priest hired five desperate ruffians, who, the same evening, broke into the gentleman's house, and seized upon him in a violent manner. The gentleman was terribly frightened, fell on his knees, and implored mercy; but the desperate ruffians, without the least hesitation, dispatched him.

nearly depopulated most of the towns and villages. One place only had not been assaulted, and that was owing to the difficulty of approaching it: this was the little commonality of Roras, which was situated upon an eminence.

When the work of blood grew slack in other places, the earl of Christople, one of the duke of Savoy's officers, determined, if possible, to make himself master of it; and, with that view, detached three hundred men to surprise it unawares.

However, the inhabitants of Roras had intelligence of the approach of these troops, when captain Joshua Gianavel, a brave Protestant officer, put himself at the head of a small body of the citizens, and waited in ambuscade, to attack the enemy in a narrow passage.

As soon as the troops appeared, and had entered the passage, which was the only place by which the town could be approached, the Protestants kept up a smart and well directed fire against them, and still kept themselves concealed behind bushes from the sight of the enemy. A great number of the soldiers were killed, and the remainder receiving a continual fire, and not seeing any to whom they might return it, thought proper to make a precipitate retreat.

Whereupon the members of this little community sent a memorial to the marquis of Pianessa, one of the duke's general officers, setting forth, "That they were sorry, upon any occasion, to be under the necessity of taking up arms; but that the secret approach of a body of troops, without any reason assigned, or any previous notice sent of the purpose of their coming, had greatly alarmed them; that as it was their custom never to suffer any of the military to enter their little community, they had repelled force by force, and should do so again; but in all other respects, they professed themselves dutiful, obedient, and loyal subjects to their sovereign, the duke of Savoy."

Now the marquis of Pianessa, that he might have the better opportunity of deluding and surprising the Protestants of Roras, sent them word in answer, "That he was perfectly satisfied with their behaviour, for they had done right, and even rendered a service to their country, as the men who had attempted to pass the defile were not his troops, or sent by him, but a band of desperate robbers, who had, for some time, infested those parts, and been a terror to the neighbouring country." To give a greater colour to his treachery, he then published the following proclamation.

"To the Inhabitants of all the Towns, Villages, Hamlets, &c. in Piedmont, and the Appendages thereunto belonging; and to the united Troops belonging to, or in the Pay of, his Highness the Duke of Savoy, greeting:

"WHEREAS the inhabitants of Roras have bravely and loyally routed, killed, or expelled, a band of bloody robbers, and desperate outlaws, and thereby rendered an essential service to the country in general. Be it, therefore, known, that all persons are strictly ordered and commanded, in the duke's name, not to injure, molest, or disturb any of the inhabitants of Roras, but to do them every possible service, in return for the benefit which the state hath received from them.

"PIANESSA.

"Given at the Camp near Villaro."

However, the very day after this plausible proclamation, and specious conduct, the marquis sent 500 men to possess themselves of Roras, while the people, as he thought, were lulled into perfect security, by his dissimulation.

But Captain Gianavel was not to be deceived so easily: he, therefore, laid an ambuscade for this body of troops, as he had for the former, and compelled them to retire with a loss very considerable.

The marquis Pianessa, though foiled in these two attempts, determined on a third, which should be still more formidable; but first he imprudently published another proclamation, disowning any knowledge of the second attempt.

Shortly

AN HISTORICAL SKETCH of the PIEDMONTESE WAR.

THE massacres and murders already mentioned to have been committed in the vallies of Piedmont,

Shortly after, 700 chosen men were sent upon the expedition, who, in spite of the fire from the Protestants, forced the defile, entered Roras, and began to murder every person they met with, without distinction of sex or age. The Protestant captain Gianavel, at the head of a small body, though he had lost the defile, determined to dispute their passage through a fortified pass, that led to the richest and best part of the town. Here he was successful, by keeping up a continual fire, and by means of his men being all complete marksmen. The Roman-Catholic commander was greatly staggered at this opposition, as he imagined that he had surmounted all difficulties. He, however, did his endeavours to force the pass, but being able to bring up only twelve men in front at a time, and the Protestants being secured by a breast-work, he found he should be baffled by the handful of men who made the opposition.

Provoked at the loss of so many of his troops, and fearful of disgrace if he persisted in attempting what appeared so impracticable, he thought it the wisest thing to retreat. Unwilling, however, to withdraw his men by the defile at which he had entered, on account of the difficulty and danger of the enterprize, he designed to retreat towards Villaro, by another pass called Piampra, which, though hard of access, was easy of descent. But in this he met with a disappointment, for captain Gianavel having posted his little band here, greatly annoyed the troops as they passed, and even pursued their rear till they entered the open country.

Hereupon the marquis of Pianessa, finding that all his attempts were frustrated, and that every artifice he used was only an alarm-signal to the inhabitants of Roras, resolved to act openly, and therefore proclaimed, that ample rewards should be given to any one who would bear arms against the obdurate heretics of Roras, as he called them; and that any officer, who would exterminate them, should be considerably rewarded.

This stimulated captain Mario, a bigoted Roman-Catholic, and a desperate ruffian, to undertake the enterprize. He, therefore, obtained leave to raise a regiment in the following six towns: Lucerne, Borges, Famolas, Bobbio, Cavo, and Bagnal.

When he had completed his regiment, which consisted of 1000 men, he laid his plan not to go by the defiles, or the passes, but to attempt gaining the summit of a rock, from whence he imagined he could pour his men into the town, without much opposition or difficulty.

Now the Protestants suffered the Roman-Catholic troops to gain almost the summit of the rock, without giving them any opposition, or ever appearing in their fight: but when they had almost reached the top, they made a most furious attack upon them; one party keeping up a well-directed and constant fire, and another party rolling down stones of a great weight.

By this means the career of the Papist troops was stopped: many were killed by the musquetry, and more by the stones, which beat them down the precipices. Several fell sacrifices to their hurry, for by attempting a precipitate retreat, they fell down, and were dashed to pieces; and captain Mario himself narrowly escaped with life, for he fell from a craggy place into a river which washed the foot of the rock. He was taken up senseless, but afterwards recovered, though he was ill of the bruises for a long time; and, at length, fell into a decline at Lucerne, where he expired.

There was another body of troops ordered from the camp at Villaro, to make an attempt upon Roras; but these were likewise defeated, by means of the Protestants ambushing, and compelled to retreat again to the camp at Villaro.

Captain Gianavel, after each of these signal victories, made a suitable discourse to his men, causing them to kneel down, and return thanks to the Almighty for his providential protection; and usually concluded with the 11th psalm, where the subject is, placing confidence in the Creator.

Still the marquis of Pianessa, greatly enraged at being so much baffled by the few inhabitants of Roras, determined, at all events, to attempt their expulsion, in such a manner as could hardly fail of succeeding.

For this purpose he ordered all the Roman-Catholic militia of Piedmont to be raised and disciplined. When these orders were completed, he joined to the militia eight thousand regular troops, and dividing the whole into three distinct bodies, he designed, that three formidable attacks should be made at the same time, unless the people of Roras, to whom he sent an account of his great preparations, would comply with his conditions, which were as follow:

1. "To ask pardon for taking up arms.
2. "To pay the expences of all the expeditions sent against them.
3. "To acknowledge the infallibility of the pope.
4. "To go to mass.
5. "To pray to the saints.
6. "To wear beards.
7. "To deliver up their ministers.
8. "To deliver up their school-masters.
9. "To go to confession.
10. "To pay loans for the delivery of souls from purgatory.
11. "To give up captain Gianavel at discretion.
12. "To give up the elders of their church at discretion."

But the inhabitants of Roras, on being acquainted with these conditions, were filled with an honest indignation; and, in answer, sent word to the marquis, that sooner than comply with them they would suffer three things, which, of all others, were the most obnoxious to mankind, namely,

1. "Their estates to be seized.
2. "Their houses to be burnt.
3. "Themselves to be murdered.

Enraged at this message, the marquis sent them the following laconic letter.

"To the obstinate HERETICS inhabiting RORAS.

"YOU shall have your request, for the troops sent against you have strict injunctions to plunder, burn, and kill.

"PIANESSA."

Hereupon the three armies were put into motion, and the attacks ordered to be made thus: the first by the rocks of Villaro; the second by the pass of Bagnol; and the third by the defile of Lucerne.

By the superiority of numbers, the troops forced their way, and having gained the rocks, pass, and defile, began to make the most horrid depredations, and exercise the greatest cruelties. Men they hanged, burnt, racked to death, or cut to pieces; women they ripped open, crucified, drowned, or threw from the precipices; and children they tossed upon spears, minced, cut their throats, or dashed out their brains. On the first day of their gaining the town, one hundred and twenty-six suffered in this manner.

Pursuant to the marquis of Pianessa's orders, they likewise plundered the estates, and burnt the houses of the people. Several Protestants, however, made their escape, under the conduct of captain Gianavel, whose wife and children were unfortunately made prisoners, and sent to Turin under a strong guard.

Upon this the marquis of Pianessa wrote a letter to captain Gianavel, and released a Protestant prisoner, that he might carry it him. The contents were, that if the captain would embrace the Roman-Catholic religion, he should be indemnified for all his losses since the commencement of the war; his wife and children should be immediately released, and himself honourably promoted in the duke of Savoy's army; but if he refused to accede to the proposals made to him, his wife and children should be put to death; and so large a reward should be given to take him, dead or alive, that even some of his own confidential friends should, from the greatness of the sum, be tempted to betray him.

The following answer to this epistle was sent by the brave Gianavel.

"MY LORD MARQUIS,

"THERE is no torment so great, or death so cruel, but what I would prefer to the abjuration of my religion:

gion : so that promises lose their effects, and menaces only strengthen me in my faith.

" With respect to my wife and children, my lord, nothing can be more afflicting to me than the thoughts of their confinement, or more dreadful to my imagination, than their suffering a violent and cruel death. I keenly feel all the tender sensations of husband and parent ; my heart is replete with every sentiment of humanity ; I would suffer any torment to rescue them from danger ; I would die to preserve them.

" But having said thus much, my lord, I assure you that the purchase of their lives must not be the price of my salvation. You have them in your power it is true ; but my consolation is, that your power is only a temporary authority over their bodies : you may destroy the mortal part, but their immortal souls are out of your reach, and will live hereafter, to bear testimony against you for your cruelties. I therefore recommend them and myself to God, and pray for a reformation in your heart.

" JOSHUA GIANAVEL."

When this brave Protestant officer had written the above letter, he retired to the Alps, with his followers ; and being joined by a great number of other fugitive Protestants, he harassed the enemy by continual engagements.

One day meeting with a body of Papist troops, near Bibiana, he, though inferior in numbers, attacked them with great fury, and put them to the rout without the loss of a man, though himself was shot through the leg in the engagement, by a soldier who had hid himself behind a tree ; but Gianavel perceiving from whence the shot came, pointed his gun to the place, and dispatched the person who had given the wound.

Now captain Gianavel hearing that a captain Jahier had collected together a considerable body of Protestants, wrote him a letter, proposing a junction of their forces. Captain Jahier immediately agreed to the proposal, and marched directly to meet Gianavel.

When the junction was formed, it was proposed to attack a town (inhabited by Roman-Catholics) called Garcigliana. The assault was given with great spirit, but a reinforcement of horse and foot having lately entered the town, which the Protestants knew nothing of, they were repulsed : yet made a masterly retreat, and only lost one man in the skirmish.

The next attempt of the Protestant forces was upon St. Secondo, which they attacked with great vigour, but met with a strong resistance from the Roman-Catholic troops, who had fortified the streets, and planted themselves in the houses, from whence they poured musquet-balls in prodigious numbers. The Protestants, however, advanced, under cover of a great number of planks, which some held over their heads, to secure them from the shot of the enemy from the houses, while others kept up a well-directed fire ; so that the houses and intrenchments were soon forced, and the town taken without much difficulty.

They found a prodigious quantity of plunder in the town, which had been taken from the Protestants at various times, and different places, and which were stored up in the warehouses, churches, dwelling-houses, &c. This they removed to a place of safety, to be distributed among the sufferers with as much justice as possible.

With such skill and spirit this successful attack was made, that it cost very little to the conquering party ; the Protestants having only 17 killed, and 26 wounded ; while the Papists suffered a loss of no less than 450 killed, and 511 wounded.

Now the following five Protestant officers, Gianavel, Jahier, Laurentio, Genoet, and Benet, laid a plan to surprise Briqueras. To this end they marched in five respective bodies, and, by agreement, were to make the attack at the same time. The captains Jahier and Laurentio passed through two defiles in the woods, and came to the place in safety, under cover ; but the other three bodies made their approaches through an open country, and, consequently, were more exposed to an attack.

As soon as the Roman-Catholics took the alarm, a great number of troops were sent to relieve Briqueras, from Cavors, Bibiana, Fenile, Campiglione, and some other neighbouring places. When these were united, they determined to attack the three Protestant parties, that were marching through the open country.

When the Protestant officers perceived the intent of the enemy, not being at a great distance from each other, they joined their forces with the utmost expedition, and formed themselves in order of battle.

The captains Jahier and Laurentio had, in the mean time, assaulted the town of Briqueras, and burnt all the out-houses, to make their approaches with the greater ease ; but not being supported as they expected by the other three Protestant captains, they sent a messenger, on a swift horse, towards the open country, to inquire the reason of such neglect.

In a short time the messenger returned, and informed them that it was not in the power of the three Protestant captains to support their proceedings, as they were themselves attacked by a very superior force in the plain, and could scarce sustain the unequal engagement.

On receiving this intelligence, the captains Jahier and Laurentio determined to discontinue the assault on Briqueras, and to proceed, with all possible expedition, to the relief of their friends on the plain. This design proved to be of the most essential service, for just as they arrived at the spot where the two armies were engaged, the Papist troops began to prevail, and were on the point of flanking the wing, commanded by captain Gianavel. The arrival of these troops turned the scale in favour of the Protestants ; and the Papist forces, though they fought with a most obstinate intrepidity, were totally defeated. A great number were killed and wounded on both sides, and very considerable baggage, military stores, &c. were taken by the Protestants.

Now captain Gianavel, having information that three hundred of the enemy were to convoy a great quantity of stores, provisions, &c. from La Torre to the castle of Mirabac, determined to attack them on the way. He, accordingly, began the assault at Malbec, though with a very inadequate force. The contest was long and bloody, but the Protestants, at length, were obliged to yield to the superiority of numbers, and compelled to make a retreat, which they did with great regularity, and no considerable loss.

Captain Gianavel advanced to an advantageous post, situated near the town of Villaro, and then sent the following information and commands to the people thereof.

1. " That he should attack the town in twenty-four hours.
2. " That with respect to the Roman-Catholics who had borne arms, whether they belonged to the army or not, he should act by the law of retaliation, and put them to death, for the numerous depredations, and many cruel murders, they had committed.
3. " That all women and children, whatever their religion might be, should be safe.
4. " That he commanded all male Protestants to leave the town, and join him.
5. " That all apostates, who had, through weakness, abjured their religion, should be deemed enemies, unless they renounced their abjuration.
6. " That all who returned to their duty to God, and themselves, should be received as friends."

The majority of Protestants immediately left the town, and joined captain Gianavel with great satisfaction, and the few, who through weakness or fear had abjured their faith, recanted their abjuration, and were received into the bosom of the church. As the marquis of Pianessa had removed the army, and encamped in quite a different part of the country, the Roman-Catholics in Villaro thought it would be folly to pretend to defend the place with the small force they had. They, therefore, fled with the utmost precipitation, leaving the town, and most of their property, to the discretion of the Protestant invaders.

Now when the Protestant commanders had called a council council of war, they resolved to make an attempt upon the town of La Torre, for the four following reasons :

1. " Because it was a place of great importance.
2. " Because it contained a great quantity of military stores and provisions.
3. " Because the inhabitants had been some of the most rigid of all the persecutors of the Protestants.
4. " Because it was garrisoned by troops drafted from the Irish brigades, who were the most cruel of all the troops to the Protestants whom they took prisoners."

As soon as the Papists were apprized of the design, they detached some troops to defend a defile, through which the Protestants must make their approach ; but these were defeated, compelled to abandon the pass, and forced to retreat to La Torre.

Now the Protestants proceeded on their march, and the troops of La Torre, on their near approach, made a furious sally, but were repulsed with great loss, and compelled to seek shelter in the town. The governor, it seems, only thought of defending the place, which the Protestants began to attack in form ; but after many brave attempts, and furious assaults, the commanders determined to abandon the enterprize for several reasons, particularly, because they found the place itself too strong, their own number too weak, and their cannon not adequate to the task of battering down the walls thereof.

When this resolution was taken, the Protestant commanders began a masterly retreat, and conducted it with such regularity, that the enemy did not chuse to pursue them, or molest their rear, which they might have done, as they passed the defiles.

On the next day they mustered, reviewed the army, and found the whole to amount to four hundred and ninety-five men. They then held a council of war, and planned an easier enterprize : this was to make an attack upon the commonalty of Crusol, a place inhabited by a number of the most bigoted Roman-Catholics, and who had exercised the most unheard-of cruelties on the Protestants during the persecutions.

The inhabitants of Crusol, hearing of the design against them, fled to a neighbouring fortress, situated on a rock, where the Protestants could not come at them, for a very few men could render it inaccessible to a numerous army. Thus they secured their persons, but were in too much hurry to secure their property, the principal part of which, indeed, had been plundered from the Protestants, and now luckily fell again to the possession of the right owners. It consisted of many rich and valuable articles, and what, at that time, was of much more consequence, viz. A great quantity of military stores, four hundred head of cattle, six hundred sheep and goats, a greater number of cheeses, many sacks of flour, good store of raisins, and several butts of wine.

The day after the Protestants were gone with their booty, eight hundred troops arrived to the assistance of the people of Crusol, having been dispatched from Lucerne, Briqueras, Cavors, &c. But finding themselves too late, and that a pursuit would be in vain, not to return empty handed, they began to plunder the neighbouring villages, though what they took was from their friends. After collecting a tolerable booty, they began to divide it, but disagreeing about the different shares, they fell from words to blows, plundered each other, and thus did a great deal of mischief to themselves.

Likewise, on the very same day in which the Protestants were so successful at Crusol, some Papists marched with a design to plunder and burn the little Protestant village of Rocappiatta, but by the way they met with the Protestant forces belonging to the captains Jahier and Laurentio, who were posted on the hill of Angrognia. A trivial engagement ensued, for the Roman-Catholics, on the very first attack, retreated in great confusion, and were pursued with much slaughter. After the pursuit was over, some of the straggling Papist troops meeting with a poor peasant, who was a Protestant, tied a cord round his head, and strained it till his skull was quite crushed.

The captains Gianavel and Jahier now concerted a design together, to make an attack upon Lucerne ; but captain Jahier not bringing his forces at the time appointed, captain Gianavel determined to attempt the enterprize alone.

Accordingly, by a forced march, he proceeded towards that place during the whole night, and was close to it by break of day. His first care was to cut the pipes that conveyed water into the town, and then to break down the bridge, by which alone provisions from the country could be conveyed.

Captain Gianavel then assaulted the place, and speedily possessed himself of two of the out-ports ; but finding he could not make himself master of the place, he prudently retreated with very little loss, blaming, however, captain Jahier, for the failure of the enterprize.

As soon as the Papists were informed that captain Gianavel was at Angrognia, with only his own company, they determined, if possible, to surprise him. With this view, a great number of troops were detached from La Torre, and other places : one party of these got on the top of a mountain, beneath which he was posted ; and the other party intended to possess themselves of the gate of St. Bartholomew.

Now the Papists thought themselves sure of taking captain Gianavel and every one of his men, as they consisted but of three hundred, and their own force was two thousand five hundred. Their design, however, was providentially frustrated, for one of the Popish soldiers imprudently blowing a trumpet before the signal for attack was given, captain Gianavel took the alarm, and posted his little company so advantageously at the gate of St. Bartholomew, and at the defile by which the enemy must descend from the mountains, that the Roman-Catholic troops failed in both attacks, and were repulsed with a loss very considerable.

Immediately after, captain Jahier came to Angrognia, and joined his forces to those of captain Gianavel, giving sufficient reasons to excuse his already-mentioned failure. Captain Jahier now made several secret excursions with great success, selecting always some of the most active troops, belonging both to Gianavel and himself. One day he had put himself at the head of only forty-four men, to proceed upon an expedition, when entering a plain near Offac, he was suddenly surrounded by a large body of horse. Captain Jahier, and his men, fought desperately, though oppressed by odds, and killed the commander in chief, three captains, and fifty-seven private men, of the enemy. But captain Jahier himself being killed, with thirty-five of his men, the rest surrendered. One of the soldiers cut off captain Jahier's head, and carrying it to Turin, presented it to the duke of Savoy, who gave him six hundred ducatoons as a reward.

The much lamented death of this gentleman was a signal loss to the Protestants, as he was a real friend to, and champion of, the reformed church. He possessed a most undaunted spirit, so that no difficulties could deter him from undertaking an enterprize, or dangers terrify him in its execution. He was pious without affectation, and humane without weakness ; bold in the field, meek in a domestic life, of a penetrating genius, active in spirit, and in all his undertakings resolute.

To complete the affliction of the Protestants, captain Gianavel was, soon after, wounded in such a manner that he was obliged to keep his bed. They, however, took new courage from misfortunes, and determining not to let their spirits droop, attacked a body of Popish troops with great intrepidity ; the Protestants were much inferior in numbers, but fought with more resolution than the Papists, and at length routed them, with considerable slaughter. During the action, a serjeant, named Michael Bertino, was killed ; when his son, who was close behind him, leaped into his place, and said, " I have lost my father ; but courage, fellow-soldiers, God is a father to us all."

There were several other skirmishes between the troops of La Torre and Tagliaretto, and the Protestant forces, which in general terminated in favour of the latter.

Andrion, a Protestant gentleman, raised a regiment of horse, and took the command of it himself. The sieur John Leger persuaded a great number of Protestants to form themselves into volunteer companies ; and an excellent officer, named Michelin, instituted several bands of light troops. These being all joined to the the remains of the veteran Protestant troops (for great numbers had been lost in the various battles, skirmishes, sieges, &c.) composed a respectable army, which the officers thought proper to encamp near St. Giovanni.

Alarmed at the formidable appearance, and increased strength of the Protestant forces, the Roman-Catholic commanders, determined, if possible, to dislodge them from their encampment. With this view they collected together a large force, consisting of the principal part of the garrisons of the Roman-Catholic towns, the draft from the Irish brigades, a great number of regulars sent by the marquis of Pianessa, the auxiliary troops, and the independent companies.

When these had formed a junction, they encamped near the Protestants, and spent several days in calling councils of war, and disputing on the most proper mode of proceeding. Some were for plundering the country, in order to draw the Protestants from their camp; others were for patiently waiting till they were attacked; and a third party were for assaulting the Protestant camp, and trying to make themselves masters of every thing therein.

The last of them prevailed, and the morning after the resolution had been taken was appointed to put it into execution. The Roman Catholic troops were accordingly separated into four divisions, three of which were to make an attack in different places; and the fourth to remain as a body of reserve to act as occasion might demand.

Previous to the attack, one of the Roman-Catholic officers harangued his men in the following manner.

"Fellow soldiers, you are now going to enter upon a great action, which will bring you fame and riches. The motives for your acting with spirit are likewise of the most important nature; namely, the honour of shewing your loyalty to your sovereign, the pleasure of spilling heretic blood, and the prospect of plundering the Protestant camp. So, my brave fellows, fall on, give no quarter, kill all you meet, and take all you come near."

When this inhuman speech was made, the engagement began, and the Protestant camp was attacked in three places with inconceivable fury. The fight was maintained with great obstinacy and perseverance on both sides, continuing without intermission for the space of four hours; for the several companies on both sides relieved each other alternately, and by that means kept up a continual fire during the whole engagement.

In the mean time a detachment was sent from the body of reserve to attack the post of Castelas, which, if the Papists had carried, it would have given them the command of the vallies of Perofa, St. Martino, and Lucerne; but they were repulsed with great loss, and compelled to return to the body of reserve, from whence they had been detached.

In a short time after the return of this detachment, the Roman-Catholic troops, being hard pressed in the main battle, sent for the body of reserve to come to their support. These immediately marched to their assistance, and for some time longer held the event doubtful, but at length the valour of the Protestants prevailed, and the Papists were totally defeated, with the loss of upwards of three hundred men killed, and many more wounded.

As soon as the syndic of Lucerne, who was indeed a Papist, but not a superstitious one, saw the great number of wounded men brought into that city, he exclaimed, Ah! I thought the wolves used to devour the heretics, but now I see the heretics eat the wolves. This expression being reported to M. Marolles, the Roman-Catholic commander in chief at Lucerne, he sent a very severe and threatening letter to the syndic, who was so terrified, that the fright threw him into a fever, and he died in a few days after he received it.

This memorable battle was fought just before the harvest was got in; when the Papists, exasperated at their disgrace, and resolved on any kind of revenge, spread themselves by night in detached parties over the finest corn fields of the Protestants, and set them on fire in sundry places. Some of these straggling parties, however, suffered for their conduct; for the Protestants, being alarmed in the night by the blazing of the fire among the corn, pursued the fugitives early in the morning, and overtaking many put them to death. The Protestant captain Bellin, likewise, by way of retaliation, went with a body of light troops, and burnt the suburbs of La Torre, making his retreat afterwards with no great loss.

Soon after, captain Bellin, with a much stronger body of troops, attacked the town of La Torre itself, and making a breach in the wall of the convent, his men entered, driving the garrison into the citadel, and burning both town and convent. After having effected this, they made a regular retreat, as, for want of cannon, they could not reduce the citadel.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS of MICHAEL DE MOLINOS, a Native of SPAIN.

MICHAEL DE MOLINOS, a Spaniard of a rich and honourable family, entered, when young into priest's orders, but would not accept of any preferment in the church. He possessed great natural abilities, which he dedicated to the service of his fellow-creatures, without any view of emolument to himself. His course of life was pious and uniform; nor did he exercise those austerities which are common among the religious orders of the Romish church.

As he was of a contemplative turn of mind, he pursued the track of the mystical divines, and having acquired great reputation in Spain, and being desirous of propagating his sublime mode of devotion, he left his own country, and settled at Rome. Here he soon connected himself with some of the most distinguished among the literati, who so approved of his religious maxims, that they concurred in assisting him to propagate them; and, in a short time, he obtained a great number of followers, who, from the sublime mode of their religion, were distinguished by the name of Quietists.

Molinus published a book, in 1675, entitled, Il Guida Spirituale, to which were subjoined recommendatory letters from several great personages. One of these was by the archbishop of Reggio; a second by the general of the Franciscans; and a third by father Martin de Esparza, a Jesuit, who had been divinity-professor both at Salamanca and Rome.

As soon as the book was published, it was greatly read, and highly esteemed, both in Italy and Spain: this so raised the reputation of the author, that his acquaintance was coveted by the most respectable characters. Letters were written to him from numbers of people, so that a correspondence was settled between him, and those who approved of his method, in different parts of Europe. Some secular priests, both at Rome and Naples, declared themselves openly for it, and consulted him, as a sort of oracle, on many occasions. But those who attached themselves to him with the greatest sincerity, were some of the fathers of the Oratory; in particular three of the most eminent, namely, Coloredi, Ciceri, and Petrucci. Many of the cardinals also courted his acquaintance, and thought themselves happy in being reckoned among the number of his friends. The most distinguished of them was the cardinal d'Estrees, a man of very great learning, who so highly approved of Molinos's maxims, that he entered into a close connection with him. They conversed together daily, and notwithstanding the distrust a Spaniard has naturally of a Frenchman, yet Molinos, who was sincere in his principles, opened his mind without reserve to the cardinal; and by this means a correspondence was settled between Molinos and some of the most distinguished characters in France.

Thus, whilst Molinos was labouring to propagate his religious mode, father Petrucci wrote several letters and treatises relative to a contemplative life; but he mixed in them so many rules for the devotions of the Romish church, as mitigated that censure he might have otherwise wife incurred. They were written chiefly for the use of the nuns, and therefore the sense was expressed in a style the most easy and familiar.

By this time Molinos had acquired such reputation, that the Jesuits and Dominicans began to be greatly alarmed, and determined to put a stop to the progress of this new method. To do this it was necessary to decry the author of it; and as heresy is an imputation that makes the strongest impression at Rome, Molinos and his followers were given out to be heretics. Books were also written by some of the Jesuits against Molinos and his method; but they were all answered by Molinos with great and becoming spirit.

However, these disputes occasioned such a disturbance in Rome, that the whole affair was taken notice of by the inquisition. Molinos and his book, and father Petrucci with his treatises and letters, were brought under a severe examination; and the Jesuits were considered as the accusers. One of the society had, indeed, approved of Molinos's book: but the rest took care he should not be again seen at Rome. In the course of the examination both Molinos and Petrucci acquitted themselves so well, that their books were again approved, and the answers which the Jesuits had written were censured as scandalous and unbecoming.

The conduct of Petrucci on this occasion was so highly approved, that it not only raised the credit of the cause, but his own emolument; for he was soon after made bishop of Jesis, which was a new declaration made by the pope in their favour. Their books were now esteemed more than ever, their method was more followed, and the novelty of it, with the new approbation given after so vigorous an accusation by the Jesuits, all contributed to raise the credit, and increase the number of the party.

Father Petrucci's behaviour in his new dignity greatly contributed to increase his reputation, so that his enemies were unwilling to give him any further disturbance; and, indeed, there was less occasion given for censure by his writings than those of Molinos. Some passages in the latter were not so cautiously expressed, but there was room to make exceptions to them; while, on the other hand, Petrucci so fully explained himself, as easily to remove the objections made to some parts of his letter.

Thus the great reputation acquired by Molinos and Petrucci, occasioned a daily increase of the Quietists. All who were thought sincerely devout, or at least affected the reputation of it, were reckoned among the number. If these persons were observed to become more strict in their lives and mental devotions, yet there appeared less zeal in their whole deportment as to the exterior parts of the church ceremonies. They were not so assiduous at mass, nor so earnest to procure masses to be said for their friends; nor were they so frequently either in processions or at confession.

Notwithstanding the new approbation given to Molinos's book by the inquisition had checked the proceedings of his enemies; yet they were still inveterate against him in their hearts, and determined if possible to ruin him. They insinuated that he had ill designs, and was, in his heart, an enemy to the Christian religion: that under pretence of raising men to a sublime strain of devotion, he intended to erase from their minds a sense of the mysteries of Christianity. And because he was a Spaniard, they gave out that he was descended from a Jewish, or Mohometan race, and that he might carry in his blood, or in his first education, some seeds of those religions which he had since cultivated with no less art than zeal. This last calumny gained but little credit at Rome, though it was said an order was sent to examine the registers of the place where Molinos was baptized.

As soon as Molinos found himself attacked with such great vigour, and unrelenting malice, he took every necessary precaution to prevent these imputations being credited. He wrote a treatise entitled, Frequent and Daily Communion, which was likewise approved by some of the most learned of the Romish clergy. This was printed with his Spiritual Guide, in the year 1675; and in the preface to it he declared, that he had not written it with any design to engage himself in matters of controversy, but that by the earnest solicitations of many pious people it was drawn from him.

The Jesuits having failed in their attempts, of crushing Molinos's power in Rome, applied to the court of France, when in a short time, they so far succeeded, that an order was sent to cardinal d'Estrees, commanding him to prosecute Molinos with all possible rigour. The cardinal, though so strongly attached to Molinos, resolved to sacrifice all that is sacred in friendship to the will of his master. Finding, however, there was not sufficient matter for an accusation against him, he determined to supply that defect himself. He therefore went to the inquisitors, and informed them of several particulars, not only relative to Molinos, but also Petrucci, both of whom, together with several of their friends, were put into the inquisition.

As soon as they were brought before the inquisitors (which was in the beginning of the year 1684) Petrucci answered the respective questions put to him with so much judgment and temper, that he was soon dismissed; and though Molinos's examination was much longer, it was generally expected he would have been likewise discharged: but this was not the case. Though the inquisitors had not any just accusation against him, yet they strained every nerve to find him guilty of heresy. They first objected to his holding a correspondence in different parts of Europe; but of this he was acquitted, as the matter of that correspondence could not be made criminal. They then directed their attention to some suspicious papers found in his chamber; but Molinos so clearly explained their meaning, that nothing could be made of them to his prejudice. At length, cardinal d'Estrees, after producing the order sent him by the king of France for prosecuting Molinos, said, he could prove against him more than was necessary to convince them he was guilty of heresy. To do this he perverted the meaning of some passages in Molinos's books and papers, and related many false and aggravating circumstances relative to the prisoner. He acknowledged he had lived with him under the appearance of friendship, but that it was only to discover his principles and intentions: that he had found them to be of a bad nature, and that dangerous consequences were likely to ensue; but in order to make a full discovery, he had assented to several things, which, in his heart, he detested; and that, by these means, he saw into the secrets of Molinos; but determined not to take any notice, till a proper opportunity should offer of crushing both him and his party.

Molinos, in consequence of d'Estrees's evidence, was closely confined in the inquisition, where he continued for some time, during which period all was quiet, and his followers prosecuted their mode without interruption. But on a sudden the Jesuits determined to extirpate them, and the storm broke out with the most inveterate fury.

The count Vespignani and his lady, Don Paulo Rocchi, confessor to the prince Borghese, and some of his family, with several others, in all seventy persons, were put into the inquisition, among whom many were highly esteemed both for their learning and piety. The accusation laid against the clergy was, their neglecting to say the breviary; and the rest were accused of going to communion without first attending confession. In a word, it was said, they neglected all the exterior parts of religion, and gave themselves up wholly to inward prayer and solitude.

The countess Vespignani exerted herself in a very particular manner on her examination before the inquisitors. She said, she had never revealed her method of devotion to any mortal but her confessor, and that it was impossible they should know it without his discovering the secret; that, therefore, it was time to give over going to confession, if priests made this use of it, to discover the most secret thoughts intrusted to them; and that she would only make her confession to God for the future.

From this spirited speech, and the great noise made in consequence of the countess's situation; the inquisitors thought it most prudent to dismiss both her and her husband, lest the people might be incensed, and what she said might lessen the credit of confession. They were, therefore, both discharged; but bound to appear whenever they should be called upon.

Such was the inveteracy of the jesuits against the quietists, that within the space of a month upwards of two hundred persons, besides those already mentioned, were put into the inquisition; and that method of devotion which had passed in Italy as the most elevated to which mortals could aspire, was deemed heretical, and the chief promoters of it confined in a wretched dungeon.

Therefore, to extirpate quietism if possible, the inquisitors sent a circular letter to cardinal Cibo, as the chief minister, to disperse it through Italy. It was addressed to all prelates, informing them, that whereas many schools and fraternities were established in several parts of Italy, in which some persons, under a pretence of leading people into the ways of the spirit, and to the prayer of quietness, instilled into them many abominable heresies, therefore a strict charge was given to dissolve all those societies, and to oblige the spiritual guide to tread in the known paths; and, in particular, to take care none of that sort should be suffered to have the direction of the nunneries. Orders were likewise given to proceed, in the way of justice, against those who should be found guilty of these abominable errors.

A strict inquiry was made after this into all the nunneries in Rome; when most of their directors and confessors were discovered to be engaged in this new method. It was found that the Carmelites, the nuns of the Conception, and those of several other convents, were wholly given up to prayer and contemplation; and that, instead of their beads, and the other devotions to saints, or images, they were much alone, and often in the exercise of mental prayer: that when they were asked, why they had laid aside the use of their beads, and their ancient forms, their answer was, their directors had advised them so to do. Information of this being given to the inquisition, they sent orders that all books written in the same strain with those of Molinos and Petrucci, should be taken from them, and that they should be compelled to return to their original form of worship.

Little effect was produced by the circular letter sent to cardinal Cibo, for most of the Italian bishops were inclined to Molinos's method. It was intended that this, as well as all other orders from the inquisitors, should be kept secret; but notwithstanding all their care, copies of it were printed, and dispersed in most of the principal towns in Italy. This gave great uneasiness to the inquisitors, who use every method they can to conceal their proceedings from the knowledge of the world. They blamed the cardinal, and accused him of being the cause of it; but he retorted on them, and his secretary laid the fault on both.

In the mean time, Molinos suffered great indignities from the officers of the inquisition; and the only comfort he received was, from being sometimes visited by father Petrucci.

Although he had lived in the highest reputation in Rome for some years, he was now as much despised as he had been admired, being generally considered as one of the worst of heretics.

The chief part of Molinos's followers, who had been placed in the inquisition, having abjured his mode, were dismissed; but a harder fate awaited Molinos, their leader.

When he had lain a considerable time in prison, he was at length brought again before the inquisitors, to answer to a number of articles exhibited against him from his writings. As soon as he appeared in court, a chain was put round his body, and a wax-light in his hand, when two friars read aloud the articles of accusation. Molinos answered each with great steadiness and resolution; and notwithstanding his arguments totally defeated the force of all, yet he was found guilty of heresy, and was condemned to imprisonment for life.

Having left the court he was attended by a priest, who had borne him the greatest respect. On his arrival at the prison he entered the cell allotted for his confinement with great tranquillity; and on taking leave of the priest thus addressed him: Adieu, father, we shall meet again at the day of judgment, and then it will appear on which side the truth is, whether on my side, or on your's.

While in confinement he was several times tortured in the most cruel manner, till, at length, the severity of the punishments overpowered his strength, and finished his existence.

The followers of Molinos were so impressed by his melancholy dissolution, that the greater part of them soon abjured his mode; and by the assiduity of the jesuits, quietism was totally extirpated throughout the country.

A Full and Particular ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS in BOHEMIA under the PAPACY.

THE Roman pontiffs having usurped a power over several churches, were particularly severe on the Bohemians, which occasioned them to send two ministers, and four lay-brothers to Rome, in the year 977, to obtain redress of the pope. After some delay their request was granted, and their grievances redressed. Two things in particular they were permitted to do, viz. to have divine service performed in their own language, and to give the cup to the laity in the sacrament.

However the disputes soon broke out again, the succeeding popes exerting their whole power to impose on the minds of the Bohemians; and the latter, with great spirit, aiming to preserve their religious liberties.

Some zealous friends of the gospel applied to Charles, king of Bohemia, A. D. 1375, to call an œconomical council, for an inquiry into the abuses that had crept into the church, and to make a full and thorough reformation. The king, not knowing how to proceed, sent to the pope for directions how to act; but the pontiff was so incensed at the affair, that his only reply was, Severely punish those rash and profane heretics. The monarch, accordingly, banished every one who had been concerned in the application, and to oblige the pope, laid a great number of additional restraints upon the religious liberties of the people.

When John Hufs, and Jerom of Prague, two holy and pious men, were condemned by order of the council of Constance, fifty-eight of the principal Bohemian nobility interposed in their favour. Nevertheless they were cruelly burnt, and the pope, in conjunction with the council of Constance, ordered the Romish clergy, every where, to excommunicate such as adopted their opinions, or commiserated their fate.

By means of these orders great contentions between the papists and reformed Bohemians took place, which was the cause of a violent persecution against the latter. At Prague the persecution was extremely severe, till, at length, the reformed being driven to desperation, armed themselves, attacked the senate-house, and threw twelve senators, with the speaker, out of the senate-house windows, whose bodies fell upon spears, which were held up by others of the reformed in the street, to receive them.

When informed of these proceedings, the pope came to Florence, and publicly excommunicated the reformed Bohemians, exciting the emperor of Germany, and all kings, princes, dukes, &c. to take up arms, in order to extirpate the whole race; and promising, by way of encouragement, full remission of all sins whatever to the most wicked person, if he did but kill one Bohemian protestant.

A bloody war was the result of this, for several popish princes undertook the extirpation, or at least expulsion, of the proscribed people; and the Bohemians, arming themselves, prepared to repel force by force, in the most vigorous and effectual manner. The popish army prevailing against the protestant forces at the battle of Cutenburgh, the prisoners of the reformed were taken to three deep mines near that town, and several hundreds were were cruelly thrown into each, where they perished in a miserable manner.

A merchant of Prague, going to Breslaw, in Silesia, happened to lodge in the same inn with several priests. Entering into conversation upon the subject of religious controversy, he passed many encomiums upon the martyred John Hus, and his doctrines. The priests taking umbrage at this, laid an information against him the next morning; and he was committed to prison as an heretic. Many endeavours were used to persuade him to embrace the Roman catholic faith; but he remained steadfast to the pure doctrines of the reformed church. Soon after his imprisonment, a student of the university was committed to the same gaol; when, being permitted to converse with the merchant, they mutually comforted each other. On the day appointed for execution, when the gaoler began to fasten the ropes to their feet, by which they were to be dragged through the streets, the student appeared quite terrified, and offered to abjure his faith, and turn Roman catholic if he might be saved. The offer was accepted, his abjuration was taken by a priest, and he was set at liberty. A priest applying to the merchant to follow the example of the student, he nobly said, "Lose no time in hopes of my recantation, your expectations will be vain; I sincerely pity that poor wretch, who has miserably sacrificed his soul for a few more uncertain years of a troublesome life; and, so far from having the least idea of following his example, I glory in the very thoughts of dying for the sake of Christ." On hearing these words, the priest ordered the executioner to proceed; and the merchant being drawn through the city, was brought to the place of execution, and there destroyed by fire.

Pichel, a bigoted popish magistrate, apprehended 24 protestants, among whom was his daughter's husband. As they all owned they were of the reformed religion, he indiscriminately condemned them to be drowned in the river Abbis. On the day appointed for the execution, a great concourse of people attended, among whom was Pichel's daughter. This worthy wife threw herself at her father's feet, bedewed them with tears, and in the most pathetic manner, implored him to commiserate her sorrow, and pardon her husband. The obdurate magistrate sternly replied, "Intercede not for him, child, he is a heretic, a vile heretic." To which she nobly answered, "Whatever his faults may be, or however his opinions may differ from your's, he is still my husband, a name which, at a time like this, should alone employ my whole consideration." Pichel flew into a violent passion, and said, "You are mad! cannot you, after the death of this, have a much worthier husband?" No, sir, (replied she) my affections are fixed upon this, and death itself shall not dissolve my marriage vow. Pichel, however, continued inflexible, and ordered the prisoners to be tied with their hands and feet behind them, and in that manner to be thrown into the river. As soon as this was put into execution, the young lady watched her opportunity, leaped into the waves, and embracing the body of her husband, both sunk together into one watery grave. An uncommon instance of conjugal love in a wife, and of an inviolable attachment to, and personal affection for, her husband.

Ferdinand the emperor, whose hatred to the Bohemian protestants was without bounds, not thinking he had sufficiently oppressed them, instituted a high court of reformers, upon the plan of the inquisition, with this difference, that the reformers were to remove from place to place, and always to be attended by a body of troops.

The chief number of these reformers consisted of jesuits, and from their decisions there was no appeal, by which it may be easily conjectured, that it was a tribunal indeed the most dreadful.

This tremendous bloody court, attended by a body of troops, made the tour of Bohemia, in which they seldom examined or saw a prisoner, suffering the soldiers to murder the protestants as they pleased, and then to make a report of the matter afterwards.

An aged minister was the first victim of their cruelty, whom they killed as he lay sick in bed; the next day they robbed, and murdered another, and soon after shot a third, as he was preaching in his pulpit.

A nobleman and a clergyman, who resided in a protestant village, hearing of the approach of the high court of reformers and the troops, fled from the place, and secreted themselves. The soldiers, however, on their arrival, seized upon a school-master, and asked him where the lord of that place and the minister were concealed, and where they had hid their treasures. The school-master replied, he could not answer either of the questions. They then stripped him naked, bound him with cords, and beat him most unmercifully with cudgels. This cruelty not extorting any confession from him, they scorched him in various parts of his body; when, to gain a respite from his torments, he promised to shew them where the treasures were hid. The soldiers gave ear to this with pleasure, and the school-master led them to a ditch full of stones, saying, Beneath those stones are the riches ye seek for. Eager after money, they went to work, and soon removed those stones, but not finding what they sought after, beat the school-master to death, buried him in the ditch, and covered him with the very stones he had made them remove.

Several of the soldiers ravished the daughters of a worthy protestant before his face, and then tortured him to death. A minister and his wife they tied back to back, and burnt. Another minister they hung upon a cross beam, and making a fire under him, broiled him to death. A gentleman they hacked into small pieces; and they filled a young man's mouth with gunpowder, and setting fire to it, blew his head to pieces.

Their principal rage being directed against the clergy, they took a pious protestant minister, and tormented him daily for a month together, in the following manner, making their cruelty regular, progressive, and systematic.

1. They placed him amidst them, and made him the subject of their derision and mockery, during a whole day's entertainment, trying to exhaust his patience, but in vain, for he bore the whole with a true christian fortitude,
2. They spit in his face, pulled his nose, and pinched him in most parts of his body.
3. He was hunted like a wild beast, till ready to expire with fatigue.
4. They made him run the gantlope between two ranks of them, each striking him with a twig.
5. He was beat with their fists.
6. He was beat with ropes.
7. They scourged him with wires.
8. He was beat with cudgels.
9. They tied him up by the heels with his head downwards, till the blood started out of his nose, mouth, &c.
10. They hung him up by the right arm till it was dislocated, and then had it set again.
11. The same was repeated with his left arm.
12. Burning papers, dipped in oil, were placed between his fingers and toes.
13. His flesh was torn with red hot pincers.
14. He was put to the rack.
15. They pulled off the nails of his right hand.
16. The same repeated with his left hand.
17. He was bastinadoed on his feet.
18. A slit was made in his right ear.
19. The same repeated on his left ear.
20. His nose was slit.
21. They whipped him through the town upon an ass.
22. They made several incisions in his flesh.
23. They pulled off the toe nails of his right foot.
24. The same repeated with his left foot.
25. He was tied up by the loins, and suspended for a considerable time.
26. The teeth of his upper jaw were pulled out.
27. The same was repeated with his lower jaw.
28. Boiling lead was poured upon his fingers.
29. The same repeated with his toes.
30. A knotted cord was twisted about his forehead in such a manner, as to force out his eyes.

While

While these horrid cruelties were carried on, particular care was taken that his wounds should not mortify, and not to injure him mortally till the last day, when the forcing out of his eyes proved his death.

Various were the other murders and depredations committed by those unfeeling brutes, and shocking to humanity were the cruelties which they inflicted on the poor Bohemian protestants. The winter being far advanced, however, the high court of reformers, with their infernal band of military ruffians, thought proper to return to Prague; but on their way meeting with a protestant pastor, they could not resist the temptation of feasting their barbarous eyes with a new kind of cruelty, which had just suggested itself to the diabolical imagination of one of the soldiers. This was to strip the minister naked, and alternately to cover him with ice and burning coals. This novel mode of tormenting a fellow-creature was immediately put in practice, and the unhappy victim expired beneath the torments, which seemed to delight his inhuman persecutors.

Soon after a secret order was issued by the emperor, for apprehending all noblemen and gentlemen, who had been principally concerned in supporting the protestant cause, and in nominating Frederic, elector Palatine of the Rhine, to be king of Bohemia. These, to the number of fifty, were apprehended in one night, and at one hour, and brought from the places where they were taken, to the castle of Prague, and the estates of those who were absent from the kingdom were confiscated, themselves were made outlaws, and their names fixed upon a gallows, as marks of public ignominy.

After this the high court of reformers proceeded to try the fifty, who had been apprehended, and two apostate protestants were appointed to examine them. These examiners asked a great number of unnecessary and impertinent questions, which so exasperated one of the noblemen, who was naturally of a warm temper, that he exclaimed, opening his breast at the same time, "Cut here, search my heart, you shall find nothing but the love of religion and liberty: those were the motives for which I drew my sword, and for those I am willing to suffer death."

Seeing that none of the prisoners would change their religion, or acknowledge they had been in an error, they were all pronounced guilty; but the sentence was referred to the emperor. When that monarch had read their names, and an account of the respective accusations against them, he passed judgment on all, but in a different manner, as his sentences were of four kinds, viz. death, banishment, imprisonment for life, and imprisonment during pleasure.

Twenty, who were ordered for execution, were informed they might send for jesuits, monks, or friars, to prepare for the awful change they were to undergo; but that no protestants would be permitted to come near them. This proposal they rejected, and strove all they could to comfort and cheer each other upon the solemn occasion.

When the morning of the day appointed for the execution arrived, a cannon was fired as a signal to bring the prisoners from the castle to the principal market-place, in which scaffolds were erected, and a body of troops were drawn up to attend the tragic spectacle.

Notwithstanding, the prisoners left the castle with as much cheerfulness as if they had been going to an agreeable entertainment, instead of a violent death.

Besides soldiers, jesuits, priests, executioners, attendants, &c. a prodigious concourse of people attended, to see the exit of these devoted martyrs, who were executed in the following order:

I. LORD SCHILIK.

This nobleman was about fifty years of age, and was possessed of great natural and acquired abilities. When he was told he was to be quartered, and his parts scattered in different places, he smiled with great serenity, saying, The loss of a sepulchre is but a trifling consideration. A gentleman who stood by, crying, Courage, my lord: he replied, I have God's favour, which is sufficient to inspire any one with courage: the fear of death does not trouble me; formerly I have faced him in fields of battle to oppose Anti-Christ; and now dare face him on a scaffold, for the sake of Christ. Having said a short prayer, he told the executioner he was ready, who cut off his right hand and his head, and then quartered him. His hand and head were placed upon the high tower of Prague, and his quarters distributed in different parts of the city.

II. LORD VISCOUNT WINCESLAUS.

This pious and venerable nobleman, who had attained the age of seventy years, was equally respectable for his learning and hospitality. His temper was so remarkably patient, that when his house was broke open, his property seized, and his estates confiscated, he only said, with great composure, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away. Being asked why he could engage in so dangerous a cause as that of attempting to support the elector Palatine Frederic, against the power of the emperor, he replied, I acted strictly according to the dictates of my conscience, and, to this day, deem him my king. I am now full of years, and wish to lay down life, that I may not be a witness of the farther evils which are to attend my country. You have long thirsted for my blood; take it, for God will be my avenger. Then approaching the block, he stroked his long grey beard, and said, Venerable hairs, the greater honour now attends ye, a crown of martyrdom is your portion. Then laying down his head, it was severed from his body at one stroke, and placed upon a pole in a conspicuous part of the city.

III. LORD HARANT.

This was a gentleman of good sense, great piety, and much experience gained by travel, as he had visited the principal places in Europe, Asia, and Africa. Hence he was free from national prejudices, and had collected much knowledge.

The accusations against this nobleman were, his being a protestant, and having taken an oath of allegiance to Frederic, the elector Palatine of the Rhine, as king of Bohemia. When he came upon the scaffold, he said, "I have travelled through many countries, and traversed various barbarous nations, yet never found so much cruelty as at home. I have escaped innumerable perils both by sea and land, and surmounted inconceivable difficulties, to suffer innocently in my native place. My blood is likewise sought by those for whom I, and my forefathers, have hazarded our lives and estates; but, Almighty God! forgive them, for they know not what they do." He then went to the block, kneeled down, and exclaimed, with great energy, Into thy hands, O Lord! I commend my spirit; in thee have I always trusted; receive me, therefore, my blessed Redeemer. The fatal stroke was then given, and a period put to the temporary pains of this life.

IV. LORD FREDERIC DE BILE.

This nobleman suffered as a protestant, and a promoter of the late war: he met his fate with serenity, and only said, he wished well to the friends whom he left behind, forgave the enemies who caused his death, denied the authority of the emperor in that country, acknowledged Frederic to be the only true king of Bohemia, and hoped for salvation in the merits of his blessed Redeemer.

V. LORD HENRY OTTO.

When his lordship first came upon the scaffold, he seemed greatly confounded, and said, with some asperity, as if addressing himself to the emperor, "Thou tyrant Ferdinand, your throne is established in blood; but if you kill my body, and disperse my members, they shall still rise up in judgment against you." He then was silent, and having walked about for some time, seemed to recover his fortitude, and growing calm, said to a gentleman who stood near, I was, a few minutes since, greatly discomposed, but now I feel my spirits revive; God be praised for affording me such comfort; death no longer appears as the king of terrors, but seems to invite me to participate of some unknown joys. Kneeling before the block, he said, Almighty God! to thee I commend my soul, receive it for the sake of Christ, and admit it to the glory of thy presence. The executioner put this nobleman to considerable pain, by making making several strokes before he severed the head from the body.

VI. THE EARL OF RUGENIA.

This nobleman was distinguished for his superior abilities, and unaffected piety. On the scaffold he said, "We, who drew our swords, fought only to preserve the liberties of the people, and to keep our consciences sacred: as we were overcome, I am better pleased at the sentence of death than if the emperor had given me life; for I find that it pleases God to have his truth defended, not by our swords, but by our blood." He then went boldly to the block, saying, "I shall now be speedily with Christ," and received the crown of martyrdom with great courage.

VII. SIR GASPER KAPLITZ.

This nobleman was 86 years of age. When he came to the place of execution, he addressed the principal officer thus: "Behold a miserable ancient man, who hath often intreated God to take him out of this wicked world, but could not till now obtain his desire; for God reserved me till these years to be a spectacle to the world, and a sacrifice to himself; therefore God's will be done." One of the officers told him, in consideration of his great age, that if he would only ask pardon, he would immediately receive it. "Ask pardon, exclaimed he, I will ask pardon of God whom I have frequently offended; but not of the emperor to whom I never gave any offence: should I sue for pardon, it might be justly suspected I had committed some crime for which I deserved this condemnation. No, no, as I die innocent, and with a clear conscience, I would not be separated from this noble company of martyrs: so saying, he cheerfully resigned his neck to the block.

VIII. PROCOPIUS DORZECKI.

On the scaffold this gentleman said, "We are now under the emperor's judgment; but in time he shall be judged, and we shall appear as witnesses against him." Then taking a gold medal from his neck, which was struck when the elector Frederic was crowned king of Bohemia, he presented it to one of the officers; at the same time uttering these words, "As a dying man, I request, if ever king Frederic is restored to the throne of Bohemia, that you will give him this medal. Tell him, for his sake, I wore it till death, and that now I willingly lay down my life for God and my king." He then cheerfully laid down his head, and submitted to the fatal blow.

IX. DIONYSIUS ZERVIUS.

We understand this gentleman was brought up a Roman catholic, but had embraced the reformed religion for some years. When upon the scaffold the jesuits used their utmost endeavours to make him recant, and return to his former faith, but he paid not the least attention to their exhortations. Kneeling down he said, "They may destroy my body, but cannot injure my soul, that I commend to my Redeemer;" and then patiently submitted to martyrdom, being at that time fifty-six years of age.

X. VALENTINE COCKAN.

This was a gentleman of considerable fortune and eminence, perfectly pious and honest, but of trifling abilities; yet his imagination seemed to grow bright, and his faculties to improve on death's approach, as if the impending danger refined the understanding. Just before he was beheaded, he expressed himself with such eloquence, energy, and precision, as greatly amazed those who knew his former deficiency in point of capacity.

XI. TOBIAS STEFFICK.

This person was remarkable for his affability and serenity of temper. He was perfectly resigned to his fate, and a few minutes before his death spoke in this singular manner: "I have received, during the whole course of my life, many favours from God; ought I not therefore cheerfully to take one bitter cup, when he thinks proper to present it? Or rather, ought I not to rejoice, that it is his will I should give up a corrupted life for that of immortality?"

XII. DR. JESSENIUS.

This was an able student of physic, who was accused of having spoken disrespectful words of the emperor, of treason in swearing allegiance to the elector Frederic, and of heresy in being a protestant: for the first accusation he had his tongue cut out; for the second he was beheaded; and for the third, and last, he was quartered, and the respective parts exposed on poles.

XIII. CHRISTOPHER CHOBER.

As soon as this gentleman stepped upon the scaffold, he said, "I come, in the name of God, to die for his glory; I have fought the good fight, and finished my course; so executioner, do your office." The executioner obeyed, and he instantly received the crown of martyrdom.

XIV. JOHN SHULTIS.

There was no person ever lived more respected, or died more lamented than this gentleman. The only words he spoke, before receiving the fatal stroke, were, "The righteous seem to die in the eyes of fools, but they only go to rest. Lord Jesus! thou hast promised that those who come to thee shall not be cast off. Behold, I am come; look on me, pity me, pardon my sins, and receive my soul."

XV. MAXIMILIAN HOSTIALICK.

This worthy gentleman was famed for his learning, piety, and humanity. When he first came on the scaffold, he seemed exceedingly terrified at the approach of death. The officer taking notice of his agitation, he said, "Ah! sir, now the sins of my youth crowd upon my mind; but I hope God will enlighten me, lest I sleep the sleep of death, and lest mine enemies say, We have prevailed." Soon after he said, "I hope my repentance is sincere, and will be accepted, in which case the blood of Christ will wash me from my crimes." He then told the officer he should repeat the song of Simeon; at the conclusion of which the executioner might do his duty. He, accordingly, said, "Lord! now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation;" at which words his head was severed at one blow from his body.

XVI. JOHN KUTNAUR.

As soon as this gentleman came to the place of execution, a jesuit said to him, "Embrace the Roman catholic faith, which alone can save and arm you against the terrors of death." To which he replied, "Your superstitious faith I abhor, it leads to perdition, and I wish for no other arms against the terrors of death than a good conscience." The jesuit turned away, saying, sarcastically, "The protestants are impenetrable rocks. You are mistaken, said Kutnaur, it is Christ that is the rock, and we are firmly fixed upon him."

As this person was not born independent, but had acquired a fortune by a mechanical employment, he was ordered to be hanged. Just before he was turned off, he said, "I die, not for having committed any crime, but for following the dictates of my conscience, and defending my country and religion."

XVII. SIMEON SUSSICKEY.

This gentleman was father-in-law to Kutnaur, and, like him, was ordered to be executed on a gallows. He went cheerfully to death, and appeared impatient to be executed, saying, "Every moment delays me from entering into the kingdom of Christ."

XVIII. NATHANIEL WODNIANSKEY.

This gentleman was hanged for having supported the protestant cause, and the election of Frederic to the crown of Bohemia. At the gallows, the jesuits did all in their power to induce him to renounce his faith. Finding their endeavours ineffectual, one of them said, "If you will not abjure your heresy, at least repent of your rebellion?" To which Wodnianskey replied, "You take away our lives under a pretended charge of rebellion; and, not content with that, seek to destroy our souls: glut yourselves with blood, and be satisfied, but tamper not with our consciences."

His own son then approached the gallows, and said to his father, "Sir, if life should be offered to you on condition of apostacy, I intreat you to remember Christ, and reject such pernicious overtures." To this the father replied, "It is very acceptable, my son, to be exhorted to constancy by you; but suspect me not; rather endeavour to confirm in their faith your brothers, sisters, and and children, and teach them to imitate that constancy, of which I shall leave them an example." He had no sooner concluded these words, than he was turned off, receiving the crown of martyrdom with great fortitude.

XIX. WENCESLAUS GISBITZKEY.

As this person, during his whole confinement, had great hopes of life given him, his friends became very apprehensive for the safety of his soul. He, however, continued stedfast in his faith, prayed fervently at the gallows, and met his fate with uncommon fortitude.

XX. MARTIN FOSTER.

An unfortunate cripple; the accusations against whom were, being charitable to heretics, and lending money to the elector Frederic. His great wealth, however, seems to have been his principal crime; and that he might be plundered of his treasures, he was consequently ranked among the martyrs of those times.

ACCOUNT of the General PERSECUTIONS in GERMANY.

THEN several persecutions in Germany were principally occasioned by the doctrines and ministry of Martin Luther. Indeed, the pope was so terrified at the success of that courageous reformer, that he determined to engage the emperor, Charles the Fifth, at any rate, in the scheme to attempt their extirpation.

For this purpose,

1. He gave the emperor two hundred thousand crowns in ready money.
2. He promised to maintain twelve thousand foot, and five thousand horse, for the space of six months, or during a campaign.
3. He allowed the emperor to receive one half of the revenues of the clergy of the empire, during the war.
4. He permitted the emperor to pledge the abbey-lands for five hundred thousand crowns, to assist in carrying on hostilities against the protestants.

Prompted and supported thus, the emperor undertook the extirpation of the protestants, against whom, indeed, he was particularly enraged himself; and, for this purpose, a formidable army was raised in Germany, Spain, and Italy.

In the mean time, the protestant princes formed a powerful confederacy, in order to repel the impending blow. A great army was raised, and the command given to the elector of Saxony, and the landgrave of Hesse. The imperial forces were commanded by the emperor of Germany in person, and the eyes of all Europe were turned on the event of the war.

The armies at length met, and a desperate engagement ensued, in which the protestants were defeated, and the elector of Saxony, and landgrave of Hesse, both taken prisoners. This fatal blow was succeeded by a horrid persecution, the severities of which were such, that exile might be deemed a mild fate, and concealment in a dismal wood pass for happiness. In such times a cave is a palace, wild roots delicacies, and a rock a bed of down.

Such as were taken experienced the most cruel tortures that infernal imaginations could invent; and by their constancy evinced, that a real christian can surmount every difficulty, and despise every danger, to acquire a crown of martyrdom.

Henry Voes and John Esch, being apprehended as protestants, were brought to examination: when Voes, answering for himself and the other, gave the following answers to some questions asked by a priest, who examined them by order of the magistracy.

Priest. Were you not both, some years ago, Augustine friars?

Voes. Yes.

Priest. How came you to quit the bosom of the church of Rome?

Voes. On account of her abominations.

Priest. In what do you believe?

Voes. In the Old and New Testament.

No. 78.

Priest. Do you believe in the writings of the fathers, and the decrees of the councils?

Voes. Yes, if they agree with scripture.

Priest. Did not Martin Luther seduce you both?

Voes. He seduced us even in the very same manner as Christ seduced the apostles; that is, he made us sensible of the frailty of our bodies, and the value of our souls.

This examination was deemed sufficient; they were both condemned to the flames, and, soon after, suffered with that manly fortitude which becomes christians, when they resign their breath for the truth.

One Henry Surphen, an eloquent and pious preacher, was taken out of his bed in the middle of the night, and compelled to walk barefoot a considerable way, so that his feet were terribly cut. He desired a horse, but his conductors said, in derision, A horse for an heretic; no, no, heretics may go barefoot. When he arrived at the place of his destination, he was condemned to be burnt; but, during the execution, many indignities were offered him, as those who attended, not content with what he suffered in the flames, cut and slashed him in a manner the most terrible.

Several were murdered at Halle; Middleburg being taken by storm, all the protestants were put to the sword, and great numbers were burned at Vienna.

There was an officer sent to put a minister to death; who pretended, when he came to the clergyman's house, that his intentions were only to pay him a visit. The minister, not suspecting the intended cruelty, entertained his supposed guest in a very cordial manner. As soon as dinner was over, the officer said to some of his attendants, "Take this clergyman, and hang him." The attendants themselves were so shocked, after the civility they had seen, that they hesitated to perform the commands of their master; and the minister said, "Think what a sting will remain on your conscience, for thus violating the laws of hospitality." The officer, however, insisted upon being obeyed, and the attendants, with reluctance, performed the execrable office of executioners.

A pious divine, of the name of Peter Spengler, of the town of Schalet, was thrown into the river, and drowned. Before he was taken to the banks of the stream, which was to become his grave, they led him to the market-place, that his crimes might be proclaimed; which were, not going to mass, not making confession, and not believing in transubstantiation. After this ceremony was over, he made a most excellent discourse to the people, which, with a kind of hymn of a very edifying nature, he concluded.

A protestant gentleman being ordered to lose his head for not renouncing his religion, went cheerfully to the place of execution. A friar came to him, and said these words in a low tone of voice, "As you have a great reluctance publicly to abjure your faith, whisper your confession into my ear, and I will absolve your sins." To this the gentleman loudly replied, "Trouble me not, friar, I have confessed my sins to God, and obtained absolution through the merits of Jesus Christ." Then turning to the executioner, he said, "Let me not be pestered with these men, but perform your duty." On which at a single blow his head was struck off.

John Huglin, and Wolfgang Seuch, two worthy ministers, were burned, as was Leonard Keyser, a student of the university of Wertenburgh: and George Carpenter, a Bavarian, was hanged for refusing to recant protestantism.

The persecutions in Germany having subsided many years, again broke out in 1630, on account of the war between the emperor, and the king of Sweden, for the latter was a protestant prince, and consequently the protestants of Germany espoused his cause, which greatly exasperated the emperor against those protestants.

The imperialists having laid siege to the town of Passewalk, (which was defended by the Swedes) took it by storm, and committed the most horrid cruelties on the occasion. They pulled down the churches, burnt the houses, pillaged the properties, massacred the ministers, put the garrison to the sword, hanged the townsmen, ravished the women, smothered the children, &c. &c.

In the year 1631, a most bloody tragedy was transacted at Magdeburg. The generals Tilly and Pappenheim, having taken that protestant city by storm, upwards of 20,000 persons, without distinction of rank, sex, or age, were slain during the carnage, and 6,000 were drowned in attempting to escape over the river Elbe. After this fury subsided, the remaining inhabitants were stripped naked, severely scourged, had their ears cropped, and being yoked together like oxen, were turned adrift.

The town of Hoxter was taken by the popish army, and all the inhabitants as well as the garrison were put to the sword; when the houses being set on fire, the bodies were consumed in the flames.

At Griphenburg, when the imperial forces prevailed, they shut up the senators in the senate-chamber, and, surrounding it by lighted straw, suffocated them.

Franhental surrendered upon articles of capitulation, yet the inhabitants were as cruelly used as at other places, and at Heidelberg many were shut up in prison and starved.

The cruelties used by the imperial troops, under count Tilly in Saxony, are as follow:

1. Half strangling, and recovering the persons again repeatedly.
2. Rolling sharp wheels over the fingers and toes.
3. Pinching the thumbs in a vice.
4. Forcing the most filthy things down the throat, by which many were choked.
5. Tying cords round the head so tight that the blood gushed out of the eyes, nose, ears, and mouth.
6. Fastening burning matches to the fingers, toes, ears, arms, legs, and even tongue.
7. Putting powder in the mouth and setting fire to it, by which the head was shattered to pieces.
8. Tying bags of powder to all parts of the body, by which the person was blown up.
9. Drawing cords backwards and forwards through the fleshy parts.
10. Making incisions with bodkins and knives in the skin.
11. Running wires through the nose, ears, lips, &c.
12. Hanging protestants up by the legs, with their heads over a fire, by which they were smoke-dried.
13. Hanging up by one arm till it was dislocated.
14. Hanging upon hooks by the ribs.
15. Forcing people to drink till they burst.
16. Baking many in hot ovens.
17. Fixing weights to the feet, and drawing up several with pulleys.

Add to these, hanging, stifling, roasting, stabbing, frying, racking, ravishing, ripping open, breaking the bones, rasping off the flesh, tearing with wild horses, drowning, strangling, burning, broiling, crucifying, immuring, poisoning, cutting off tongue, nose, ears, &c. sawing off the limbs, hacking to pieces, and drawing by the heels through the streets.

Sure these enormous cruelties will be a perpetual stain on the memory of count Tilly, who not only permitted, but even commanded his troops to put them in practice. Wherever he came, the most horrid barbarities, and cruel depredations, ensued: famine and conflagration marked his progress; for he destroyed all the provisions he could not take with him, and burnt all the towns before he left them; so that the full result of his conquests were murder, poverty, and desolation.

They stripped an aged and pious divine naked, tied him on his back upon a table, and fastened a large fierce cat upon his belly. They then pricked and tormented the cat in such a manner, that the creature with rage tore his belly open, and gnawed his bowels.

There was another minister, and his family, who were seized by these inhuman monsters; when they ravished his wife and daughter before his face, stuck his infant son upon the point of a lance, and then surrounding him with his whole library of books, they set fire to them, and he was consumed in the midst of the flames.

In Hesse-Cassel some of the troops entered an hospital, in which were principally mad women, when stripping all the poor wretches naked, they made them run about the streets for their diversion, and then put them to death.

In Pomerania, some of the imperial troops entering a small town, seized upon all the young women, and girls of upwards of 10 years, and then placing their parents in a circle, they ordered them to sing psalms, while they ravished their children, or else they swore they would cut them to pieces afterwards. They then took all the married women who had young children, and threatened, if they did not consent to the gratification of their lusts, to burn their children before their faces in a large fire which they had kindled for that purpose.

A band of count Tilly's soldiers meeting with a company of merchants belonging to Basil, who were returning from the great market of Strasburg, they attempted to surround them: all escaped, however, but ten, leaving their properties behind. The ten who were taken begged hard for their lives; but the soldiers murdered them, saying, You must die because you are heretics, and have got no money.

The same soldiers met with two countesses, who, together with some young ladies, the daughters of one of them, were taking an airing in a landau. The soldiers spared their lives, but treated them with great indecency, and having stripped them all stark naked, bade the coachman drive on.

At last, by means and mediation of Great-Britain, peace was restored to Germany, and the protestants remained unmolested for several years, till some new disturbances broke out in the Palatinate, which were occasioned in the following manner.

The great church of the Holy Ghost, at Heidelberg, had, for many years, been shared equally by the protestants and Roman catholics, in this manner: the protestants performed divine service in the nave or body of the church; and the Roman catholics celebrated mass in the choir. Though this had been the custom time immemorial, the elector Palatine, at length, took it into his head not to suffer it any longer, declaring, that as Heidelberg was the place of his residence, and the church of the Holy Ghost the cathedral of his principal city, divine service ought to be performed only according to the rites of the church of which he was a member. He then forbade the protestants to enter the church, and put the papists in possession of the whole.

The people thus aggrieved applied to the protestant powers for redress, which so much exasperated the elector, that he suppressed the Heidelberg catechism. The protestant powers, however, unanimously agreed to demand satisfaction, as the elector, by this conduct, had broke an article of the treaty of Westphalia; and the courts of Great-Britain, Prussia, Holland, &c. sent deputies to the elector, to represent the injustice of his proceedings, and to threaten, unless he changed his behaviour to the protestants in the Palatinate, that they would treat their Roman catholic subjects with the greatest severity. Many violent disputes took place between the protestant powers, and those of the elector, and these were greatly augmented by the following incident: the coach of the Dutch minister standing before the door of the resident sent by the prince of Hesse, the host was by chance carrying to a sick person; the coachman took not the least notice, which those who attended the host observing, pulled him from his box, and compelled him to kneel: this violence to the domestic of a public minister was highly resented by all the protestant deputies; and, still more to heighten these differences, the protestants presented to the deputies three additional articles of complaint.

1. That military executions were ordered against all protestant shoe-makers who should refuse to contribute to the masses of St. Crispin.

2. That the protestants were forbid to work on popish holidays, even in harvest time, under very heavy penalties, which occasioned great inconveniences, and considerably prejudiced public business.

3. That several protestant ministers had been dispossessed of their churches, under pretence of their having been originally founded, and built by Roman catholics.

At length the protestant deputies became so serious, as to intimate to the elector, that force of arms should compel him to do the justice he denied to their representations. This menace brought him to reason, as he well knew the impossibility of carrying on a war against the powerful states who threatened him. He, therefore, agreed, that the use of the body of the church of the Holy Ghost should be restored to the protestants. He restored the Heidelberg catechism, put the protestant ministers again in possession of the churches of which they had been dispossessed, allowed the protestants to work on popish holidays; and ordered, that no person should be molested for not kneeling when the host passed by.

All these things he did through fear; but to shew his resentment to his protestant subjects, in other circumstances where protestant states had no right to interfere, he totally abandoned Heidelberg, removing all the courts of justice to Mannheim, which was intirely inhabited by Roman catholics. He likewise built a new palace there, making it his place of residence; and, being followed by the Roman catholics of Heidelberg, Mannheim became a flourishing place.

In the mean time the protestants of Heidelberg sunk into poverty, and many of them became so distressed, as to quit their native country, and seek an asylum in protestant states. A great number of these coming into England, in the time of queen Anne, were cordially received here, and met with a most humane assistance, both by public and private donations.

In 1732, above 30,000 protestants were, contrary to the treaty of Westphalia, driven from the archbishopric of Saltzburg. They went away in the depth of winter, with scarce cloaths to cover them, and without provisions, not having permission to take any thing with them. The cause of these poor people not being publicly espoused by such states as could obtain them redress, they emigrated to various protestant countries, and settled in places where they could enjoy the free exercise of their religion, without hurting their consciences, and live free from the trammels of popish superstition, and the chains of papal despotism.

A Circumstantial Account of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and MARTYRDOM, of JOHN HUSS, who was BURNT to DEATH at CONSTANCE in GERMANY, for maintaining the DOCTRINES of WICKLIFFE, the ENGLISH REFORMIST.

THIS man was born at Hussenitz, a village in Bohemia, about the year 1380. His parents gave him the best education their circumstances would admit: and having acquired a tolerable knowledge of the classics at a private school, he was removed to the university of Prague, where he soon gave strong proofs of his mental powers, and was remarkable for his diligence and application to study.

Huss commenced bachelor of divinity in 1408, and was after successively chosen pastor of the church of Bethlehem, in Prague, and dean and rector of the university. In these stations he discharged his duties with great fidelity, and became at length so conspicuous for his preaching, (which was in conformity with the doctrines of Wickliffe) that it was not likely he could long escape the notice of the pope, and his adherents, against whom he inveighed with no small degree of asperity and rage.

Wickliffe the English reformist had so kindled the light of reformation, that it began to illumine the darkest corners of popery and ignorance. His doctrines spread into Bohemia, and were well received by great numbers of people, but by none so particularly as John Huss, and his zealous friend and fellow-martyr, Jerom of Prague.

The archbishop of Prague, finding the reformists daily increasing, issued a decree to suppress the farther spreading of Wickliffe's writings: but this had an effect quite different to what he expected, for it stimulated the friends of these doctrines to greater zeal, and almost the whole university united in propagating them.

Huss had considerable influence in the university, not only on account of his learning, eloquence, and exemplary life, but also on account of some valuable privileges he had obtained from the king in behalf of the Bohemians in that seminary, by which many Germans had been obliged to leave it, and retire to Leipsic, who afterwards became, on that account, his most inveterate enemies.

Now strongly attached to the doctrines of Wickliffe, Huss violently opposed the decree of the archbishop, who, however, at length obtained a bull from the pope, giving him commission to prevent the publishing of Wickliffe's doctrines in his province. By virtue of this bull, the archbishop condemned the writings of Wickliffe: he also proceeded against four doctors, who had not delivered up the copies of that divine, and prohibited them, notwithstanding their privileges, to preach to any congregation. Dr. Huss, with some other members of the university, protested against these proceedings, and entered an appeal from the sentences of the archbishop.

When this affair was made known to the pope, he granted a commission to Cardinal Colonna, to cite John Huss to appear personally at the court of Rome, to answer the accusations laid against him, of preaching both errors and heresies. Dr. Huss desired to be excused from a personal appearance, and was so greatly favoured in Bohemia, that king Wenceslaus, the queen, the nobility, and the university, desired the pope to dispense with such an appearance; as also that he would not suffer the kingdom of Bohemia to lie under the accusation of heresy, but permit them to preach the gospel with freedom, in their places of worship.

Three proctors appeared for Dr. Huss before cardinal Colonna. They endeavoured to excuse his absence, and said, they were ready to answer in his behalf. But the cardinal declared Huss contumacious, and excommunicated him accordingly. The proctors appealed to the pope, who appointed four cardinals to examine the process: these commissioners confirmed the former sentence, and extended the excommunication, not only to Huss, but to all his friends and followers.

Huss, from this unjust sentence, appealed to a future council, but without success; and, notwithstanding so severe a decree, and an expulsion in consequence from his church in Prague, he retired to Hussenitz, his native place, where he continued to promulgate his new doctrine, both from the pulpit, and with the pen.

The letters which he wrote at this time were very numerous; and he compiled a treatise, in which he maintained, that reading the books of protestants could not be absolutely forbidden. He wrote in defence of Wickliffe's book on the trinity; and boldly declared against the vices of the pope, the cardinals, and the clergy of those corrupt times. He caused a writing to be fixed on the church of Bethlehem, charging the Roman catholic clergy with the following errors:

1. Of saying that we ought to pay adoration to the pope.
2. That the priests can remit the pain and guilt of sin.
3. That every one must obey his superiors, whether their commands are just or unjust.
4. That every excommunication, just or unjust, binds the excommunicated.

Besides these, he wrote many other books, all of which were penned with such strength of argument, as greatly to facilitate the spreading of his doctrines.

The persecutions against the protestants in England had been carried on for some time, and the most cruel scenes were exhibited. They now extended as far as Germany and Bohemia, where Dr. Huss, and Jerom of Prague, were particularly marked out to suffer death in the cause of religion.

In the month of November, in the year 1414, a general council was assembled at Constance, in Germany, in order, as was pretended, for the sole purpose of determining termining a dispute then depending between three persons who contended for the papacy; but the real motive was, to crush the progress of the reformation.

Now John Hufs was summoned to appear at this council; and to encourage him, the emperor sent him a safe-conduct, giving him permission freely to come to, and return from the council. When Hufs received this information, he told the persons who delivered it, "That he desired nothing more than to purge himself publicly of the imputation of heresy; and that he esteemed himself happy in having so fair an opportunity of it, as at the council to which he was summoned to attend."

Hufs, about the latter end of November, set out on his journey to Constance, accompanied by two Bohemian noblemen, who were among the most eminent of his disciples, and who followed him merely through respect and affection. He caused some placards, or writings, to be fixed upon the gates of the churches of Prague, in which he declared, that he went to the council to answer all allegations that might be made against him. He also declared, in all the cities through which he passed, that he was going to vindicate himself at Constance, and invited all his adversaries to be present for this purpose.

The compliments, and even reverence, which Hufs met with on his journey, were beyond imagination. The streets, and sometimes the very roads, were lined with people, whom respect, rather than curiosity, had brought together. He was ushered into the towns with great acclamations; and it may be said, that he passed through Germany in a kind of triumph. He could not help expressing his surprise at the treatment he received: "I thought (said he) I had been an outcast. I now see my worst friends are in Bohemia."

When Hufs arrived at Constance, he immediately took lodgings in a remote part of the city. A short time after his arrival, came one Stephen Paletz, who was employed by the clergy at Prague to manage the intended prosecution against him. Paletz was afterwards joined by Michael de Cassis, on the part of the court of Rome. These two declared themselves his accusers, and drew up a set of articles against him, which they presented to the pope, and the prelates of the council.

We have already observed, that the attendance of Dr. Hufs, at Constance, was, by the emperor's own request, who gave him a safe-conduct; notwithstanding which, according to the maxim of the council, that "Faith is not to be kept with heretics," when it was known that he was in the city, he was immediately arrested, and committed prisoner to a chamber in the palace.

Now this violation of common law and justice was particularly noticed by one of Hufs's friends, who urged the imperial safe-conduct; but the pope replied, he never granted any safe-conduct, nor was he bound by that of the emperor.

During Hufs's confinement, the council acted the part of inquisitors. They condemned the doctrines of Wickliffe, and even ordered his remains to be dug up, and burnt to ashes; which orders were strictly complied with.

In the interim the nobility of Bohemia and Poland strongly interceded for Hufs; and so far prevailed as to prevent his being condemned unheard, which had been resolved on by the commissioners appointed to try him.

As soon as he was brought before the council, the articles exhibited against him were read: they were upwards of forty in number, and chiefly extracted from his writings.

His examination being finished, he was taken from the court, and a resolution was formed by the council, to burn him as an heretic if he would not retract. He was then committed to a filthy prison, where, in the day time, he was so laden with fetters on his legs, that he could hardly move; and every night he was fastened by his hands to a ring against the walls of the prison.

Having continued some days in this situation, many noblemen of Bohemia interceded in his behalf. They drew up a petition for his release, which was presented to the council by several of the most distinguished nobles of Bohemia; notwithstanding which, for many enemies had Hufs in that court, that not the least attention was paid to it, and the wretched and persecuted reformer was compelled to bear with the punishment inflicted on him by that merciless tribunal.

Some short time after the petition was presented, four bishops, and two lords, were sent by the emperor to the prison, in order to prevail on Hufs to make a recantation. But he called God to witness, with tears in his eyes, that he was not conscious of having preached, or written, any thing against the truth of God, or the faith of his orthodox church. The deputies then represented the great wisdom and authority of the council: to which Hufs replied, "Let them send the meanest person of that council, who can convince me by argument from the word of God, and I will submit my judgment to him." This christian and pious answer had no effect, because he would not take the authority and learning of the council upon trust, without the least shadow of an argument offered. The deputies, therefore, finding they could not make any impression on him, departed, greatly astonished at the strength of his resolution.

Dr. Hufs was brought on the fourth of July for the last time, before the council. After a long examination he was desired to abjure, which he refused without the least hesitation. The bishop of Lodi then preached a bloody persecuting sermon, (concerning the destruction of heretics) the prologue to his intended punishment. After the close of the sermon his fate was determined, his vindication disregarded, and judgment was pronounced. His books were condemned, and he was declared a manifest heretic: he was convicted of having taught many heresies and pernicious errors; of having despised the keys of the church and ecclesiastical censures; of having seduced and given scandal to the faithful by his obstinacy, and having rashly appealed to the tribunal of Christ. The council therefore censured him for being obstinate and incorrigible, and ordained, "That he should be degraded from the priesthood, his books publicly burnt, and himself delivered to the secular power."

This sentence Hufs received without the least emotion. At the close of it he kneeled down with his eyes lifted towards heaven, and, with all the magnanimity of a primitive martyr, thus exclaimed: "May thy infinite mercy, O my God! pardon this injustice of mine enemies. Thou knowest the injustice of my accusations: how deformed with crimes I have been represented; how I have been oppressed with worthless witnesses, and a false condemnation; yet O my God! let that mercy of thine, which no tongue can express, prevail with thee not to avenge my wrongs."

But these excellent sentences were esteemed as so many expressions of treason, and tended to inflame his adversaries. Accordingly, the bishops appointed by the council stripped him of his priestly garments, degraded him, and put a paper mitre on his head, on which were painted devils, with this inscription: "A ring-leader of heretics."

The heroic martyr received this mock mitre with an air of unconcern, which seemed to give him dignity rather than disgrace. A serenity, nay even a joy appeared in his looks, which indicated that his soul had cut off many stages of a tedious journey in her way to the realms of everlasting peace and happiness.

When the ceremony of degradation was over, the bishops delivered Hufs to the emperor, who put him into the hands of the duke of Bavaria. His books were burnt at the gates of the church; and on the 6th of July he was led to the suburbs of Constance, to be burnt alive.

When he had reached the place of execution, he fell on his knees, sung several portions of the Psalms, looked stedfastly towards heaven, and repeated these words: "Into thy hands, O Lord! do I commit my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O most good and faithful God!"

As soon as the chain was put about him at the stake, he said, with a smiling countenance, "My Lord Jesus Christ Christ was bound with a harder chain than this for my sake, and why then should I be ashamed of this old rusty one?"

Even when the faggots were piled up to his very neck, the duke of Bavaria was so officious as to desire him to abjure. "No, (said Hufs) I never preached any doctrine of an evil tendency; and what I taught with my lips I now seal with my blood." He then said to the executioner, "You are now going to burn a goose, (the name of Hufs signifying goose in the Bohemian language) but in a century you will have a swan whom you can neither roast nor boil." If he was prophetic, he must have meant Martin Luther, who shone about an hundred years after, and who had a swan for his arms.

As soon as the flames were applied to the faggots, our martyr sung an hymn, with so loud and cheerful a voice, that he was heard through all the cracklings of the combustibles, and the noise of the multitude. At length his voice was interrupted by the severity of the flames, which soon put a period to his life.

A Circumstantial Account of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and MARTYRDOM, of JEROM of PRAGUE; who was BURNT to DEATH at CONSTANCE in GERMANY, for maintaining the DOCTRINES of WICKLIFFE, the ENGLISH REFORMIST.

JEROM of PRAGUE, who was the companion of Dr. Hufs, and may be said to be co-martyr with him, was born at Prague; and educated in that university, where he particularly distinguished himself for his great abilities and learning. He likewise visited several other learned seminaries in Europe, particularly the universities of Paris, Heidelberg, Cologne, and Oxford. At the latter place he became acquainted with the works of Wickliffe, and being a person of uncommon application he translated many of them into his native language, having, with great pains, made himself master of the English language.

Upon his return to Prague he professed himself an open favourer of Wickliffe, and finding that his doctrines had made a considerable progress in Bohemia, and that Hufs was the principal promoter of them, he became an assistant to him in the great work of reformation.

Jerom on the 4th of April, A. D. 1415, arrived at Constance, about three months before the death of Hufs. He entered the town privately, and consulting with some of the leaders of his party, whom he found there, was easily convinced he could not be of any service to his friend.

Understanding that his arrival at Constance was publicly known, and that the council intended to seize him, he thought it most prudent to retire. Accordingly, the next day he went to Iberling, an imperial town, about a mile from Constance. From this place he wrote to the emperor, and proposed his readiness to appear before the council, if he would give him a safe conduct; but this was refused. He then applied to the council, but met with an answer no less unfavourable than that from the emperor.

Thus being disappointed, Jerom caused papers to be put up in all the public places in Constance, particularly on the doors of the cardinals houses, in which he professed his readiness to appear at Constance in the defence of his character and doctrine, both which, he said, had been greatly defamed. He also declared, that if any error should be proved against him, he would with great readiness retract it; begging only that the faith of the council might be given for his security.

As he received no answer to these papers, he set out on his return to Bohemia. He had the precaution to take with him a certificate, signed by several of the Bohemian nobility then at Constance, testifying that he had used all prudent means in his power to procure an audit.

However, Jerom did not escape thus. He was seized at Hirsaw, by an officer belonging to the duke of Sultsbach, who, though unauthorized so to act, made little doubt of obtaining thanks from the council for a service so acceptable.

Now the duke of Sultsbach, having Jerom in his power, wrote to the council for directions how to proceed. The council, after expressing their obligations to the duke, desired him to send the prisoner immediately to Constance. The elector palatine met him on the way, and conducted him into the city, himself riding on horseback, with a numerous retinue, who led Jerom in fetters by a long chain; and immediately on his arrival he was committed to a loathsome dungeon.

In the same manner as Hufs had been treated so, was Jerom, only that he was much longer confined, and shifted from one prison to another. At length, being brought before the council, he desired that he might plead his own cause, and exculpate himself; which being refused him, he thus gave vent to his indignation: "What barbarity is this? For three hundred and forty days have I been confined in a variety of prisons. There is not a misery, there is not a want, which I have not experienced. To my enemies you have allowed the fullest scope of accusation: to me, you deny the least opportunity of defence. Not an hour will you now indulge me in preparing for my trial. You have swallowed the blackest calumnies against me. You have represented me as an heretic, without knowing my doctrine: as an enemy to the faith, before you knew what faith I professed: as a persecutor of priests, before you could have any opportunity of understanding my sentiments on that head. You are a general council: in you center all this world can communicate of gravity, wisdom, and sanctity: but still you are men, and men are seducible by appearances. The higher your character is for wisdom, the greater ought your care to be, not to deviate into folly. The cause I now plead is not my own cause: it is the cause of men: it is the cause of christians: it is a cause, which is to affect the rights of posterity; however the experiment is to be made in my person."

No effect however had this speech: Jerom was obliged to hear his charge read, which was reduced under five heads as follow:

1. That he was a derider of the papal dignity.
2. An opposer of the pope.
3. An enemy to the cardinals.
4. A persecutor of the prelates.
5. An hater of the christian religion.

Jerom to these several charges answered with an amazing force of elocution, and strength of argument. "Now, (said he) wretch that I am! whither shall I turn me! To my accusers? My accusers are as deaf as adders. To you, my judges? You are all prepossessed by the arts of my accusers."---After this speech Jerom was immediately remanded to his prison.

The trial of Jerom was brought on the third day after his accusation, and witnesses were examined in support of the charge. The prisoner was prepared for his defence, which appears almost incredible, when we consider he had been three hundred and forty days shut up in loathsome prisons, deprived of day-light, and almost starved for want of common necessities. But his spirit soared above these disadvantages, under which a man less animated would have sunk; nor was he more at a loss for quotations from fathers and ancient authors, than if he had been furnished with books of the best quality.

Such of the assembly as were most bigotted were unwilling he should be heard, knowing what effect eloquence is apt to have on the minds of the most prejudiced. At length, however, it was carried by the majority, that he should have liberty to proceed in his defence, which he began in such an exalted strain of moving elocution, that the heart of obdurate zeal was seen to melt, and the mind of superstition seemed to admit a ray of conviction. He made an admirable distinction between evidence as resting upon facts, and as supported by malice and calumny. He laid before the assembly the whole tenor of his life and conduct. He observed that the greatest and most holy men had been known to differ in points of speculation, with a view to distinguish truth, not to keep it concealed. He expressed a noble contempt of all his enemies, who would have induced him to retract the cause of virtue and truth. He entered upon an high encomium on Hufs; and declared he was ready to follow him in the glorious track of martyrdom. He then touched upon the most defensible doctrines of Wickliffe; and concluded with observing, that it was far from his intention to advance any thing against the state of the church of God: that it was only against the abuse of the clergy he complained: and that he could not help saying, it was certainly impious that the patrimony of the church, which was originally intended for the purpose of charity, and universal benevolence, should be prostituted to the pride of the eye, in feasts, foppish vestments, and other reproaches to the name and profession of religion.

When the trial was over, Jerom received the same sentence, that had been passed upon his martyred countryman. In consequence of this he was, in the usual stile of popish affectation, delivered over to the civil power: but as he was a layman, he had not to undergo the ceremony of degradation. They had prepared a cap of paper painted with red devils, which being put upon his head, he said, "Our Lord Jesus Christ, when he suffered death for me a most miserable sinner, did wear a crown of thorns upon his head; and I, for his sake, will wear this cap."

They allowed him two days in hopes that he would recant; in which time the cardinal of Florence used his utmost endeavours to bring him over. But they all proved ineffectual: Jerom was resolved to seal his doctrine with his blood; and he suffered death with the most distinguished magnanimity.

While going to the place of execution he sung several hymns; and when he came to the spot, which was the same where Hufs had been burnt, he kneeled down, and prayed fervently. He embraced the stake with great cheerfulness and resolution; and when the executioner went behind him to set fire to the faggots, he said, "Come here, and kindle it before my eyes; for if I had been afraid of it, I had not come to this place, having had so many opportunities of making my escape."

When the fire was kindled, he sung an hymn, but was soon interrupted by the flames; and the last words he was heard to say were,

Hanc animam in flammis offero, Christe, tibi!

"This soul in flames I offer, Christ, to thee!"

A Full and Particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in the NETHERLANDS.

SEEING that the light of the gospel was now successfully spread over the Netherlands, the pope instigated the emperor to commence a persecution against the protestants; when many thousands fell martyrs to superstitious malice and barbarous bigotry: among whom the following were the most remarkable.

One Wendelinuta, a pious protestant widow, was apprehended on account of her religion, when several monks, unsuccessfully, endeavoured to persuade her to recant. As they could not prevail, a Roman catholic lady of her acquaintance desired to be admitted to the dungeon in which she was confined, and promised to exert herself strenuously towards inducing the prisoner to abjure the reformed religion. When she was admitted to the dungeon, she did her utmost to perform the task she had undertaken; but finding her endeavours ineffectual, she said, Dear Wendelinuta, if you will not embrace our faith, at least keep the things which you profess secret within your own bosom, and strive to prolong your life. To which the widow replied, Madam, you know not what you say: for with the heart we believe to righteousness, but with the tongue confession is made unto salvation. As she positively refused to recant, her goods were confiscated, and she was condemned to be burnt. At the place of execution a monk held a cross to her, and bade her kiss and worship God. To which she answered, "I worship no wooden god, but the eternal God, who is in heaven." She was then executed, but through the before-mentioned Roman catholic lady, the favour was granted, that she should be strangled before the faggots were kindled.

There were two protestant clergymen burnt at Colen; a tradesman of Antwerp, named Nicholas, was tied up in a sack, thrown into the river, and drowned; and Pistorius, a learned student, was carried to the market of a Dutch village in a fool's coat, and committed to the flames.

A protestant minister was ordered to attend the execution of sixteen protestants who received sentence to be beheaded. This gentleman performed the function of his office with great propriety, exhorted them to repentance, and gave them comfort in the mercies of their Redeemer. As soon as the sixteen were beheaded, the magistrate cried out to the executioner, "There is another stroke remaining yet; you must behead the minister, he can never die at a better time than with such excellent precepts in his mouth, and such laudable examples before him." He was accordingly beheaded, though even many of the Roman catholics themselves reprobated this piece of treacherous and unnecessary barbarism.

One George Scherter, a minister of Saltzburg, was apprehended and committed to prison for instructing his flock in the knowledge of the gospel. While he was in confinement he wrote a confession of his faith; soon after which he was condemned, first to be beheaded, and afterwards to be burnt to ashes. In his way to the place of execution he said to the spectators, "That you may know I die a true christian, I will give you a sign." This was indeed verified in a most singular manner; for after his head was cut off, the body lying a short space of time with the belly to the ground, it suddenly turned upon the back, when the right foot crossed over the left, as did also the right arm over the left: and in this manner it remained till it was committed to the fire.

A learned man in Louviana, named Percival, was murdered in prison; and Justus Insparg was beheaded, for having Luther's sermons in his possession.

Giles Tilleman, a cutler of Brussels, was a man of great humanity and piety. Among others he was apprehended as a protestant, and many endeavours were made by the monks to persuade him to recant. He had once, by accident, a fair opportunity of escaping from prison, and being asked why he did not avail himself of it, he replied, "I would not do the keepers so much injury, as they must have answered for my absence, had I got away." When he was sentenced to be burnt, he fervently thanked God for granting him an opportunity, by martyrdom, to glorify his name. Perceiving, at the place of execution, a great quantity of faggots, he desired the principal part of them might be given to the poor, saying, a small quantity will suffice to consume me. The executioner offered to strangle him before the fire was lighted, but he would not consent, telling him, that he defied the flames; and, indeed, he gave up the ghost with such composure amidst them, that he hardly seemed sensible of their effects.

About the years 1543 and 1544, the persecution was carried on throughout all Flanders in a most violent and cruel manner. Some were condemned to perpetual imprisonment, others to perpetual banishment: but most were put to death either by hanging, drowning, immuring, burning, the rack, or burying alive.

One John de Boscare, a zealous protestant, was apprehended on account of his faith, in the city of Antwerp. On his trial he stedfastly professed himself to be of the reformed religion, which occasioned his immediate condemnation. The magistrate, however, was afraid to put him to death publicly, as he was popular through his great generosity, and almost universally beloved for his inoffensive life, and exemplary piety. A private execution being determined on, an order was given to drown him in prison. The executioner, accordingly, put him into a large tub; but Boscare struggling, and and getting his head above the water, the executioner stabbed him with a dagger in several places, till at last his dissolution was completed.

Another protestant, John de Buifons, was, about the same time, secretly apprehended, and privately executed at Antwerp. The number of protestants being great in that city, and the prisoner much respected, the magistrates feared an insurrection, and for that reason ordered him to be beheaded in prison.

Three persons were apprehended in Antwerp, A. D. 1568, named Scoblant, Hues, and Coomans. During their confinement they behaved with great fortitude and cheerfulness, confessing that the hand of God appeared in what had befallen them, and bowing down before the throne of his providence. In an epistle to some worthy protestants, they express themselves in the following words: "Since it is the will of the Almighty that we should suffer for his name, and be persecuted for the sake of his gospel, we patiently submit, and are joyful upon the occasion: though the flesh may rebel against the spirit, and hearken to the counsel of the old serpent, yet the truths of the gospel shall prevent such advice from being taken, and Christ shall bruise the serpent's head. We are not comfortless in confinement, for we have faith; we fear not affliction, for we have hope; and we forgive our enemies, for we have charity. Be not under apprehensions for us, we are happy in confinement through the promises of God, glory in our bonds, and exult in being thought worthy to suffer for the sake of Christ. We desire not to be released, but to be blessed with fortitude; we ask not liberty, but the power of perseverance; and wish for no change in our condition, but that which places a crown of martyrdom upon our heads."

Scoblant was first brought to his trial; when, persisting in the profession of his faith, he received sentence of death. On his return to prison, he earnestly requested the gaoler not to permit any friar to come hear him; saying, "They can do me no good, but may greatly disturb me. I hope my salvation is already sealed in heaven, and that the blood of Christ, in which I firmly put my trust, hath washed me from mine iniquities. I am now going to throw off this earthly mantle of clay, to be clad in robes of eternal glory, by whose celestial brightness I shall be freed from all errors. I hope I may be the last martyr to papal tyranny, and the blood already spilt found sufficient to quench the thirst of popish cruelty; that the church of Christ may have rest here, as his servants will hereafter." On the day of execution he took a pathetic leave of his fellow-prisoners. At the stake he fervently said the Lord's Prayer, and sung the fortieth Psalm; then commending his soul to God, he was destroyed by the flames.

Some short time after, Hues died in prison; upon which occasion Coomans wrote thus to his friends: "I am now deprived of my friends and companions; Scoblant is martyred, and Hues dead, by the visitation of the Lord; yet I am not alone; I have with me the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob; he is my comfort, and shall be my reward. Pray unto God to strengthen me to the end, as I expect every hour to be freed from this tenement of clay."

This man, on his trial, freely confessed himself of the reformed religion, answered with a manly fortitude to every charge against him, and proved the scriptural part of his answers from the gospel. The judge told him the only alternatives were, recantation or death; and concluded, by saying, "Will you die for the faith you profess?" To which Coomans replied, "I am not only willing to die, but to suffer the most excruciating torments for it: after which my soul shall receive it's confirmation from God himself, in the midst of eternal glory." Being condemned, he went cheerfully to the place of execution, and died with christian resignation, and manly fortitude.

Also one William Nassau fell a sacrifice to treachery, being assassinated in the fifty-first year of his age, by Baltazar Gerard, a native of Franche Comté, in the province of Burgundy. This murderer, in hopes of a reward here and hereafter, for killing an enemy to the king of Spain, and an enemy to the catholic religion, undertook to destroy the prince of Orange. Having procured fire-arms, he watched him as he passed through the great hall of his palace to dinner, and demanded a passport. The prince of Orange, observing that the assassin spoke with an hollow and confused voice, asked who he was? saying, he did not like his countenance. The prince answered, it was one that demanded a passport, which he should have presently.

Nothing farther passed before dinner, but afterwards, on the return of the prince and princess through the same hall, the assassin, standing concealed as much as possible by one of the pillars, fired at the prince, the balls entering at the left side, and passing through the right, wounding in their passage the stomach and vital parts. On receiving the wounds, the prince only said, Lord have mercy upon my soul, and upon this poor people, and then immediately expired.

General were the lamentations throughout the United Provinces, on account of the death of the prince of Orange; and the assassin, who was immediately taken, received sentence to be put to death in the most exemplary manner; yet such was his enthusiasm, or folly, that when his flesh was torn by red-hot pincers, he coolly said, If I was at liberty, I would commit such an action over again.

The funeral of the prince of Orange was the grandest ever seen in the Low Countries, and perhaps the sorrow for his death the most sincere, as he left behind him the character he honestly deserved, namely, that of being Father of his people.

In short, multitudes were murdered in different parts of Flanders; in the city of Valence, in particular, fifty-seven of the principal inhabitants were butchered in one day, for refusing to embrace the Romish superstition: and great numbers were suffered to languish in confinement, till they perished through the inclemency of their prisons.

A Full and Particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in LITHUANIA.

IN 1648 the persecutions in Lithuania began, and were carried on with great severity by the Cossacks and Tartars. The cruelty of the Cossacks was such, that even the Tartars, at last, grew ashamed of it, and rescued some of the intended victims from their hands.

The following were the chief barbarities exercised; skinning alive, cutting off hands, taking out the bowels, cutting the flesh open, putting out the eyes, beheading, scalping, cutting off feet, boring the shin bones, pouring melted lead into the flesh, sending to perpetual banishment, hanging, stabbing, &c. &c.

The Russians taking advantage of the devastations which had been made in the country, and of it's incapability of defence, entered it with a considerable army, and, like a flood, bore down all before them. Every thing they met with was an object of destruction; they razed cities, demolished castles, ruined fortresses, sacked towns, burnt villages, and murdered people. The ministers of the gospel were peculiarly marked out as the objects of their displeasure, though every worthy christian was liable to the effects of their barbarity.

Whenever Lithuania recovered itself after one persecution, succeeding enemies again destroyed it. The Swedes, the Prussians, and the Courlanders, carried fire and sword through it, and continual calamities, for some years, attended that unhappy district. It was then attacked by the prince of Transylvania, who had in his army, exclusive of his own Transylvanians, Hungarians, Moldavians, Servians, Walachians, &c. These, as far as they penetrated, wasted the country, destroyed the churches, rifled the nobility, burnt the houses, murdered the sick, and enslaved the healthy.

A clergyman, who wrote an account of the misfortunes of Lithuania, in the seventeenth century, says, "In consideration of these extremities, we cannot but adore the judgment of God poured upon us for our sins, and and deplore our sad condition. Let us hope for a deliverance from his mercy, and wish for restitution in his benevolence. Though we are brought low, though we are wasted, troubled, and terrified; yet his compassion is greater than our calamities, and his goodness superior to our afflictions. Our neighbours hate us at present, as much as our more distant enemies did before: they persecute the remnant of us still remaining, deprive us of our few churches left, banish our preachers, abuse our schoolmasters, treat us with contempt, and oppress us in the most opprobrious manner. In all our afflictions the truth of the gospel shone among us, and gave us comfort; and we only wished for the grace of Jesus Christ, (not only to ourselves, but to soften the hearts of our enemies) and the sympathy of our fellow christians."

A Full and Particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in POLAND.

EVERY one knows it hath been the fate of many pious people, in all ages of the world, to bear the cross of Christ, and suffer persecutions on account of their opinions; for those who are born after the flesh have always been enemies to such as are born after the Spirit: accordingly the protestants of Poland were persecuted in a dreadful manner. The ministers in particular were treated with the most unexampled barbarity; some having their tongues cut out, because they had preached the gospel truths; others being deprived of their sight on account of having read the bible; and great numbers were cut to pieces, for not recanting. Several private persons were put to death by various methods; the most cruel being usually preferred. Women were murdered without the least regard to their sex; and the persecutors even went so far as to cut off the heads of sucking babes, and fasten them to the breasts of their unfortunate mothers!!!

Not even the solemnity of the grave exempted the bodies of protestants from the malice of persecutors; for they sacrilegiously dug up the bodies of many eminent persons, and either cut them to pieces, and exposed them to be devoured by birds and beasts, or hung them up in places the most conspicuous and public.

In this persecution the city of Lesna particularly suffered; for being besieged and taken, the inhabitants were all destroyed.

A Full and Particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in CHINA.

THREE Italian missionaries, called Roger the Neapolitan, Pafis of Bologna, and Matthew Ricci of Mazerata, in the marquise of Ancona, first established christianity in China. These entered China about the beginning of the sixteenth century, being well circumstanced to perform their important commission with success, as they had previously made the Chinese language their constant study.

The assiduity of these three missionaries in the discharge of their duty was very great; but Roger and Pafis returning to Europe in a few years, the whole labour fell upon Ricci, who aimed to establish christianity with a degree of zeal that was indefatigable.

This man, though much disposed to indulge his converts as far as possible, made great hesitation at their ceremonies, which seemed to amount to idolatry. At length after eighteen years consideration, he began to soften his opinion, and tolerated all the parts of those customs which were ordered by the laws of the empire, but strictly enjoined his Chinese christians to omit the rest.

Such was the condition of christianity in China, when the christian church established there was governed only by Ricci, who, by his moderation, made innumerable converts. In 1630, however, this tranquillity was disturbed by the arrival of some new missionaries: these being unacquainted with the Chinese customs, manners, and language, and with the arguments on which Ricci's toleration was founded, were astonished when they saw christian converts prostrate before Confucius and the tables of their ancestors, and accordingly condemned the custom.

Now a warm controversy ensued between Ricci, seconded by his converts, and the new missionaries; and the latter wrote an account of the whole affair to the pope, and the society for the propagation of the christian faith. The society soon pronounced, that the ceremonies were idolatrous and intolerable, and the pope confirmed the sentence. In this both the society and the pope were excusable, as the matter had been misrepresented to them; for the enemies of Ricci had affirmed, the halls, in which the ceremonies were performed, to be temples, and the ceremonies themselves the sacrifices of idolatry.

The above-mentioned sentence was sent over to China, but treated with contempt, and matters remained as they were for some time. At length, a true representation of the matter was sent over, setting forth, that the Chinese customs and ceremonies alluded to were entirely free from idolatry, being merely political, and tending only to the peace and welfare of the empire. The pope, finding that he had made himself ridiculous, by confirming an absurd sentence upon a false report, wanted to get rid of the affair, and therefore referred the representation to the inquisition, which reversed the sentence immediately, at the private desire of the pope, as may be naturally conjectured.

However the christian church, for all these divisions, flourished in China till the death of the first Tartar emperor, whose successor was a minor. During this minority of the young emperor Cang-hi, the regents and nobles conspired to extirpate the christian religion. The execution of this design was begun with expedition, and carried on with severity, so that every christian teacher in China, as well as those who professed the faith, were struck with amazement. John Adam Schall, a German ecclesiastic, and one of the principals of the mission, was thrown into a dungeon in the year 1664, but narrowly escaped with his life, being then in the seventy-fourth year of his age.

In 1665, the ensuing year, the ministers of state publicly and unanimously resolved, and made a decree as follows:

1. That the christian doctrines were false.
2. That they were dangerous to the interest of the empire.
3. That they should not be practised under pain of death.

A most furious and general persecution was the result of the publication of this decree, in which some were put to death, many were ruined, and all were, in some manner, oppressed. This decree was general, and the persecution universal accordingly throughout the empire; for, previous to this, the christians had been partially persecuted at different times, and in different provinces.

In four years after, viz. 1669, the young emperor was declared of age, and took the reins of government upon himself, when by his order the persecution immediately ceased.

A Full and Particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in JAPAN.

CHRISTIANITY was first introduced into the idolatrous empire of Japan, by some Portuguese missionaries in or about the year of our Lord 1552, and their endeavours in making converts to the light of the gospel met with a degree of success equal to their most sanguine desires.

This good fortune continued till the year 1616, when the missionaries being accused of having concerned themselves in politics, and formed a plan to subvert the government, and dethrone the emperor, great jealousies subsisted till 1622, when the court commenced a dreadful persecution against both foreign and native christians.

Such.

Such was the rage of this persecution, that, during the first four years, no less than 20,570 christians were massacred. The public profession of christianity was prohibited under pain of death, and the churches were shut up by an express order.

Several who were informed against, as privately professing christianity, suffered martyrdom with great heroism. The persecution continued many years, when the remnant of the innumerable christians, with which Japan abounded, to the number of 37,000 souls, retired to the town and castle of Siniabara, in the island of Xinio, where they determined to make a stand, to continue in their faith, and to defend themselves to the very last extremity of all.

Hereupon the Japanese army pursued the christians, and laid siege to the place. The christians defended themselves with great bravery, and held out against the besiegers for the space of three months, but were at length compelled to surrender, when men, women, and children, were indiscriminately murdered; and christianity, in their martyrdoms, entirely extirpated from Japan.

It was on the 12th of April, 1638, that this event took place, since which period no christians but the Dutch are allowed to land in the empire, and even they are obliged to conduct themselves with the greatest precaution, and to carry on their commerce with the utmost circumspection and care.

SUMMARY of the PERSECUTIONS and OPPRESSIONS against the CHRISTIANS in ABYSSINIA, or ETHIOPIA.

ABOUT the conclusion of the fifteenth century, and soon after the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, some Portuguese missionaries made a voyage to Abyssinia, and were indefatigable in propagating the Roman catholic doctrine among the Abyssinians, who professed christianity before the arrival of the missionaries.

Now the priests, employed in this mission, gained such influence at court, that the emperor consented to abolish the established rites of the Ethiopian church, and to admit those of Rome. He soon after consented to receive a patriarch from Rome, and to acknowledge the pope's supremacy.

Several of the most powerful lords, and a majority of the people who professed the primitive christianity, as first established in Abyssinia, opposed these innovations, and took up arms against the emperor. Thus, by the artifices of the court of Rome, and its emissaries, a most furious civil war was begun, and the whole empire thrown into commotion. This war was carried on through several reigns, its continuance being above 100 years, and the court constantly siding with the Roman catholics, the primitive christians of Abyssinia were severely persecuted, and multitudes perished by the most inhuman methods.

SUMMARY of the PERSECUTIONS and OPPRESSIONS against the CHRISTIANS in TURKEY.

THE great impostor, Mahomet, in the infancy of his new religion, tolerated christianity through a political motive, as he was sensible, that even in those early times it had several powerful espousers among the princes, who were his contemporaries. As a proof that this was his sole view, as soon as he found his doctrine was established on a more permanent situation, he altered his forbearance to a system of the most rigid and barbarous persecution; which diabolical plan he has particularly recommended to his misguided followers, in that part of his Alcoran, intituled, The Chapter of the Sword; and as proofs of the blind zeal his followers have adopted from his infernal tenets, the many bloody battles of the Turks with the whole of the professors of Christ's gospel, and their cruel massacres of them at various periods, sufficiently evince.

In the year 1453, Constantine was besieged in Constantinople, by Mahomet the Second, with an army of 300,000 men, when, after a bloody siege of about six weeks, on the 29th of May, 1453, it fell into the hands of the infidels, after being an imperial christian city for some centuries; and the Turks have, to this day, retained possession of it, as well as of the adjoining suburb of Pera.

The Turks, on entering Constantinople, exercised on the wretched christians the most unrelenting barbarity, destroying them by every method the most hellish cruelty could invent, or the most unfeeling heart practise: some they roasted alive on spits; others they flayed alive, and in that horrid manner left to expire with hunger: many were sawed asunder, and others torn to pieces by horses. For full three days and nights the Turks were striving to exceed each other in the exercise of their shocking carnage, and savage barbarity; murdering, without distinction of age or sex, all they met, and brutally violating the chastity of women, of every age and distinction.

About the year 1529, Solymán the First retook Buda from the christians, and shewed the most horrible persecution of the inhabitants; some had their eyes torn out, others their hands, ears, and noses cut off, and the children their privities, the virgins were deflowered, the matrons had their breasts cut off, and such that were pregnant had their wombs ripped open, and their unborn babes thrown into the flames. Not content with this, he repeated these horrid examples all the way on his march to Vienna, which he ineffectually besieged, during which, this diabolical barbarian, having made a body of christians prisoners, he sent three of them into the city to relate the great strength of his army, and the rest he ordered to be torn limb from limb by wild horses in sight of their christian brethren, who could only lament by their cries and tears the dreadful fate of these poor sufferers.

The tender children were frequently in sight of their wretched parents torn to pieces by beasts, others dragged at horses heels, some famished with hunger, and others buried up to their necks in earth, and in that manner left to perish. In short, were we to relate the innumerable massacres and deplorable tragedies acted by the infidels, the particulars would at least make a volume of themselves, and from their horrid similarity be not only shocking, but disgusting to any reader of sensibility.

The several PERSECUTIONS and OPPRESSIONS in the STATES of BARBARY.

THE christians are treated in Algiers with particular severity; as the Algerines are some of the most perfidious, as well as the most cruel of all the inhabitants of Barbary. By paying a most exorbitant fine, some christians are allowed the title of Free Christians; and these are permitted to dress in the fashion of their respective countries, but the christian slaves are obliged to wear a coarse grey suit, and a seaman's cap.

The following are the various punishments among the Algerines.

1. If they join any of the natives in open rebellion, they are strangled with a bow-string, or hanged on an iron hook.

2. If they speak against Mahomet, they must either turn Mahometans, or be impaled alive.

3. If they turn christians again, after having changed to the Mahometan persuasion, they are roasted alive, or thrown from the city walls, and caught upon large sharp hooks, where they hang in a miserable manner several days, and expire in the most exquisite tortures.

4. If they kill a Turk, they are burnt.

5. If ever they attempt to escape from slavery, and are re-taken, they suffer death in the following manner, which is equally singular and brutal: the criminal is hung naked on a high gallows, by two hooks, the one fastened quite through the palm of one hand, and the other through the sole of the opposite foot, where he is left till death relieves him from his cruel sufferings.

The several other punishments, for trifling crimes committed by the christians, are left to the discretion of the respective judges, who being usually of malicious and vindictive dispositions, decree tortures the most inhuman.

At Tunis, if a christian slave is caught in attempting to escape, his limbs are all broken; and if he murders his master, he is fastened to the tail of a horse, and dragged about the streets till he expires.

Fez and Morocco conjointly form an empire, and are together the most considerable of the Barbary states. In this empire christian slaves are treated with the greatest cruelty: the rich have exorbitant ransoms fixed upon them; the poor are hard worked, and half starved, and sometimes murdered by the emperor, or their masters, for mere diversion.

Curfory VIEW of the PERSECUTIONS in SPANISH AMERICA.

THE sanguine tenets of the Roman catholic persuasion, and the cruel disposition of the votaries of that church, cannot be more amply displayed, or truly depicted, than by giving an authentic and simple narrative of the horrid barbarities exercised by the Spaniards on the innocent and unoffending natives of America. Indeed, the barbarities were such, that they would scarce seem credible from their enormity, and the victims so many, that they would startle belief by their numbers, if the facts were not indisputably ascertained, and the circumstances admitted by their own writers, some of whom have even gloried in their inhumanity, and, as Roman catholics, deemed those atrocious actions meritorious, which would make a protestant shudder in reciting.

In 1492, the West-Indies, and the vast continent of America, were discovered by that celebrated navigator Christopher Columbus. This distinguished commander landed first in the large Island of St. Domingo, or Hispaniola, which was at that time exceedingly populous; but this population was of very little consequence, the inoffensive inhabitants being murdered by multitudes, as soon as the Spaniards gained a permanent footing in the island. Blind superstition, bloody bigotry, and craving avarice, rendered that, in the course of years, a dismal desert, which, at the arrival of the Spaniards, seemed to appear as an earthly paradise; so that at present there is scarce remaining a remnant of the ancient natives.

The natives of Guatemala, a country of America, were used with great barbarity. They were formerly active and valiant, but from ill-usage and oppression grew slothful, and so dispirited, that they not only trembled at the sight of fire arms, but even at the very looks of a Spaniard. Some were so plunged into despair, that after returning home from labouring hard for their cruel task-masters, and receiving only contemptuous language and stripes for their pains, they have sunk down in their cabins, with a full resolution to prefer death to such slavery; and, in the bitterness of their anguish, having refused all sustenance, thus expired.

The vindictive and merciless Spaniards by repeated barbarities, and the most execrable cruelties, not only depopulated Hispaniola, Porto-Rico, Cuba, Jamaica, and the Bahama islands, but in the space of 40 years, destroyed above 12,000,000 of souls upon the continent of America.

Not only innumerable were the cruel methods by which they massacred and butchered the poor natives, but likewise of the most diabolical nature.

Thus the Spaniards stripped a large and very populous town of all its inhabitants, whom they drove to the mines, leaving all the children behind them, without the least idea of providing for their subsistence, by which inhuman proceeding six thousand helpless infants perished for want.

As soon as the people of any town had the reputation of being rich, an order was immediately sent, that every person in it should turn Roman catholics; if this was not directly complied with, the town was instantly plundered, and the inhabitants murdered; and if it was complied with, a pretence was soon after made to strip the inhabitants of their treasure.

One of the Spanish governors having seized upon a very worthy and amiable Indian prince, in order to extort from him where his treasures were concealed, caused his feet to be burnt till the marrow dropped from his bones, and he expired through the extremity of the torments he underwent.

During the interval, i. e. between the years 1514 and 1522, the governor of Terra Firma put to death, and destroyed, 800,000 of the inhabitants of that country.

Also between the years 1523 and 1533, five hundred thousand natives of Nicaragua were transported to Peru, where they all perished by incessant labour in the mines.

During the space of twelve years, from the first landing of Cortez on the continent of America, to the entire reduction of the populous empire of Mexico, the amazing number of 4,000,000 of Mexicans perished, through the unparalleled barbarity of the Spaniards. To come to particulars, the city of Cholula consisted of 30,000 houses, by which its great population may be imagined. The Spaniards seized on all the inhabitants, who refusing to turn Roman catholics, as they did not know the meaning of the religion they were ordered to embrace, the Spaniards put them all to death, cutting to pieces the lower sort of people, and burning those of distinction.

C H A P. V.

Containing a Copious ACCOUNT of the Several PERSECUTIONS and OPPRESSIONS in GREAT-BRITAIN and IRELAND.

GILDAS, the most ancient British writer extant, who lived about the time that the Saxons left this island, has drawn a most shocking instance of the barbarity of those people. This author informs us, that the Saxons, on their arrival, being heathens like the Picts and Scots, destroyed the churches and murdered the clergy wherever they came: but they could not destroy christianity, for those who would not submit to the the Saxon yoke, went and resided beyond the Severn. Neither have we the names of those christian sufferers transmitted to us, especially those of the clergy.

The massacre of the monks of Bangor, A. D. 586, was the most dreadful instance of barbarity under the Saxon government. These monks were in all respects different from those men who bear the same name at present.

The Danes, a roving crew of barbarians, landed in different parts of Britain, both in England and Scotland, in the 8th century.

They were at first repulsed, but in A. D. 857, a party of them landed somewhere near Southampton, and not only robbed the people, but murdered the clergy, and burnt down the churches.

These barbarians penetrated into the center of England, and took up their quarters at Nottingham in 868; but the English, under their king Ethelfrid, drove them from those posts, and obliged them to retire to Northumberland.

About 870, another body of these barbarians landed in Norfolk, and engaged in battle with the English at Hertford. Victory declared in favour of the pagans, who took Edmund, king of the East Angles, prisoner, and after treating him with a thousand indignities, transfixing his body with arrows, and then beheaded him.

They burnt many of the churches, and among the rest that belonging to the Culdees, at St. Andrew's in Fifeshire, in Scotland. The piety of these men made them objects of abhorrence to the Danes, who, wherever they went, singled out the christian priests for destruction, of whom no less than 200 were massacred in Scotland.

Thus it was in that part of Ireland now called Leinster; there the Danes murdered and burnt the priests alive in their own churches; they carried destruction along with them wherever they went, sparing neither age nor sex, but the clergy were the most obnoxious to them, because they ridiculed their idolatry, and persuaded their people to have nothing to do with them.

About the reign of Edward III. the church of England was extremely corrupted with errors and superstition; and the light of the gospel of Christ was greatly eclipsed and darkened with human inventions, burthensome ceremonies, and gross idolatry.

All the followers of Wickliffe, then called Lollards, were become extremely numerous, and the clergy were vexed to see them increase. Whatever power of influence they might have to molest them in an underhand manner, they had no authority by law to put them to death. However, the clergy embraced the favourable opportunity, and prevailed upon the king to suffer a bill to be brought into parliament, by which all Lollards who remained obstinate, should be delivered over to the civil power, and burnt as heretics. This act was the first in this island for the burning of people for their religious sentiments; it passed in the year 1401, and was soon after put into execution.

William Santree or Sawtree, was the first person who suffered in consequence of this cruel act; he was a priest, and was burnt to death in Smithfield.

A short time after this, lord Cobham, in consequence of his attachment to the doctrines of Wickliffe, was accused of heresy, and being condemned to be hanged and burnt, was accordingly executed in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, A. D. 1419.

Thomas Badley, a taylor, and a layman, was the next man who suffered under this bloody statute; and a letter having been tendered to him, which he refused, he was declared an obstinate heretic, and tied to the stake in Smithfield; where he was burnt alive, rejoicing in the Lord his God.

William Thorpe was the next person we read of who was tried upon this abominable statute; he was a man of some knowledge, who adhered to all the doctrines taught by Wickliffe. He was brought many times before archbishop Arundel, and at last committed a close prisoner, where he died, but in what manner cannot now be ascertained.

At this time 36 persons, denominated Lollards, suffered death in St. Giles's, for no other reason than professing their attachment to the doctrines of Wickliffe. They were hung on gibbets, and faggots being placed under them, as soon as they were suspended, fire was set to them, so that they were burnt while hanging. Only one of their names has been transmitted to us, which is that of sir Roger Archer, whom they distinguished from the rest by stripping him stark naked, and executing him in that indecent manner.

About the same time one Richard Turning was burned alive in Smithfield, and suffered with all that constancy, fortitude, and resignation, which have so much distinguished the primitive christians.

Abraham, a monk of Colchester, Milburn White, a priest, and John Wade, a priest, were all three apprehended on a charge of heresy, in 1428.

A short time after father Abraham suffered at Colchester, and with him John Whaddon; both of whom died in a constant adherence to the truth of the gospel. Milburn White and John Wade suffered also about the same time in London.

About the year 1430, Richard Ilvedon, a wool-comber, and a citizen of London, was brought before the archbishop, and being declared an obstinate heretic, was burnt alive on Tower-hill, for no other reason than that he embraced and professed the doctrines of Wickliffe.

About the year 1431, Thomas Bagley, a priest, who had a living near Malden, in Essex, was brought before the bishop of London, and being declared an obstinate heretic, was condemned and burned alive in Smithfield.

About the year 1439, Richard Wick, a priest, was burned alive on Tower-hill, for preaching the doctrines of Wickliffe.

About 1440, some of the greatest persons in the kingdom were condemned to perpetual imprisonment for heresy, as being Lollards; among whom was the duchess of Gloucester, who had long been a follower of Wickliffe. It was otherwise, however, with Roger Only, a priest, who being condemned as an obstinate heretic, was burnt alive in Smithfield.

One Thomas Granter was apprehended in London, August, 1473; he was accused of professing the doctrines of Wickliffe, for which he was condemned as an obstinate heretic. This pious man being brought to the sheriff's house, on the morning of the day appointed for his execution, desired a little refreshment, and having eat some, he said to the people present, "I eat now a very good meal, for I have a strange conflict to engage with before I go to supper;" and having eaten, he returned thanks to God for the bounties of his all-gracious providence, requesting that he might be instantly led to the place of execution, to bear testimony to the truth of those principles which he had professed. Accordingly he was chained to a stake on Tower-hill, where he was burned alive, professing the truth with his last breath.

Joan Boughton, a lady of considerable rank, was burned in Smithfield for professing the doctrines of Wickliffe, April 28th, 1494. This lady was no less than 80 years of age, and a widow.

The king being at Canterbury, in 1498, a priest was brought before him, accused of heresy, who was immediately ordered to be burnt alive.

About the year 1499, one Babram, a pious man, was brought before the bishop of Norwich, having been accused by some of the priests, with holding the doctrines of Wickliffe. He confessed he did believe every thing that was objected against him. For this, he was condemned as an obstinate heretic, and a warrant was granted for his execution; accordingly he was brought to the stake at Norwich, where he suffered with great constancy.

One William Tilfery, a pious man, was burned alive at Amersham, in a close called Stoney-prat, in 1506, and at the same time, his daughter, Joan Clarke, a married woman, was obliged to light the faggots that were to burn her father.

Also this year one father Roberts, a priest, was convicted viſited of being a Lollard before the biſhop of Lincoln, and burnt alive at Buckingham.

One Thomas Norris was burned alive for the testimony of the truth of the goſpel, at Norwich, in 1507. This man was a poor, inoffenſive, harmleſs perſon, but his pariſh prieſt converſing with him one day, conjectured he was a Lollard. In conſequence of this ſuppoſition he gave information to the biſhop, and Norris was apprehended.

One Lawrence Gualle, who had been kept in priſon two years, was burnt alive at Salisbury in 1508, for denying the real preſence in the ſacrament. It appeared, that this man kept a ſhop in Salisbury, and entertained ſome Lollards in his houſe; for which he was informed againſt to the biſhop; but he abode by his firſt testimony, and was condemned to ſuffer as an heretic.

Alſo a pious woman was burnt at Chippen Sudburne, by order of the chancellor, Doctor Whittenham. After ſhe had been conſumed in the flames, and the people were returning home, a bull broke looſe from a butcher, and ſingling out the chancellor from all the reſt of the company, he gored him through the body, and on his horns carried his entrails. This was ſeen by all the people, and it is remarkable, that the animal did not meddle with any other perſon whatever.

William Succling and John Bannifter, who had formerly recanted, returned again to the profeſſion of the faith, and were burned alive in Smithfield, Oct. 18, 1511.

About the year 1517, one John Brown, (who had recanted before in the reign of Henry VII. and bore a faggot round St. Paul's,) was condemned by Dr. Wonhaman, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and burnt alive at Aſhfild. Before he was chained to the ſtake, the archbiſhop Wonhaman, and Yeſter, biſhop of Rochelter, cauſed his feet to be burned in a fire till all the fleſh came off, even to the bones. This was done in order to make him again recant, but he perſiſted in his attachment to the truth till the laſt.

Alſo about this time one Richard Hunn, a merchant taylor of the city of London, was apprehended, having reſuſed to pay the prieſt his fees for the funeral of a child; and being conveyed to the Lollards Tower, in the palace of Lambeth, was there privately murdered by ſome of the ſervants of the archbiſhop.

On September 24, 1518, John Stilincen, who had before recanted, was apprehended, brought before Richard Fitz-James, biſhop of London, and on the 25th of October was condemned as an heretic. He was chained to the ſtake in Smithfield amidſt a vaſt crowd of ſpectators, and ſealed his testimony to the truth with his blood. He declared that he was a Lollard, and that he had always believed the opinions of Wickliſſe; and although he had been weak enough to recant his opinions, yet he was now willing to convince the world that he was ready to die for the truth.

Thomas Mann was burnt in London, in 1519, as was one Robert Celin, a plain honeſt man, for ſpeaking againſt image worſhip and pilgrimages.

Alſo about this time, was executed in Smithfield, in London, James Brewſter, a native of Colcheſter. His ſentiments were the ſame as the reſt of the Lollards, or thoſe who followed the doctrines of Wickliſſe; but notwithstanding the innocence of his life, and the regularity of his manners, he was obliged to ſubmit to papal revenge.

The ſame year, one Chriſtopher, a ſhoemaker, was burned alive at Newbury, in Berkiſhire, for denying thoſe popiſh articles which we have already mentioned. This man had got ſome books in Engliſh, which were ſufficient to render him obnoxious to the Romiſh clergy.

Thomas Bernard was burned alive at Norwich in 1521, for denying the real preſence.

In the beginning of the year 1522, Mr. Wrigſham, a glover; Mr. Langdale, a holer; Thomas Bond, Robert Harchets, and William Archer, ſhoemaker, with Mrs. Smith, a widow, were apprehended on Aſh Wedneſday, and committed to priſon. After examination, the biſhop of Litchfield declared them to be heretics, and they were all condemned and burned alive at Coventry.

Robert Silks, who had been condemned in the Biſhop's court as an heretic, made his eſcape out of priſon, but was taken two years afterwards, and brought back to Coventry, where he was burned alive. The ſheriffs always ſeized the goods of the martyrs for their own uſe, ſo that their wives and children were left to ſtarve.

Thomas Harding, who, with his wife, had been accused of hereſy, was brought before the biſhop of Lincoln in 1532, and condemned for denying the real preſence in the ſacrament. He was then chained to a ſtake, erected for the purpoſe, at Cheſham in the Pell, near Botely; and when they had ſet fire to the faggots, one of the ſpectators daſhed out his brains with a billet. The prieſts told the people, that whoever brought faggots to burn heretics would have an indulgence to commit ſins for forty days.

About the latter end of this year, Worham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, apprehended one Hitten, a prieſt, at Maidſtone; and after he had been long tortured in priſon, and ſeveral times examined by the archbiſhop, and Fiſher, biſhop of Rochelter, he was condemned as an heretic, and burned alive before the door of his own pariſh church.

One Thomas Bilney, profeſſor of civil law, at Cambridge, was brought before the biſhop of London, and ſeveral other biſhops, in the Chapter-houſe, Weſtminſter, and being ſeveral times threatened with the ſtake and flames, he was weak enough to recant; but he repented ſeverely afterwards.

On this account he was brought before the biſhops a ſecond time, and condemned to death. Before he went to the ſtake he confeſſed his adherence to thoſe opinions which Luther held; and, when at it, he ſmiled, and ſaid, "I have had many ſtorms in this world, but now my veſſel will ſoon be on ſhore in heaven. He ſtood unmoved in the flames, crying out, "Jeſus, I believe;" and theſe were the laſt words he was heard to utter.

Some few weeks after Bilney had ſuffered, Richard Byfield was caſt into priſon, and endured ſome whipping, for his adherence to the doctrines of Luther: this Mr. Byfield had been ſome time a monk, at Barnes, in Surry, but was converted, by reading Tindal's verſion of the New Teſtament. The ſufferings this man underwent for the truth were ſo great, that it would require a volume to contain them. Sometimes he was ſhut up in a dungeon, where he was almoſt ſuffocated by the offenſive and horrid ſmell of filth and ſtagnated water. At other times he was tied up by the arms, till almoſt all his joints were diſlocated. He was whipped at the poſt ſeveral times, till ſcarce any fleſh was left on his back; and all this was done to make him recant. He was then taken to the Lollards' Tower in Lambeth palace, where he was chained by the neck to the wall, and once every day beaten in the moſt cruel manner by the archbiſhop's ſervants. At laſt he was condemned, degraded, and burnt in Smithfield.

John Tewksbury was the next perſon that ſuffered. This was a plain ſimple man, who had been guilty of no other offence, againſt what was called the holy mother church, than that of reading Tindal's tranſlation of the New Teſtament. At firſt he was weak enough to abjure, but afterwards repented, and acknowledged the truth. For this he was brought before the biſhop of London, who condemned him as an obſtinate heretic. He ſuffered greatly during the time of his imprifonment, ſo that when they brought him out to execution, he was almoſt dead. He was conducted to the ſtake in Smithfield, where he was burned, declaring his utter abhorrence of popery, and profeſſing a firm belief that his cauſe was juſt in the ſight of God.

About this time Valentine Treeſt, and his wife, were apprehended in Yorkſhire, and having been examined by the archbiſhop, were deemed as obſtinate heretics, and burnt.

James Baynham was the next perſon that ſuffered in this reign, a reputable citizen in London, who had married the widow of a gentleman in the Temple. When chained to the ſtake he embraced the faggots, and ſaid, Oh,

The Burning of the Rev<sup>d</sup> Mr. Brabram, in Norfolk.

The Martyrdom of Mr. Rich<sup>d</sup> Feuries, a Goldsmith, at Lyons, who after having his Tongue cut out, was burnt alive.

The Appearance of a Monstrous Large Owl, SURPRIZES the Pope, and all his Clergy, at the Council of Constance, A.D. 1410.

A Representation of Poor Men, who, by order of the Romish Church, are doing Penance, by carrying Straw on their Backs, &c. to keep the Vulgar in Awe.

"Oh, ye papists, behold! ye look for miracles; here now may you see a miracle; for in this fire I feel no more pain than if I were in bed; for it is as sweet to me as a bed of roses." Thus he resigned his soul into the hands of his Redeemer.

A short time after the death of this martyr, one Traxnel, an inoffensive countryman, was burned alive at Bradford, in Wiltshire; because he would not acknowledge the real presence in the sacrament, nor own the papal supremacy over the consciences of men.

John Frith, a noted martyr, died for the truth, in the year 1553. When he was brought to the stake in Smithfield, he embraced the faggots, and exhorted a young man, named Andrew Hewit, who suffered with him, to trust his soul to that God who had redeemed it. Both these sufferers endured much torment, for the wind blew the flames away from them, so that they were above two hours in agony before they expired.

About the latter end of this year, one Mr. Thomas Bennet, a school-master, was apprehended at Exeter, and being brought before the bishop, refused to recant his opinions, for which he was delivered over to the secular power, and burned alive near that city.

One Collins, a madman, suffered death with his dog in Smithfield, in 1538. The circumstances were as follow: Collins happened to be in church when the priest elevated the host; and Collins, in derision of the sacrifice of the mass, lifted up his dog above his head. For this crime Collins, who ought to have been sent to a madhouse, or whipped at the cart's tail, was brought before the bishop of London; and although he was really mad, yet such was the force of popish power, such the corruption in church and state, that the poor madman, and his dog, were both carried to the stake in Smithfield, where they were burned to ashes, amidst a vast crowd of spectators.

This year also some other persons suffered, of whom we shall take notice in the order they lie before us.

There was one Cowbridge suffered at Oxford; and although he was reputed to be a madman, yet he shewed great signs of piety when he was fastened to the stake, and after the flames were kindled around him.

About the same time one Purderve was put to death, for saying privately to a priest, after he had drank the wine, "He blessed the hungry people with the empty chalice."

Also about the same time was condemned William Letton, a monk of great age, in the county of Suffolk, who was burned at Norwich for speaking against an idol that was carried in procession; and for asserting, that the sacrament should be administered in both kinds.

A short time before the burning of these men, Nicholas Peke was executed at Norwich; and when the fire was lighted, he was so scorched that he was as black as pitch. Dr. Reading standing before him with Dr. Hearne, and Dr. Spragwell, having a long white wand in his hand, struck him upon the right shoulder, and said, Peke, recant, and believe in the sacrament. To this he answered, "I despise thee and it also;" and with great violence he spit blood, occasioned by the anguish of his sufferings. Dr. Reading granted forty days indulgence for the sufferer, in order that he might recant his opinions. But he persisted in his adherence to the truth, without paying any regard to the malice of his enemies; and he was burned alive, rejoicing that Christ had counted him worthy to suffer for his name's sake.

On July 28, 1540, or 1541, (for the chronology differs) Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, was brought to a scaffold on Tower-hill, where he was executed with some striking instances of cruelty. He made a short speech to the people, and then meekly resigned himself to the axe.

Certainly this nobleman is ranked among the martyrs with great propriety: for although the accusations preferred against him did not relate to any thing in religion, yet had it not been for his zeal to demolish popery, he might have to the last retained the king's favour. To this may be added, that the papists plotted his destruction, for he did more towards promoting the reformation, than any man in that age, except the good Dr. Cranmer.

A short time after the execution of Cromwell, Dr. Cuthbert Barnes, Thomas Garnet, and William Jerome, were brought before the ecclesiastical court of the bishop of London, and accused of heresy.

When before the bishop of London, Dr. Barnes was asked whether the saints prayed for us? To this he answered, that he would leave that to God; but (said he) I will pray for you.

These men were brought from the Tower to Smithfield, on the 13th of July, 1541, where they were all chained to one stake; and there suffered death with a constancy that nothing less than a firm faith in Jesus Christ could inspire.

There was one Thomas Sommers, an honest merchant, with three others, was thrown into prison, for reading some of Luther's books; and they were condemned to carry those books to a fire in Cheapside; there they were to throw them into the flames; but Sommers threw his over, for which he was sent back to the Tower, where he was stoned to death.

Horrid persecutions were at this time carried on at Lincoln, under Dr. Longland, the bishop of that diocese. At Buckingham, Thomas Bainard, and James Moreton, the one for reading the Lord's prayer in English, and the other for reading St. James's epistles in English, were both condemned, and burned alive.

Anthony Parsons, a priest, together with two others, were sent to Windsor, to be examined concerning heresy; and several articles were tendered to them to subscribe, which they refused. This was carried on by the bishop of Salisbury, who was the most violent persecutor of any in that age, except Bonner. When they were brought to the stake, Parsons asked for some drink, which being brought him, he drank to his fellow-sufferers, saying, "Be merry, my brethren, and lift up your hearts to God; for after this sharp breakfast I trust we shall have a good dinner in the kingdom of Christ, our Lord and Redeemer. At these words Eastwood, one of the sufferers, lifted up his eyes and hands to heaven, desiring the Lord above to receive his spirit. Parsons pulled the straw near to him, and then said to the spectators, This is God's armour, and now I am a christian soldier prepared for battle: I look for no mercy but through the merits of Christ; he is my only Saviour, in him do I trust for salvation; and soon after the fires were lighted which burned their bodies, but could not hurt their precious and immortal souls. Their constancy triumphed over cruelty, and their sufferings will be held in everlasting remembrance.

One Saitees, a priest, was, by order of bishop Gardiner, hanged in Southwark, in 1546, without a council process; and all that was alledged against him was, that of reading Tindal's New Testament.

Also this year one Kirby was burned at Ipswich, for the testimony of the truth, for denying the real presence in the sacrament. When this martyr was brought to the stake, he said to one Mr. Wingfield, who attended him, "Ah! Mr. Wingfield, be at my death, and you shall say, there standeth a christian sufferer in the fire."

PARTICULARS of a Horrid PLOT, in the REIGN of KING CHARLES II. concerted by the PAPISTS, for Destroying the CITY of LONDON by FIRE.

PROVOKED by revenge, and prompted by the force of superstitious principles, the papists still dedicated their thoughts to every machination their invention could project, to obtain the wished-for purposes, namely, the destruction of the protestants in this island.

At length having failed in several efforts, they be-thought themselves of a scheme for destroying the capital of the kingdom, which they flattered themselves might might be productive of facilitating their further intentions of extirpating the protestants, and, once more, establishing popery in the English dominions.

Notwithstanding thir scheme, in some measure, took place, yet it was not productive of the consequences they hoped and wished for. A great part of the city was, indeed, destroyed, the melancholy particulars of which we shall copy from the London Gazette, published a few days after :

“ Whitehall, Sept. 8, 1666.

“ ON the second instant, at one o'clock in the morning, there happened to break out a sad and deplorable fire, at a baker's, in Pudding-lane, near Fish-street, which falling out at that hour of the night, and in a quarter of the town so close built with wooden pitched houses, spread itself so far before day, and with such distraction to the inhabitants and neighbours, that care was not taken for the timely preventing the further diffusion of it, by pulling down houses, as ought to have been; so that this lamentable fire, in a short time, became too big to be mastered by any engines, or working near it. It fell out most unhappily too, that a violent easterly wind fomented it, and kept it burning all that day, and the night following, spreading itself up to Gracechurch-street, and downwards to Cannon street to the water-side, as far as the Three Cranes in the Vintry.

“ The people, in all parts about it, were distracted by the vastness of it, and their particular care to carry away their goods. Many attempts were made to prevent the spreading of it, by pulling down houses, and making great intervals, but all in vain, the fire seizing upon the timber and rubbish, and so continuing itself even through those spaces, and raging in a bright flame all Monday and Tuesday, notwithstanding his majesty's own, and his royal highness's indefatigable and personal pains to apply all possible remedies to prevent it, calling upon, and helping the people with their guards, and a great number of nobility and gentry unwearied assisting therein, for which they were requited with a thousand blessings from the poor distressed people.

“ By the favour of God, the wind slackened a little on Tuesday night, and the flames meeting with brick buildings at the Temple, by little and little it was observed to lose it's force on that side, so that on Wednesday morning we began to hope well, and his royal highness never despairing, or slackening his personal care, wrought so well that day, assisted in some parts by the lords of the council before and behind it, that a stop was put to it at the Temple church, near Holborn-bridge, Pic-corner, Aldersgate, Cripplegate, near the lower end of Coleman-street, at the end of Basinghall-street, by the Postern, at the upper end of Bishopsgate-street, and Leadenhall-street, at the standard in Cornhill, at the church in Fenchurch-street, near Clothworkers-hall in Mincing-lane, at the middle of Mark-lane, and at the Tower-dock.

“ On Thursday, by the blessing of God, it was wholly beat down and extinguished. But so as that evening it unhappily burst out again afresh at the Temple, by the falling of some sparks (as is supposed) upon a pile of wooden buildings; but his royal highness, who watched there that whole night in person, by the great labours and diligence used, and especially by applying powder, to blow up the houses about it, before day most happily mastered it.

“ His majesty then sat hourly in council, and ever since hath continued making rounds about the city, in all parts of it where the danger and mischief was the greatest, till this morning that he hath sent his grace the duke of Albemarle, whom he hath called for to assist him on this great occasion, to put his happy and successful hand to the finishing this memorable deliverance.”

During the progress of this dreadful conflagration, orders were given for pulling down various houses in the Tower of London, in order to preserve the grand magazine of gunpowder in that fortress; to the preservation of which, the violent easterly wind contributed more than the precaution.

Many thousands of citizens, who, by this calamity, were deprived of their habitations, retired to the fields, destitute of all necessaries, and exposed to the inclemency of the weather, till a sufficient number of huts could be erected for their relief. In order to mitigate the distresses of the people, his majesty ordered a great quantity of naval bread to be distributed among them; and issued a proclamation, commanding the magistrates of the city to encourage the bringing of all kinds of provisions.

By the certificate of Jonas Moore and Ralf Gatrix, the surveyors appointed to examine the ruins, it appeared, that this dreadful fire over-ran 373 acres of ground within the walls, and burnt 13,200 houses, 89 parish churches, besides chapels; and that only eleven parish churches within the walls were left standing.

To this account may also be added the magnificent buildings of St. Paul's cathedral, Guildhall, the Royal Exchange, Custom-house, and Blackwell-hall; many hospitals and libraries, fifty-two halls of the city companies, and a great number of other stately edifices; together with three of the city gates, and the prisons of Newgate, the Fleet, the Poultry and Wood-street Compters; the loss of which, by the best calculation, amounted to upwards of ten millions sterling. And notwithstanding all this destruction, yet only six persons lost their lives.

Various were the conjectures of the people on the cause of this singular calamity: at first some imagined it to be casual, but from a train of circumstances, it afterwards appeared to have been done from the malice and horrid contrivances of the papists. Several suspected persons were taken into custody; but no positive proof being produced against them, they were discharged.

Though this diabolical scheme took place, in a great measure, to the wishes of the wicked contrivers, yet, instead of being prejudicial, it was, in the end, productive of the most happy consequences to the metropolis. It certainly, for a time, occasioned the most distinguished distress to the inhabitants, but it afforded an opportunity that never happened before, and, in all human probability, never may again, of restoring the city with more uniformity, conveniency, and wholesomeness, than could be expected in a town of progressive growth. The streets were before narrow, crooked, and incommodious; the houses chiefly of wood, dark, close, and ill-contrived; with several stories projecting beyond each other, as they rose, over the narrow streets. The free circulation of the air was, by these means, obstructed; and the people breathed a stagnant unwholesome element, replete with foul effluvia, sufficient of itself to generate putrid disorders, and disposed to harbour any pestilential taint it might receive. All these inconveniencies were removed, by the streets being made more open, and the buildings principally formed of brick; so that if, either by accident or otherwise, a fire should happen in future, it's progress would be soon stopped, and the direful consequences which generally arise from such circumstances rendered trifling.

Besides the conveniencies already mentioned, the fire of London was certainly productive of an advantage of the most valuable nature, namely, the extirpation of that contagious and destructive distemper the plague, which, but the year before, had brought thousands to their graves. This horrid disease had made great devastation among the inhabitants, not only of the metropolis, but different parts of the kingdom, at various periods; but, thank God, it's baneful influence has never taken place here since the before-mentioned catastrophe, and there is great reason to suppose that the fire materially contributed to the production of so happy a circumstance.

To perpetuate, however, the remembrance of so singular an occurrence, a monument was erected in that part of the city near which the fire began. It is esteemed the noblest modern column in the world; and may, in some respects, vie with the most celebrated of antiquity, which are consecrated to the names of Trajan and Antoninus.

A full ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTION in SCOTLAND during the REIGN of KING HENRY VIII.

PATRICK Hamilton was the first person we meet with who suffered in Scotland on the score of religion: he was a gentleman of independent fortune, and descended from a very ancient and honourable family.

When he had acquired a liberal education, being desirous of farther improving himself in useful knowledge, he left Scotland, and went to the university of Wirtenberg, in Germany, in order to finish his studies.

During his residence here, he became intimately acquainted with those eminent lights of the gospel, Martin Luther and Philip Melancthon; from whose writings and doctrines he strongly attached himself to the protestant religion.

When the archbishop of St. Andrew's (who was a rigid papist) heard of Mr. Hamilton's proceedings, he caused him to be seized, and being brought before him, after a short examination relative to his religious principles, he committed him a prisoner to the castle, at the same time ordering him to be confined in the most loathsome part of the prison.

Mr. Hamilton the next morning was brought before the bishop, and several others, for examination, when the principal articles exhibited against him were, his publicly disapproving of pilgrimages, purgatory, prayers to saints, for the dead, &c.

Mr. Hamilton acknowledged these articles to be true, in consequence of which he was immediately condemned to be burnt; and that his condemnation might have the greater authority, they caused it to be subscribed by all those of any note who were present, and to make the number as considerable as possible, even admitted the subscription of boys who were sons of the nobility.

This bigoted and persecuting prelate was so anxious for the destruction of Mr. Hamilton, that he ordered his sentence to be put in execution on the afternoon of the very day it was pronounced. He was accordingly led to the place appointed for the horrid tragedy, and was attended by a prodigious number of spectators. The greatest part of the multitude would not believe it was intended he should be put to death, but that it was only done to frighten him, and thereby bring him over to embrace the principles of the Romish religion. But they soon found themselves mistaken.

As soon as he arrived at the stake he kneeled down, and, for some time, prayed with great fervency. After this he was fastened to the stake, and the faggots placed round him. A quantity of gunpowder having been fastened under his arms, was first set on fire, which scorched his left hand and one side of his face, but did no material injury, neither did it communicate with the faggots. In consequence of this, more powder and combustible matter was brought, which being set on fire took effect, and the faggots being kindled, he called out, with an audible voice, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit! How long shall darkness overwhelm this realm? And how long wilt thou suffer the tyranny of these men?"

The fire burning slow put him to great torment; but he bore it with christian magnanimity. What gave him the greatest pain was, the clamour of some wicked men set on by the friars, who frequently cried, "Turn, thou heretic; call upon our lady; say, Salve Regina, &c." To whom he replied, "Depart from me, and trouble me not, ye messengers of Satan." One Campbell, a friar, who was the ringleader, still continuing to interrupt him by opprobrious language; he said to him, "Wicked man, God forgive thee." After which, being prevented from farther speech by the violence of the smoke, and the rapidity of the flames, he resigned up his soul into the hands of him who gave it. This steadfast believer in Christ suffered martyrdom in the year 1527.

There was one Henry Forest, a young inoffensive Benedictine, who being charged with speaking respectfully of the above Patrick Hamilton, was thrown into prison; and, in confessing himself to a friar, owned that he thought Hamilton a good man; and that the articles, for which he was sentenced to die, might be defended. This being revealed by the friar, it was received as evidence; and the poor Benedictine was sentenced to be burnt.

A consultation being held, with regard to the manner of his execution, John Lindsay, one of the archbishop's gentlemen, offered his advice, to burn friar Forest in some cellar; for, said he, the smoke of Patrick Hamilton hath infected all those on whom it blew.

This infamous advice was taken, and the poor victim was rather suffocated than burnt.

David Stratton and Norman Gourlay were the next who fell victims for professing the truth of the gospel.

As soon as they arrived at the fatal spot, they both kneeled down, and prayed for some time, with great fervency. They then arose, when Stratton, addressing himself to the spectators, exhorted them to lay aside their superstitious and idolatrous notions, and employ their time in seeking the true light of the gospel. He would have said more, but was prevented by the officers who attended.

Their sentence was then put into execution, and they cheerfully resigned up their souls to that God who gave them, hoping, through the merits of the great Redeemer, for a glorious resurrection to life immortal.—They suffered in the year 1534.

The martyrdoms of the two before-mentioned persons were soon followed by that of Mr. Thomas Forret, who, for a considerable time, had been dean of the Romish church; Killor and Beverage, two blacksmiths; Duncan Simson, a priest; and Robert Forrester, a gentleman. They were all burnt together, on the Castle-hill at Edinburgh, the last day of February, 1538.

The year following the martyrdoms of the before-mentioned persons, viz. 1539, two others were apprehended on a suspicion of heresy; namely, Jerom Ruffel, and Alexander Kennedy, a youth about eighteen years of age. These two persons, after being some time confined in prison, were brought before the archbishop for examination. In the course of which, Ruffel, being a very sensible man, reasoned learnedly against his accusers; while they in return made use of very opprobrious language.

When the examination was over, and both of them deemed heretics, the archbishop pronounced the dreadful sentence of death, and they were immediately delivered over to the secular power in order for execution.

They were led the next day to the place appointed for them to suffer; in their way to which, Ruffel, seeing his fellow-sufferer have the appearance of timidity in his countenance, thus addressed him: "Brother, fear not; greater is he that is in us, than he that is in the world. The pain that we are to suffer is short, and shall be light; but our joy and consolation shall never have an end. Let us, therefore, strive to enter into our Master and Saviour's joy, by the same strait way which he hath taken before us. Death cannot hurt us, for it is already destroyed by him, for whose sake we are now going to suffer."

Being arrived at the fatal spot, they both kneeled down and prayed for some time; after which, being fastened to the stake, and the faggots lighted, they cheerfully resigned their souls into the hands of him who gave them, in full hopes of an everlasting reward in the heavenly mansions.

In the year 1543, the archbishop of St. Andrew's made a visitation into various parts of his diocese, where several persons were informed against at Perth for heresy. Among these the following were condemned to die, viz. William Anderson, Robert Lamb, James Finlayson, James Hunter, James Ravelson, and Helen Stark.

The following were the accusations laid against these respective persons, viz.

The four first were accused of having hung up the image of Sir Francis, nailing rams horns on his head, and fastening a cow's tail to his rump; but the principal matter matter on which they were condemned was, having regaled themselves with a goose on a fast day.

Also James Raveleson was accused of having ornamented his house with the three crowned diadem of Peter, carved in wood, which the archbishop conceived to be done in mockery to his cardinal's cap.

Also Helen Stark was accused of not having accustomed herself to pray to the virgin Mary, more especially during the time she was in child-bed.

They were all found guilty on these respective accusations, and immediately received sentence of death; the four men for eating the goose to be hanged; James Raveleson to be burnt; and the woman, with her sucking infant, to be put into a sack, and drowned.

The four men, with the woman and child, suffered at the same time; but James Raveleson was not executed till some days after.

Many others, besides the above-mentioned persons, were cruelly persecuted, some being banished, and others confined in loathsome dungeons. Among whom were Mr. John Knox, the celebrated Scottish reformist; and John Rogers, a pious and learned man, who was murdered in prison, and his body thrown over the walls into the street; after which a report was spread, that he had met with his death by attempting to make his escape.

A full ACCOUNT of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and DEATH, of Mr. GEORGE WISHART, who was strangled, and afterwards burned, in SCOTLAND, for professing the TRUTH of the GOSPEL.

THIS gentleman was born in Scotland, and after receiving a grammatical education at a private school, he left that place, and finished his studies at the university of Cambridge.

For the sake of improving himself as much as possible in the knowledge of literature, he travelled into various parts abroad, where he distinguished himself for his great learning and abilities, both in philosophy and divinity.

Having been some time abroad he returned to England, and took up his residence at Cambridge, where he was admitted a member of Bennet college. Having taken up his degrees, he entered into holy orders, and expounded the gospel in so clear and intelligible a manner, as highly to delight his numerous auditors.

Now being desirous of propagating the true gospel in his own country, he left Cambridge in 1544, and on his arrival in Scotland he first preached at Montrose, and afterwards at Dundee. In this last place he made a public exposition of the epistle to the Romans, which he went through with such grace and freedom, as greatly alarmed the papists.

One Robert Miln, in consequence of this, (at the instigation of cardinal Beaton, the archbishop of St. Andrew's) a principal man of Dundee, went to the church where Wishart preached, and in the middle of his discourse publicly told him not to trouble the town any more, for he was determined not to suffer it.

Such a sudden rebuff greatly surprized Wishart, who, after a short pause, looking sorrowfully on the speaker and the audience, said, "God is my witness, that I never minded your trouble but your comfort; yea, your trouble is more grievous to me than it is to yourselves: but I am assured, to refuse God's words, and to chase from you his messenger, shall not preserve you from trouble, but shall bring you into it: for God shall send you ministers that shall neither fear burning nor banishment. I have offered you the word of salvation. With the hazard of my life I have remained among you: now you yourselves refuse me; and I must leave my innocence to be declared by my God. If it be long prosperous with you, I am not led by the spirit of truth: but if unlooked-for trouble come upon you, acknowledge the cause, and turn to God, who is gracious and merciful. But if you turn not at the first warning, he will visit you with fire and sword." At the close of this speech he left the pulpit, and retired.

He went after this into the west of Scotland, where he preached God's word, which was gladly received by many.

Some short time after this Mr. Wishart received intelligence, that the plague was broke out in Dundee. It began four days after he was prohibited from preaching there, and raged so extremely, that it was almost beyond credit how many died in the space of 24 hours. This being related to him, he, notwithstanding the importunity of his friends to detain him, determined to go there, saying, "They are now in troubles, and need comfort. Perhaps this hand of God will make them now to magnify and reverence the word of God, which before they lightly esteemed."

Now he was with joy received by the godly. He chose the east-gate for the place of his preaching; so that the healthy were within, and the sick without the gate. He took his text from these words, He sent his word, and healed them, &c. In this sermon he chiefly dwelt upon the advantage and comfort of God's word, the judgments that ensue upon the contempt or rejection of it, the freedom of God's grace to all his people, and the happiness of those of his elect, whom he takes to himself out of this miserable world. The hearts of his hearers were so raised by the divine force of this discourse, as not to regard death, but to judge them the more happy who should then be called, not knowing whether they might have such a comforter again with them.

The plague soon after abated; though, in the midst of it, Wishart constantly visited those that lay in the greatest extremity, and comforted them by his exhortations.

Having taken his leave of the people of Dundee, he said, "That God had almost put an end to that plague, and that he was now called to another place."

From thence he went to Montrose, where he sometimes preached, but spent most of his time in private meditation and prayer.

Some say, that before he left Dundee, and while he was engaged in the labours of love to the bodies, as well as to the souls, of those poor afflicted people, cardinal Beaton engaged a desperate popish priest, called John Weighton, to kill him; the attempt to execute which was as follows: one day, after Wishart had finished his sermon, and the people departed, the priest stood waiting at the bottom of the stairs, with a naked dagger in his hand under his gown. But Mr. Wishart having a sharp, piercing eye, and seeing the priest as he came from the pulpit, said to him, "My friend, what would you have?" and immediately clapping his hand upon the dagger, took it from him. The priest being terrified, fell on his knees, confessed his intention, and craved pardon. A noise being hereupon raised, and it coming to the ears of those who were sick, they cried, "Deliver the traitor to us, we will take him by force;" and they burst in at the gate. But Wishart, taking the priest in his arms, said, "Whatsoever hurts him shall hurt me; for he hath done me no mischief, but much good, by teaching more heedfulness for the time to come." By this conduct he appeased the people, and saved the life of the wicked priest.

Shortly after his return to Montrose, the cardinal again conspired his death, causing a letter to be sent to him as if it had been from his familiar friend, the laird of Kinrier, in which he was desired with all possible speed to come to him, because he was taken with a sudden sickness. In the mean time the cardinal had provided sixty men armed, to lie in wait within a mile and a half of Montrose, in order to murder him as he passed that way.

The letter coming to Wishart's hand by a boy, who also brought him a horse for the journey, Wishart, accompanied by some honest men, his friends, set forward; but something particular striking his mind by the way, he returned back, which they wondering at, asked him the cause; to whom he said, "I will not go; I am forbidden of God; I am assured there is treason. Let some some of you go to yonder place, and tell me what you find." Which doing, they made the discovery; and hastily returning, they told Mr. Wishart: whereupon he said, "I know I shall end my life by that blood-thirsty man's hands, but it will not be in this manner."

Some short time after this he left Montrose, and proceeded to Edinburgh, in order to propagate the gospel in that city. By the way he lodged with a faithful brother, called James Watson, of Inner-Goury. In the middle of the night he got up, and went into the yard, which two men hearing, they privately followed him.

While in the yard, he fell on his knees, and prayed for some time with the greatest fervency: after which he arose, and returned to his bed. Those who attended him, appearing as though they were ignorant of all, came and asked him where he had been? But he would not answer them. The next day they importuned him to tell them, saying, "Be plain with us, for we heard your mourning, and saw your gestures."

Upon this he, with a dejected countenance, said, "I had rather you had been in your beds." But they still pressing upon him to know something, he said, "I will tell you; I am assured that my warfare is near at an end, and therefore pray to God with me, that I shrink not when the battle waxeth most hot."

Some short time after, cardinal Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, being informed that Mr. Wishart was at the house of Mr. Cockburn, of Ormiston, in East-Lothian, he applied to the regent to cause him to be apprehended; with which, after great persuasion, and much against his will, he complied.

The cardinal, in consequence of this, immediately proceeded to the trial of Wishart, against whom no less than 18 articles were exhibited. Mr. Wishart answered the respective articles with great composure of mind, and in so learned and clear a manner, as greatly surprised most of those who were present.

The examination being finished, the archbishop endeavoured to prevail on Mr. Wishart to recant; but he was too firmly fixed in his religious principles, and too much enlightened with the truth of the gospel, to be in the least moved.

On the morning of his execution there came to him two friars from the cardinal; one of whom put on him a black linen coat, and the other brought several bags of gunpowder, which they tied about different parts of his body.

When he arrived at the stake, the executioner put a rope round his neck, and a chain about his middle; upon which he fell on his knees, and thus exclaimed:

"O thou Saviour of the world, have mercy upon me! Father of heaven, I commend my spirit into thy holy hands."

Having thus said, he prayed for his accusers, saying, "I beseech thee, Father of heaven, forgive them that have, from ignorance, or an evil mind, forged lies of me: I forgive them with all my heart. I beseech Christ to forgive them, that have ignorantly condemned me."

Then he was fastened to the stake, and the faggots being lighted, immediately set fire to the powder that was tied about him, and which blew into a flame and smoke.

The governor of the castle, who stood so near that he was singed with the flame, exhorted our martyr, in a few words, to be of good cheer, and to ask pardon of God for his offences. To which he replied, "This flame occasions trouble to my body, indeed, but it hath in no wise broken my spirit. But he who now so proudly looks down upon me from yonder lofty place (pointing to the cardinal) shall ere long be as ignominiously thrown down, as now he proudly lolls at his ease." Which prediction was soon after fulfilled. The executioner then pulled the rope which was tied about his neck with great violence, so that he was soon strangled; and the fire getting strength, burnt with such rapidity that in less than an hour his body was totally consumed.

One Adam Wallace was the next person who fell a martyr to popish bigotry; he was of Winton, in East-

Lothian, and having obtained a true knowledge of the gospel of Christ, spent the greater part of his time in endeavouring to propagate it among his fellow-creatures.

This gentleman's conduct being noticed by some bigoted papists, an information was laid against him for heresy, on which he was apprehended, and committed to prison.

When examined, sentence of death was passed upon him as an heretic; and he was immediately delivered over to the secular power, in order for execution.

In the evening of the same day, Wallace was visited by several Romish priests, who endeavoured to prevail on him to recant; but he stood so steadfast in the faith he professed, and used such forcible arguments in vindication of the true gospel, that they left him with some wrath, saying, "He was too abandoned to receive any impression."

He was conducted the next morning to the Castle-hill at Edinburgh, when, being chained to the stake, and the faggots lighted, he cheerfully resigned up his soul into the hands of him who gave it, in full assurance of receiving a crown of glory in the heavenly mansions.

One Walter Mill was the last who suffered martyrdom in Scotland, for the cause of Christ; he was burnt at Edinburgh in the year 1558.

This person, in his younger years, had travelled into Germany, and on his return was installed a priest of the church of Lunan in Angus; but, on an information of heresy, in the time of cardinal Beaton, he was forced to abandon his charge, and abscond. But he was soon apprehended, and committed to prison.

When interrogated by sir Andrew Oliphant, whether he would recant his opinions, he answered in the negative, saying, He would sooner forfeit ten thousand lives, than relinquish a particle of those heavenly principles he had received from the suffrages of his blessed Redeemer.

Sentence of condemnation was immediately passed on him, in consequence of this, and he was conducted to prison in order for execution the following day.

This steadfast believer in Christ was 82 years of age, and exceeding infirm; from whence it was supposed, that he could scarcely be heard. However, when he was led to the place of execution, he expressed his religious sentiments with such courage, and at the same time composure of mind, as astonished even his enemies. As soon as he was fastened to the stake, and the faggots lighted, he addressed the spectators as follows:

"The cause why I suffer this day is not for any crime, (though I acknowledge myself a miserable sinner) but only for the defence of the truth as it is in Jesus Christ; and I praise God who hath called me, by his mercy, to seal the truth with my life; which, as I received it from him, so I willingly offer up to his glory. Therefore, as you would escape eternal death, be no longer seduced by the lies of the seat of antichrist: but depend solely on Jesus Christ, and his mercy, that you may be delivered from condemnation." And then added, "That he trusted he should be the last who would suffer death in Scotland, upon a religious account."

In this manner this pious christian cheerfully gave up his life, in defence of the truth of Christ's gospel, not doubting but he should be made a partaker of his heavenly kingdom.

A Full ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS against the PROTESTANTS in IRELAND, distinguished by the Name of THE IRISH MASSACRE.

NOTwithstanding the various attempts made by the Irish against the English usually go under the denomination of rebellion, yet they more properly deserve the epithet persecution, as all their destructive efforts were particularly levelled at the protestants only, whom they were determined, if possible, totally to extirpate from the kingdom. They had, indeed, hitherto mis-carried; but they at length hit upon a project that succeeded ceded to their wishes, and produced a catastrophe that will remain in characters of blood to the latest posterity.

That the Romish clergy of Ireland were the principal fomenters of the rebellions in that kingdom, already mentioned, is particularly evident from their treacherous and disloyal behaviour under queen Elizabeth and king James I. they continually urging to the people the lawfulness of killing all protestants, who supported the right of the crown of England to Ireland; and assuring them, that all papists, who should die fighting against the protestants, would go immediately to heaven.

These Irish ecclesiastics, under Charles I. were greatly increased by titular Romish archbishops, bishops, deans, vicars-general, abbots, priests, and friars; for which reason, in 1629, the public exercise of the popish rites and ceremonies was forbidden.

Notwithstanding all this, soon after the Romish clergy erected a new popish university in the city of Dublin. They also proceeded to build monasteries and nunneries in various parts of the kingdom; in which places these very Romish clergy, and the chiefs of the Irish, held frequent meetings; and, from thence, used to pass, to and fro, to France, Spain, Flanders, Lorrain, and Rome; where the detestable plot of 1641 was hatching by the family of the O'Neals, and their followers.

Some short time before the horrid conspiracy broke out, which we are now going to relate, the papists of Ireland had presented a remonstrance to the lords-justices of that kingdom, demanding the free exercise of their religion, and a repeal of all laws to the contrary; to which both houses of parliament in England solemnly answered, that they would never grant any toleration to the popish religion in that kingdom.

This farther irritated the papists to put in execution the diabolical plot concerted for the destruction of the protestants; and it failed not of the success wished for by its malicious and rancorous projectors.

The chief design of this horrid conspiracy was, that a general insurrection should take place at the same time throughout the kingdom; and that all the protestants, without exception, should be murdered. The day fixed for this horrid massacre was, the 23d of October, 1641, the feast of Ignatius Loyola, founder of the jesuits; and the chief conspirators, in the principal parts of the kingdom, made the necessary preparations for the intended conflict.

That this detested scheme might the more infallibly succeed, the most distinguished artifices were artfully practised by the papists; and their behaviour, in their visits to the protestants, at this time, was with more seeming kindness than they had hitherto shewn, which was done the more completely to effect the inhuman and treacherous designs then meditating against them.

The execution of this savage conspiracy was delayed till the approach of winter, that the sending troops from England might be attended with greater difficulty. Cardinal Richlieu, the French minister, had promised the conspirators a considerable supply of men and money; and many Irish officers had given the strongest assurances, that they would heartily concur with their catholic brethren, as soon as the insurrection appeared.

Now the day preceding that appointed for carrying this horrid design into execution was arrived, when, happily for the metropolis of the kingdom, the conspiracy was discovered by one Owen O'Connelly, an Irishman, for which most signal service the English parliament voted him 500l. and a pension of 200l. during his life.

So very seasonably was this plot discovered, even but a few hours before the city and castle of Dublin were to have been surprized, that the lords-justices had but just time to put themselves, and the city, in a proper posture of defence. The lord M'Guire, who was the principal leader here, with his accomplices, were seized the same evening in the city: and in their lodgings were found swords, hatchets, pole-axes, hammers, and such other instruments of death as had been prepared for the destruction and extirpation of the protestants in that part of the kingdom.

The metropolis was thus happily preserved; but the bloody part of the intended tragedy was past prevention. The conspirators were in arms all over the kingdom early in the morning of the day appointed, and every protestant who fell in their way was immediately murdered. No age, no sex, no condition was spared. The wife weeping for her butchered husband, and embracing her helpless children, was pierced with them, and perished by the same stroke. The old, the young, the vigorous, and the infirm, underwent the same fate, and were blended in one common ruin. In vain did flight save from the first assault: destruction was every where let loose, and met the hunted victims at every turn. In vain was recourse had to relations, to companions, to friends: all connections were dissolved, and death was dealt by that hand, from which protection was implored and expected. Without provocation, without opposition, the astonished English, living in profound peace, and, as they thought, full security, were massacred by their nearest neighbours, with whom they had long maintained a continued intercourse of kindness and good offices. Nay, even death was the slightest punishment inflicted by these monsters in human form: all the tortures which wanton cruelty could invent, all the lingering pains of body, the anguish of mind, the agonies of despair, could not satiate revenge excited without injury, and cruelly derived from no cause whatever. Depraved nature, even perverted religion, though encouraged by the utmost licence, cannot reach to a greater pitch of ferocity than appeared in these merciless barbarians. Even the weaker sex themselves, naturally tender to their own sufferings, and compassionate to those of others, here emulated their robust companions in the practice of every cruelty. The very children, taught by example, and encouraged by the exhortation of their parents, dealt their feeble blows on the dead carcases of defenceless children of the English.

Neither was the avarice of the Irish sufficient to produce the least restraint on their cruelty. Such was their frenzy, that the cattle they had seized, and by rapine had made their own, were, because they bore the name of English, wantonly slaughtered, or, when covered with wounds, turned loose into the woods, there to perish by slow and lingering torments.

All the commodious habitations of the planters were laid in ashes, or levelled with the ground. And where the wretched owners had shut themselves up in the houses, and were preparing for defence, they perished in the flames, together with their wives and children.

So great is the general description of this unparalleled massacre; but it now remains, from the nature of our work, that we proceed to particulars.

The bigoted and merciless papists had no sooner begun to imbrue their hands in blood, than they repeated the horrid tragedy day after day; and the protestants in all parts of the kingdom fell victims to their fury by deaths of the most unheard-of nature.

The vain and ignorant Irish were more strongly instigated to execute the infernal business by the jesuits, priests, and friars, who, when the day for the execution of the plot was agreed on, recommended, in their prayers, diligence in the great design, which they said would greatly tend to the prosperity of the kingdom, and to the advancement of the catholic cause. They every where declared to the common people, that the protestants were heretics, and ought not to be suffered to live any longer among them; adding, that it was no more sin to kill an Englishman than to kill a dog; and that the relieving or protecting them was a crime of the most unpardonable nature.

When the papists besieged the town and castle of Longford, and the inhabitants of the latter, who were protestants, surrendered on condition of being allowed quarter, the besiegers, the instant the towns-people appeared, attacked them in the most unmerciful manner, their priest, as a signal for the rest to fall on, first ripping open the belly of the English protestant minister; after which his followers murdered all the rest, some some of whom they hung, others were stabbed or shot, and great numbers knocked on the head with axes provided for the purpose.

In like manner the garrison at Sligo was treated by O'Connor Slygah; who, upon the protestants quitting their holds, promised them quarter, and to convey them safe over the Curlew mountains, to Roscommon. But he first imprisoned them in a most loathsome gaol, allowing them only grains for their food. Afterwards, when some papists were merry over their cups, who were come to congratulate their wicked brethren for their victory over these unhappy creatures, those protestants who survived were brought forth by the White-friars, and were either killed, or precipitated over the bridge into a swift water, where they were soon destroyed. It is added, that this wicked company of White-friars went some time after, in solemn procession, with holy water in their hands, to sprinkle the river; on pretence of cleansing and purifying it from the stains and pollution of the blood and dead bodies of the heretics, as they called the unfortunate protestants who were inhumanly slaughtered at this very time.

At Kilmore, Dr. Bedell, bishop of that see, had charitably settled and supported a great number of distressed protestants, who had fled from their habitations to escape the diabolical cruelties committed by the papists. But they did not long enjoy the consolation of living together; the good prelate was forcibly dragged from his episcopal residence, which was immediately occupied by Dr. Swiney, the popish titular bishop of Kilmore, who said mass in the church the Sunday following, and then seized on all the goods and effects belonging to the persecuted bishop.

Immediately after this the papists forced Dr. Bedell, his two sons, and the rest of his family, with some of the chief of the protestants whom he had protected, into a ruinous castle, called Lochwater, situated in a lake near the sea. Here he remained with his companions some weeks, all of them daily expecting to be put to death. The greatest part of them were stripped naked, by which means, as the season was cold, (it being in the month of December) and the building in which they were confined open at the top, they suffered the most severe hardships.

In this situation they continued till the 7th of January, when they were all released. The bishop was courteously received into the house of Dennis O'Sheridan, one of his clergy, whom he had made a convert to the church of England; but he did not long survive this kindness.

During his residence here, he spent the whole of his time in religious exercises, the better to fit and prepare himself and his sorrowful companions, for their great change, as nothing but certain death was perpetually before their eyes.

At this time he was in the 71st year of his age, and being afflicted with a violent ague caught in his late cold and desolate habitation on the lake, it soon threw him into a fever of the most dangerous nature. Finding his dissolution at hand, he received it with joy, like one of the primitive martyrs just hastening to his crown of glory. After having addressed his little flock, and exhorted them to patience, in the most pathetic manner, as they saw their own last day approaching; after having solemnly blessed his people, his family and his children, he finished the course of his ministry and life together, on the 7th of February, 1642.

Now his friends and relations applied to the intruding bishop, for leave to bury him, which was with difficulty obtained; he, at first, telling them, that the churchyard was holy ground, and should be no longer defiled with heretics: however, leave was at last granted, and though the church funeral service was not used at the solemnity, (for fear of the Irish papists) yet some of the better sort, who had the highest veneration for him when living, attended his remains to the grave. At his interment, they discharged a volley of shot, crying out, Requiescat in pace ultimus Anglorum: that is, "May the last of the English rest in peace." Adding, that as he was one of the best, so he should be the last English bishop found among them.

Very extensive was his learning, and he would have given the world a greater proof of it, had he printed all he wrote. Scarce any of his writings were saved; the papists having destroyed most of his papers, and his library.

He had gathered a vast heap of critical expositions of scripture, all which, with a great trunk full of his manuscripts, fell into the hands of the Irish. Happily his great Hebrew MS. was preserved, and is now in the library of Emanuel-College, Oxford.

In the barony of Terawley, the papists, at the instigation of their friars, compelled above 40 English protestants, some of whom were women and children, to the hard fate either of falling by the sword, or of drowning in the sea. These chusing the latter, were accordingly forced, by the naked weapons of their inexorable persecutors, into the deep, where, with their children in their arms, they first waded up to their chins, and afterwards sunk down and perished together.

In the castle of Lisgool upwards of 150 men, women, and children, were all burnt together; and at the castle of Moneah not less than 100 were all put to the sword. Great numbers were also murdered at the castle of Tullah, which was delivered up to M'Guire on condition of having fair quarter; but no sooner had that base villain got possession of the place, than he ordered his followers to murder the people, which was immediately done with the greatest cruelty.

Several others were put to deaths of the most horrid nature, and such as could have been invented only by daemons instead of men.

There were some of them laid with the center of their backs on the axle-tree of a carriage, with their legs resting on the ground on one side, and their arms and head on the other. In this position one of the savages scourged the wretched object on the thighs, legs, &c. while another set on furious dogs, who tore to pieces the arms and upper parts of the body; and in this dreadful manner were they deprived of their existence.

Several were fastened to horses tails, and the beasts being set on full gallop by their riders, the wretched victims were dragged along till they expired.

Many were hung on lofty gibbets, and a fire being kindled under them, they finished their lives, partly by hanging, and partly by suffocation.

Nor did the more tender sex escape the least particle of cruelty that could be projected by their merciless and furious persecutors. Many women, of all ages, were put to deaths of the most cruel nature. Some in particular were fastened with their backs to strong posts, and being stripped to the waists, the inhuman monsters cut off their right breasts with shears, which of course, put them to the most excruciating torments; and in this position they were left, till, from the loss of blood, they expired.

So great was the savage ferocity of these barbarians, that even unborn infants were dragged from the womb to become victims to their rage. Many unhappy mothers were hung naked on the branches of trees, and their bodies being cut open, the innocent offsprings were taken from them, and thrown to dogs and swine. And to increase the horrid scene, they would oblige the husband to be a spectator before he suffered himself.

They hanged above 100 Scottish protestants at the town of Liffenskeath, shewing them no more mercy than they did to the English.

M'Guire, going to the castle of that town, desired to speak with the governor, when being admitted, he immediately burnt the records of the county, which were kept there. He then demanded 1000l. of the governor, which having received, he immediately compelled him to hear mass, and to swear that he would continue so to do. And to complete his horrid barbarities, he ordered the wife and children of the governor to be hung up before his face; besides massacring at least 100 of the inhabitants.

Upwards of 1000 men, women, and children, were driven, driven, in different companies, to Portendown bridge, which was broken in the middle, and there compelled to throw themselves into the water; and such as attempted to reach the shore were knocked on the head.

At the same part of the country, at least four thousand persons were drowned in different places. The inhuman papists, after first stripping them, drove them like beasts to the spot fixed on for their destruction; and if any, through fatigue, or natural infirmities, were slack in their pace, they pricked them with their swords and pikes; and to strike a farther terror on the multitude, they murdered some by the way. Many of these poor wretches, when thrown into the water, endeavoured to save themselves by swimming to the shore; but their merciless persecutors prevented their endeavours taking effect, by shooting them in the water.

At one place one hundred and forty English, after being driven for many miles stark naked, and in the most severe weather, were all murdered on the same spot, some being hanged, others burnt, some shot, and many of them buried alive; and so cruel were their tormentors, that they would not suffer them to pray before they robbed them of their miserable existence.

They took other companies under pretence of safe-conduct, who, from that consideration, proceeded cheerfully on their journey; but when the treacherous papists had got them to a convenient spot, they butchered them all in the most cruel manner.

About one hundred and fifteen men, women, and children, were conducted, by order of sir Phelim O'Neal, to Portendown bridge, where they were all forced into the river, and drowned. One woman, named Campbel, finding no probability of escaping, suddenly clasped one of the chief of the papists in her arms, and held him so fast, that they were both drowned together.

They massacred forty-eight families in Killoman, among whom twenty-two were burnt together in one house. The rest were either hanged, shot, or drowned.

The inhabitants in Kilmore, which consisted of about two hundred families, all fell victims to their rage. Some of them sat in the stocks till they confessed where their money was; after which they put them to death. The whole country was one common scene of butchery, and many thousands perished, in a short time, by sword, famine, fire, water, and all other the most cruel deaths, that rage and malice could invent.

These bloody villains shewed so much favour to some as to dispatch them immediately; but they would by no means suffer them to pray. Others they imprisoned in filthy dungeons, putting heavy bolts on their legs, and keeping them there till they were starved to death.

They put all the protestants at Casel into a loathsome dungeon, where they kept them together, for several weeks, in the greatest misery. At length they were released, when some of them were barbarously mangled, and left on the highways to perish at leisure; others were hanged, and some were buried in the ground upright, with their heads above the earth, the papists, to increase their misery, treating them with derision during their sufferings.

They murdered nine hundred and fifty-four protestants in the county of Antrim in one morning; and afterwards about twelve hundred more in that county.

They forced twenty-four protestants into a house, at a town called Lisnegary, and then setting fire to it, burned them together, counterfeiting their outcries in derision to others.

Among other acts of cruelty, they took two children belonging to an English woman, and dashed out their brains before her face; after which they threw the mother into a river, and she was drowned. They served many other children in the like manner, to the great affliction of their parents, and the disgrace of human nature.

All the protestants in Kilkenny, without exception, were put to death; and some of them in so cruel a manner, as, perhaps, was never before thought of.

An English woman they beat with such savage barbarity, that she had scarce a whole bone left; after which they threw her into a ditch; but not satisfied with this, they took her child, a girl about six years of age, and after ripping up it's belly, threw it to it's mother, there to languish till it perished.

One man they forced to go to mass, after which they ripped open his body, and in that manner left him. They sawed another asunder, cut the throat of his wife, and after having dashed out the brains of their child, an infant, threw it to the swine, who greedily devoured it.

Having committed these, and many other horrid cruelties, they took the heads of seven protestants, and among them that of a pious minister, all which they fixed up at the market cross. They put a gag into the minister's mouth, then slit his cheeks to his ears, and laying a leaf of a bible before it, bid him preach, for his mouth was wide enough. They did several other things by way of derision, and expressed the greatest satisfaction at having thus murdered, and exposed the unhappy protestants.

Impossible is it to conceive the pleasure these monsters took in exercising their cruelty; and to increase the misery of those who fell into their hands, when they butchered them they would say, "Your soul to the devil."

One of these miscreants would come into a house with his hands imbrued in blood, and boast that it was English blood, and that his sword had pricked the white skins of the protestants, even to the hilt.

As soon as any one of them had killed a protestant, others would come and receive a gratification in cutting and mangling the body; after which they left it exposed to be devoured by dogs; and when they had slain a number of them they would boast, that the devil was beholden to them for sending so many souls to hell.

It is no wonder that they should thus treat the innocent christians, when they hesitated not to commit blasphemy against God, and his most holy word.

They burnt two protestant bibles in one place, and then said they had burnt hell-fire. In the church at Powerscourt they burnt the pulpit, pews, chests, and bibles belonging to it. They took other bibles, and after wetting them with dirty water, dashed them in the face of the protestants, saying, "We know you love a good lesson; here is an excellent one for you; come to-morrow, and you shall have as good a sermon as this."

Many of the protestants they dragged by the hair of their heads into the church, where they stripped and whipped them in the most cruel manner, telling them, at the same time, "That if they came to-morrow, they should hear the like sermon."

They put to death several ministers in Munster, in the most shocking manner. One, in particular, they stripped stark naked, and driving him before them, pricked him with swords and darts till he fell down, and expired.

In some places they plucked out the eyes, and cut off the hands of the protestants, and in that manner turned them into the fields, there to wander out their miserable existence.

Many young men they also obliged to force their aged parents to a river, where they were drowned; wives to assist in hanging their husbands; and mothers to cut the throats of their children.

They compelled a young man in one place to kill his father, and then immediately hanged him. In another they forced a woman to kill her husband, then obliged the son to kill her, and afterwards shot him through the head.

At a place called Glasflow, a popish priest, with some others, prevailed on forty protestants to be reconciled to the church of Rome. They had no sooner done this, than they told them they were in a good faith, and that they would prevent their falling from it, and turning heretics, by sending them out of the world, which they did by immediately cutting their throats.

Upwards of thirty protestants, men, women, and children, in the county of Tipperary, fell into the hands hands of the papists, who, after stripping them naked, murdered them with stones, pole-axes, swords, and other instruments.

In the county of Mayo about sixty protestants, fifteen of whom were ministers, were, upon covenant, to be safely conducted to Galway, by one Edmund Burke and his soldiers; but that inhuman monster by the way drew his sword, as an intimation of his design to the rest, who immediately followed his example, and murdered the whole, some of whom they stabbed, others were run through the body with pikes, and several were drowned.

Great numbers of protestants in Queen's county were put to the most shocking deaths. Fifty or sixty were placed together in one house, which being set on fire, they all perished in the flames.

Several were stripped naked, and being fastened to horses by ropes placed round their middles, were dragged through bogs till they expired in the greatest torture.

Several were hung by the feet to tenter-hooks driven into poles; and left till they perished in that wretched posture.

Some were fastened to the trunk of a tree, with a branch at top. Over this branch hung one arm, which principally supported the weight of the body; and one of the legs was turned up, and fastened to the trunk, while the other hung strait. In this dreadful and uneasy posture did they remain, as long as life would permit, pleasing spectacles to their blood-thirsty persecutors.

Seventeen men were buried alive at Clownes; and an Englishman, his wife, five children, and a servant maid, were all hung together, and their bodies afterwards thrown into a ditch.

Many were hung by the arms to branches of trees, with a weight to their feet; and others by the middle, in which postures they left them till they expired.

Others were hung on windmills, and before they were half dead, the barbarians cut them in pieces with their swords. Some, both men, women, and children, they cut and hacked in various parts of their bodies, and left them wallowing in their blood to perish where they fell. One poor woman they hung on a gibbet, with her child, an infant about a twelvemonth old, the latter of whom was hung by the neck with the hair of it's mother's head, and in that manner finished it's short but miserable existence.

No less than three hundred protestants were drowned in one day in the county of Tyrone; and many others were hanged, burned, and otherwise put to death.

Dr. Maxwell, rector of Tyrone, lived at this time near Armagh, and suffered greatly from these merciless savages. This person, in his examination, taken upon oath before the king's commissioners, declared, that the Irish papists owned to him, that they, at several times, had destroyed, in one place, 12,000 protestants, whom they inhumanly slaughtered at Glynwood, in their flight from the county of Armagh.

The river Bann being not fordable, and the bridge broken down, the Irish forced thither, at different times, a great number of unarmed defenceless protestants, and with pikes and swords violently thrust above one thousand into the river, where they miserably perished.

The cathedral of Armagh did not escape the fury of these barbarians, it being maliciously set on fire by their leaders, and burnt to the ground. And to extirpate, if possible, the very race of those unhappy protestants, who lived in or near Armagh, the Irish first burnt all their houses, and then gathered together many hundreds of those innocent people, young and old, on pretence of allowing them a guard and safe conduct to Colerain; when they treacherously fell on them by the way, and inhumanly murdered them all.

Similar barbarities were practised on the wretched protestants in almost all parts of the kingdom; and, when an estimate was afterwards made of the number who were sacrificed to gratify the diabolical souls of the papists, it amounted to one hundred and fifty thousand.

No. 80.

But it now remains that we proceed to the particulars that followed.

Now these desperate wretches, flushed and grown insolent with success, (though by methods attended with such excessive barbarities as perhaps not to be equalled) soon got possession of the castle of Newry, where the king's stores and ammunition were lodged; and, with as little difficulty, made themselves masters of Dundalk. They afterwards took the town of Ardee, where they murdered all the protestants, and then proceeded to Drogheda. The garrison of Drogheda was in no condition to sustain a siege, notwithstanding which, as often as the Irish renewed their attacks, they were vigorously repulsed, by a very unequal number of the king's forces, and a few faithful protestant citizens under sir Henry Tichborne, the governor, assisted by the lord viscount Moore. The siege of Drogheda began on the 30th of November, 1641, and held till the 4th of March, 1642, when sir Phelim O'Neal, and the Irish miscreants under him, were forced to retreat.

During this time ten thousand troops were sent from Scotland to the relief of the remaining protestants in Ireland, which being properly divided in the most capital parts of the kingdom, happily eclipsed the power of the Irish savages; and the protestants, for a time, lived happy and unmolested.

However in the reign of king James II. they were again interrupted, for in a parliament held at Dublin in the year 1689, great numbers of the protestant nobility, clergy, and gentry of Ireland, were attainted of high treason. The government of the kingdom was, at that time, invested in the earl of Tyrconnel, a bigoted papist, and an inveterate enemy to the protestants. By his orders they were again persecuted in various parts of the kingdom. The revenues of the city of Dublin were seized, and most of the churches converted into prisons. And had it not been for the resolution and uncommon bravery of the garrisons of the city of Londonderry, and the town of Inniskillin, there had not one place remained for refuge to the distressed protestants in the whole kingdom; but all must have been given up to king James, and to the furious popish party that governed him.

On the 18th of April, 1689, the remarkable siege of Londonderry was opened by twenty thousand papists, the flower of the Irish army. The city was not properly circumstanced to sustain a siege, the defenders consisting of a body of raw undisciplined protestants, who had fled thither for shelter, and half a regiment of lord Mountjoy's disciplined soldiers, with the principal part of the inhabitants, making in all only seven thousand three hundred and sixty one fighting men.

At first the besieged hoped, that their stores of corn, and other necessaries, would be sufficient; but by the continuance of the siege their wants increased; and these became at last so heavy, that for a considerable time before the siege was raised, a pint of coarse barley, a small quantity of greens, a few spoonfuls of starch, with a very moderate proportion of horse flesh, were reckoned a week's provision for a soldier. And they were, at length, reduced to such extremities, that they eat dogs, cats, and mice.

While their miseries increased with the siege, many, through mere hunger and want, pined and languished away, or fell dead in the streets. And it is remarkable, that when their long expected succours arrived from England, they were upon the point of being reduced to this alternative, either to preserve their existence by eating each other, or attempting to fight their way through the Irish, which must have infallibly produced their destruction.

Most happily these succours were brought by the ship Mountjoy, of Derry, and the Phoenix, of Colerain, at which time they had only nine lean horses left, with a pint of meal to each man. By hunger, and the fatigues of war, their seven thousand three hundred and sixty-one fighting men were reduced to four thousand three hundred, one-fourth part of whom were rendered unfit for service.

As

As the calamities of the besieged were very great, so likewise were the terrors and sufferings of their protestant friends and relations; all of whom (even women and children) were forcibly driven from the country thirty miles round, and inhumanly reduced to the sad necessity of continuing some days and nights, without food or covering, before the walls of the town; and were thus exposed to the continual fire both of the Irish army from without, and the shot of their friends from within.

The succours from England happily arriving, put an end to their affliction; and the siege was raised on the 31st of July, having been continued upwards of three months before.

The very day before the siege of Londonderry was raised, the Inniskilliners engaged a body of six thousand Irish Roman catholics, at Newton Butler, or Crown-Castle, of whom near five thousand were slain. This, with the defeat at Londonderry, dispirited the papists, and they gave up all farther attempts to persecute the protestants.

In the following year, viz. 1690, the Irish took up arms in favour of the abdicated prince, king James II. but they were totally defeated by his successor king William the Third. That monarch, before he left the country, reduced them to a state of subjection, in which they have ever since continued; and it is to be hoped will so remain as long as time shall continue.

In the year 1731, by a report made in Ireland, it appeared, that a great number of ecclesiastics had, in defiance of the laws, flocked into that kingdom; that several convents had been opened by jesuits, monks, and friars; that many new and pompous mass-houses had been erected in some of the most conspicuous parts of their great cities, where there had not been any before; and that such swarms of vagrant, immoral Romish priests had appeared, that the very papists themselves considered them as an unnecessary load.

Notwithstanding all this, the protestant interest at present stands upon a much stronger basis than it did a century ago. The Irish, who formerly led an unsettled and roving life, in the woods, bogs, and mountains; and lived on the depredation of their neighbours; they who in the morning seized the prey, and at night divided the spoil, have, for many years past, become quiet and civilized. They taste the sweets of English society, and the advantages of civil government. They trade in our cities, and are employed in our manufactures. They are received also into English families; and are treated by the protestants with great humanity.

The heads of their clans, and the chiefs of the great Irish families, who cruelly oppressed and tyrannized over their vassals, are now dwindled, in a great measure, to nothing; and most of the ancient popish nobility and gentry of Ireland have renounced the Romish religion and superstition.

It is also to be hoped, that inestimable benefits will arise from the establishment of protestant schools in various parts of the kingdom, in which the children of the Roman catholics are instructed in religion and reading, whereby the mist of ignorance is dispelled from their eyes, which was the great source of the cruel transactions that have taken place, at different periods, in that country.

For the sake of preserving the protestant interest in Ireland upon a solid basis, it behoves all in whom that power is invested, to discharge it with the strictest assiduity and attention; for should it once again lose ground, there is no doubt but the papists would take those advantages they have hitherto done, and thousands might yet fall victims to their malicious bigotry.

MEMOIRS of Mr. JOHN FOX, the original AUTHOR of this COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

THIS ingenious author was born at Boston, in Lincolnshire, A.D. 1517; the very year, when Luther, in Germany, began the reformation.

Mr. Fox's father died when he was very young; and, his mother marrying again, he came under the tutelage of a father-in-law; with whom he dwelt, till the age of sixteen, at which time he was entered of Brasen-Nose college, Oxford; and was chamber-fellow with the celebrated Dr. Alexander Nowel, afterwards dean of St. Paul's. Mr. Fox plied his academical studies, with equal assiduity, improvement, and applause. In 1538, he took the degree of bachelor in arts; and that of master, in 1543. The same year, he was elected fellow of Magdalen college.

Upon his first removal to the university, and for some time after, he was strongly attached to the heresies and superstitions of popery. To his zeal for these, he added a life strictly regular and moral. His indefatigable and profound researches into ecclesiastical history, and the writings of the primitive fathers; and, above all, his thorough acquaintance with the holy scripture, in its original languages, became the means of convincing him, to what an immense distance the Romish church has departed from the faith, practice, and spirit, of christianity.

With the intent to make himself yet a more competent judge of the controversies then in debate between protestants and papists, he searched with indefatigable assiduity into the ancient and modern history of the church. And with such zeal and industry did Mr. Fox apply himself to these inquiries, that, before he was 30 years of age, he had read over all the Greek and all the Latin fathers; all the scholastic writers; together with the acts of all the councils; and, moreover, made himself master of the Hebrew language. But from this strict and severe application, by night as well as by day; from forsaking his old popish friends, and courting the most sequestered retirement; from the dubious and hesitating manner, in which, when he could not avoid being in company, he spoke of religious subjects; and, above all, from his sparing attendance on the public worship of the church, which he had, before, been remarkable for strictly and constantly frequenting; arose the first surmises of his being alienated from the reigning superstitions, and infected with (what the bigoted Romanists termed) the "new heresies."

Thus, we find the humble and benevolent Mr. Fox was not without his enemies; yet through grace, he determined to venture the loss of all things, for Christ's sake: in consequence of which, he openly professed the gospel, and was publicly accused of heresy. His college passed judgment on him, as an heretic convicted; and, he saw himself expelled from the university in a short time after.

This gentleman's troubles sat the heavier on him, as they lost him the countenance and good offices of his friends, who were afraid to assist and protect a person condemned for a capital offence. His father-in-law, particularly, seized this opportunity to withhold from Mr. Fox the estate which his own father had left him; thinking, that he, who stood in danger of the law himself, would with difficulty find relief by legal means.

Thus forsaken and oppressed, Mr. Fox was reduced to great straits; when God raised him up an unexpected patron in sir Thomas Lucy, of Warwickshire; who received him into his house, and made him tutor to his children. Here he married a citizen's daughter, of Coventry; and continued in sir Thomas's family, till his pupils were grown up: after which, he, with some difficulty, procured entertainment with his wife's father, at Coventry; from whence, a few years before the death of Henry VIII. he removed to London.

Being, for a considerable time after his arrival in the capital without employment or preferment, he was again reduced to extreme want. But the Lord's good providence relieved him, at length in the following extraordinary manner. As he was sitting one day in St. Paul's church, his eyes hollow, his countenance wan and pale, and his whole body emaciated (or, rather, within a little of being literally starved to death); a person whom he never remembered to have seen before, came and sat down by him; and, accosting him familiarly, put a respectable sum of money into his hand, saying, Be of good comfort, Mr. Fox; take care of yourself, and use all means to preserve your life; for depend upon it, God will, in a few days, give you a better prospect, and more certain means of subsistence. He, afterwards, used his utmost endeavours to find out the person, by whose bounty he had been so seasonably relieved; but he was never able to gain any discovery. However, the prediction was fulfilled; for, within three days from that memorable incident, he was taken into the duchess of Richmond's family, to be tutor to her nephew the earl of Surrey's children, who (on the imprisonment of the earl, and of his father the duke of Norfolk, in the tower) were committed for education to the care of the duchess.

With this female, Mr. Fox lived at Ryegate, in Surrey, during the latter part of Henry VIII's reign, the five years reign of king Edward VI. and part of queen Mary's. Gardiner, the bloody bishop of Winchester, in whose diocese this good man so long lived, would have soon brought him to the shambles, had he not been protected by one of his noble pupils, then duke of Norfolk. Gardiner always hated Mr. Fox (who, it is said, was the first person that ventured to preach the gospel at Ryegate); and saw, with deep concern, the heir of one of the noblest families in the kingdom, trained up in attachment to protestantism, under Mr. Fox's influence. The prelate, therefore, formed various designs against the safety of the latter; and sought, by many artifices and stratagems, to work his ruin. The holy man who was no less suspicious of the bishop, than the bishop was of him, found himself obliged in prudence (though much against the duke's inclination, who loved and revered him as a father) to quit his native land, and seek shelter abroad. His grace of Norfolk, perceiving that no arguments nor intreaties could induce his honoured tutor to remain in England, took care to provide him with every accommodation requisite for his voyage. Mr. Fox, accordingly, set sail from Ipswich haven, accompanied by his wife, who was then pregnant, and by several other persons who were leaving their country on a religious account. The vessel had not been very long at sea, before a storm arose; which, the next day, drove them back into the port from whence they had set out. Having, with great difficulty and danger reached the land, Mr. Fox was saluted with indubitable information, that bishop Gardner had issued a warrant for apprehending him, and was causing the most diligent search to be made after him. On this, he made interest with the master of the ship to put to sea again, without delay; though at evident hazard of their lives, as the tempest had not yet subsided. Through God's goodness, however, they all arrived, in two days, at Nieuport in Flanders; from whence Mr. Fox and his company travelled to Antwerp, and Frankfort; and so to Basil, in Switzerland, whither great numbers of the English resorted in those times of domestic persecution and troubles.

About this time the city of Basil was one of the most famous in Europe, for printing; and many of the learned refugees, who retired thither, got their subsistence by revising and correcting the press. To this employment Mr. Fox betook himself; and it was here, that he laid the first plan of his inestimable history and martyrology, intitled, "Acts and Monuments of the Church."

In the month of November, 1558, the bloody Queen Mary died, and, the day before she died in England, Mr. Fox, in a sermon then preached by him at Basil, publicly and positively predicted, that the day then next ensuing would be the last of her life. An event so circumstantially foretold, by one at such a distance from the place of Mary's residence, and so punctually accomplished, by the hand of Divine Providence, could only be made known to the predictor, by revelation from the Almighty.

The accession of Elizabeth to the throne, encouraged Mr. Fox to return home: where, on his arrival, he found a faithful and serviceable friend, in his late pupil, the duke of Norfolk; who hospitably and nobly entertained him, at his manor of Christ-Church, in London, till his [i. e. till the duke's] death: from which latter period, Mr. Fox inherited a pension, bequeathed to him by his deceased benefactor, and ratified by his son the earl of Suffolk.

Nor did the good man's successes stop here. On being recommended to the queen, by her secretary of state, the great Cecil; her majesty gave him the prebendary of Shipton, in the cathedral of Salisbury; which was, in a manner, forced upon him; for he brought himself with difficulty to accept of it. Dr. Fuller tells us, that archbishop Parker summoned him to subscribe; in hope, "that the general reputation of his piety might give the greater countenance to conformity." But, instead of complying with the command, Mr. Fox pulled out of his pocket the New Testament in Greek; and, holding it up, said, To this will I subscribe. And, when a subscription to the canons was required of him, he refused; saying, I have nothing in the church, but a prebend at Salisbury; and if you take it away from me, much good may it do you. He was however permitted till his death to retain it.

Mr. Fox, on his re-settlement here, set himself to revise and enlarge his admirable Martyrology. With prodigious pains, and constant study, he finished that celebrated work in 11 years. For the sake of greater correctness, he never employed any amanuensis; but wrote every line of this vast book with his own hand, and searched and transcribed all the records and papers himself. But, by such excessive toil, leaving no part of his time free from study, nor affording himself either the repose or recreations which nature required; his health was so reduced, and his person became so emaciated and altered, that such of his friends and relations, as only conversed with him occasionally, could not recollect him at sight. Yet, though he grew daily more lean, withered, and exhausted; his hard studies went on as briskly as ever, nor would he be persuaded to lessen his accustomed labours.—The papists, foreseeing how extremely detrimental his history of their errors and cruelties would prove to their cause, exerted their whole art and strength, to lessen the reputation of his work. This malice of theirs was of signal service, both to Mr. Fox himself, and to the church of God at large: as it eventually made his book more intrinsically valuable, by inducing him to weigh, with the most exact and scrupulous attention, the certainty of the facts he recorded, and the validity of the authorities from whence he drew his informations and accounts.

Thus having long served both the church and the world by his ministry, by his pen, and by the unsullied lustre of a beneficent, useful, and holy life, he comfortably resigned his soul to Christ, on the 18th. of April, 1587. He was interred in the chancel of St. Giles's, Cripplegate; of which parish he had been, in the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, for some time, vicar.

The Lord had given him a foresight of his departure; and so fully persuaded was he, that the time was just at hand, when he should quit the body, that (probably, to enjoy unmolested communion with God, and to have no wordly interruptions in his last hours) he purposely sent his two sons from home, though he loved them with great tenderness; and, before they returned, his spirit, as he had foreseen would be the case, was flown to heaven.
